410. Mr Straw concluded by stating that the period since resolution 687 (1991) had been passed had "frankly been a period of humiliation" for the Council and the UN as "games have been played with the Council's authority". The Charter required the Council to "back the diplomatic process with a credible threat of force and also, if necessary, to be ready to use that force". If the Council decided to:

> "… back away … to give unlimited time for little or no co-operation on substance – then the disarmament of Iraq and the peace and security of the international community, for which we are responsible, will not get any easier, but very much harder.
> "This issue is not just about Iraq … If we send out the message to proliferators … that defiance of the United Nations pays, then it will not be peace that we have secured."

411. Secretary Powell stated that the Council should consider whether it was time to consider the serious consequences intended by resolution 1441.

412. The points made by Secretary Powell included:

- The inspectors had reported progress, but it was on process not substance, and tricks were being played by Iraq.
- Resolution 1441 was about disarmament, not inspections. It stated that Iraq was in material breach of its obligations and must now come into compliance.
- The requirement in the resolution for a full, complete and accurate declaration of its activities had been "an early test of Iraq's seriousness; the answer in its declaration [of 7 December] was that it was not going to co-operate".
- Connections between Iraq and terrorist organisations were "now emerging". We could not wait for weapons of mass destruction to show up in our cities. The weapons "could kill tens of thousands of people" if they "got into the wrong hands".
- If Iraq had been co-operating, documents would be flooding in and there would be a queue of interviewees.
- Iraq did not need time to decide to co-operate. Iraq's recent actions were not responsible, they were "continued efforts to deceive, to deny, to divert, to throw us off the trail".
- Resolution 1441 had anticipated Iraq's response. The improvements in process, more inspections and a longer inspection period would not move the position that Iraq had "failed to comply".
- The threat of force "should always be a last resort", but it "must be a resort". The process could not be "endlessly strung out", as Iraq was trying to do, until the world's attention moved in other directions.
- Iraq could not "be allowed to get away with it again". The Council had to think through the consequences of walking away or the reality of facing the problem and the choice of whether or not it was time to consider the serious consequences intended by 1441.

413. Secretary Powell concluded that:

> "The security of the region, the hopes for the people of Iraq, and our security rest upon us meeting our responsibilities and, if it comes to it, invoking the serious consequences called for in resolution 1441 …"

414. Mr Igor Ivanov stated that Iraq should be set clear tasks to provide objective criteria by which to assess progress and the threat posed by Iraq.

415. The debate in the Council demonstrated that remedies other than the use of force to achieve Iraq's disarmament had not yet been exhausted.

416. Mr Igor Ivanov stated that the Council should be guided by the professional data provided by the inspectors to, "without making a mistake, come to the correct conclusion".

417. Substantial progress had been made and could not be ignored. The Council should urge Baghdad to increase co-operation and the work of the inspectors "must be made more systematic and focused". Iraq should be set clear tasks, including through the submission of the UNMOVIC and IAEA work programme and the list of key disarmament tasks required by resolution 1284 (1999). Adoption of such a programme would provide "objective criteria" to assess both the degree of Baghdad's co-operation and whether Iraq was "a threat to international peace and security".

418. Russia's position, "shared by the overwhelming majority of States in the world, including within the Security Council", was that inspections "must continue". There was:

> "… a unique opportunity to reach agreement on how to solve this … problem through political means, in strict accordance with the UN Charter. This is a real opportunity, and it must not be missed. Force may be resorted to, but only when all other remedies have been exhausted. As may be seen from today's discussion, we have not yet reached that point …"

419. Other members of the Security Council emphasised the need for Iraq to co-operate actively and unconditionally to disarm; the need to exhaust the inspections route; and the importance of Council unity.

420. Mr Luiz Derbez, the Mexican Foreign Minister, stated that the Iraqi Government continued to evade its international responsibilities and the Council was united about the goal of disarmament. But the Council was "increasingly divided as [to] the most effective and least costly manner by which it may be achieved". Mexico's view was that the "Security Council's primary task" was to ensure the inspectors fulfilled their mission.

421. Mr Mamady Traoré, Guinean Permanent Representative to the UN and President of the Council, advocated continued inspections although they "should not be continued indefinitely". Guinea was "concerned at the abrupt rise in tension within the international community" over the Iraq crisis and appealed "for a swift beginning of direct and constructive dialogue among Security Council members so that we can move beyond this climate of tension which could deal a harsh blow to the United Nations system". Iraq must "finally agree" to co-operate and end its delaying tactics.

422. Mr Munir Akram, Pakistani Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that it was "understandable that the patience of some important members of the Security Council is running out". The call in resolution 1441 "was credible because it was unanimous". Pakistan believed that the "Security Council must maintain this unity of purpose and action". It could still unite around:

- "a general preference, even at this late stage, to secure the elimination of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction through peaceful means";
- Iraq's "immediate, active and unconditional co-operation"; and
- "a readiness to allow more time".

423. Mr Martin Belinga-Eboutou, Cameroonian Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that Cameroon wished to "emphasise … the need for the Security Council to continue to safeguard … its unity and cohesion". He added: "The discord, the cacophony, indeed the confusion surrounding us in recent days can only harm our effectiveness." Cameroon was "in favour of a peaceful settlement" and was "trying to take a pragmatic and realistic approach". It had "raised the possibility of more robust inspections" which would require Iraq's immediate, active and complete co-operation. It was "clear that further non-compliance by Iraq with the demands of the Security Council would be one violation too many", which would leave the Council with "no other choice but to adopt, in unity and cohesion, appropriate measures to have its decisions respected within the provisions of the Charter".

424. Referring to Mr Annan's speech on 8 February, Mr Belinga-Eboutou appealed for unity and cohesion. He stated:

> "The maintenance of peace and security is a very delicate and serious mission. It requires at all times those who are responsible for it [to] transcend their differences and act only in the interests of peace."

425. Mr Ismael Gaspar Martins, Angolan Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that the Council was unable to say that Iraq was free from weapons of mass destruction, but:

> "… we are equally unable to state unequivocally that Iraq is fully armed with weapons of mass destruction or other weapons that pose a clear and impending threat to international peace and security."

426. Mr Gaspar Martins was "confident that the Council" represented "a unified coalition of the willing to secure international peace and security". Whatever decision it reached, it was "pivotal" that it was "based on convincing and far-reaching information". He warned that:

> "Whatever decision we collectively take must be proportionate to the gravity of the issue before us. That decision need not be popular; but it must be justified. The consequences of a war clearly outweigh its benefits …"

427. Mr Stefan Tafrov, Bulgarian Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that Bulgaria believed that Iraq's co-operation was "unsatisfactory" and it was unfortunate, "as the statements made by the chief inspectors have confirmed", that the Iraqi authorities were "still in material breach" of resolution 1441. Bulgaria hoped that France's ideas would be one element of the overall Security Council strategy to disarm Iraq and believed that that goal could still be achieved through peaceful means. But the Council had repeatedly warned Iraq of serious consequences if it did not comply. Bulgaria appealed to the Council to "stand united". That was "an essential condition for a peaceful outcome to the crisis and for averting future threats".

428. Mr Fischer stated that Iraq "must not be allowed to possess any weapons of mass destruction and must disarm completely". The inspectors had made "headway" and their presence had "substantially diminished the danger emanating from Iraq". They "must be given the time to successfully complete their mission". That required Iraq to co-operate fully, unconditionally and actively if a "looming tragedy" was to be averted.

429. Mr Fischer concluded:

> "All possible means for resolving the Iraqi crisis by peaceful means must be thoroughly explored. Whatever decisions need to be made must be made by the Security Council alone. It remains the only body internationally authorised to do so.
> "Military action against Iraq would, in addition to the terrible humanitarian consequences, above all endanger the stability of a tense and troubled region. The consequences for the Near and Middle East could be catastrophic. There should be no automatism leading to the use of military force. All possible alternatives need to be exhaustively explored."

430. Iraq continued to state that it did not possess weapons of mass destruction.

431. Mr Aldouri stated that Iraq had agreed to act on resolution 1441 and had "provided everything that might fall within the concept of pro-active Iraqi co-operation". The documents provided with the Iraqi declaration of 7 December 2002, required "in-depth study" because they contained "updated relevant information responding to many questions". Iraq had "the right to wonder whether the declaration had been studied with due diligence and thoroughness". Iraq had "begun to co-operate pro-actively", and many speakers had called for that but there was a question about what that would mean.

432. Mr Aldouri pointed out that there was an "Arabic proverb that an empty hand has nothing to give. You cannot give what you do not have. If we do not possess such weapons, how can we disarm ourselves? How can such weapons be dismantled if they do not exist?"

433. Iraq agreed that the "best way to resolve these issues is through continuing pro-active co-operation with the inspectors". Mr Aldouri stressed that Iraq had:

> "… chosen the path of peace. We have opted for solutions that would satisfy the international community. We are prepared to provide all means to assist in making clear the true picture …
> "We hope the Security Council will heed the desire of the vast majority of States Members of the United Nations and allow the inspectors to fulfil their role …"

434. In the subsequent private discussion, Mr Straw stated that there was overwhelming evidence that Iraq had had WMD; if there was no evidence to show that it had been destroyed, we had to work on the basis that it existed.

435. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that, in response to points raised during the private session of the Council:

- Dr Blix had clarified that it was too soon to say whether Iraq had come to a genuine acceptance of the disarmament required – there were some signs but no break through. Interviews were a mixed bag. In reality, the inspectors had had no one accept their conditions, though some people they had asked had subsequently come back and accepted. The Iraqi decree on WMD did not say anything about what Iraq would do in practice. UNMOVIC had expanded as much as it could; if it expanded too fast, there was a risk of mistakes.
- Dr ElBaradei had voiced concerns about Iraq's approach to interviews and emphasised the importance of inspections as the cornerstone of the international disarmament regime. He had also questioned whether Iraq needed reassurance that a new item would not be regarded as a material breach.
- Mr Straw had stated that the reason that the Council had said Iraq's WMD posed a threat was because there was overwhelming evidence that Iraq had had the material. If we had no evidence it had been destroyed, we had to work on the basis that it existed and that there was a danger to the region and to our national security. Oral cross-examination was the best way to get the truth. Interviewees were not saying anything and were insisting on tape recorders because they wanted to stay alive. Until Iraq allowed interviews outside Iraq and in free conditions, we would be naive to think that they were co-operating.

- Ms Palacio commented that "Iraqi progress had always been last minute and under pressure". In her legal experience, she had "never seen a situation were [sic] witnesses did not speak freely unless they were threatened".
- Secretary Powell questioned whether those who advocated reinforced inspections were serious or afraid to step up to the challenge of Iraq's lack of compliance".[109]

436. Sir Jeremy commented that Dr Blix's report was much more equivocal than that of 27 January. His, and Dr ElBaradei's, answers in the closed session were:

> "… more indicative of their underlying suspicions, as though they knew their prepared remarks had over-compensated. Tough exchanges with the Americans the day before may have made Blix more determined to assert his independence.
> "We have to go on hammering away at the logic of SCR 1441: it is about Iraq's approach, and not the inspections … When the Council middle ground … realise they have to face up to hard and final decisions, they may take more account of the responsibility they hold. So far, wishful procrastination continues to rule."

437. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Inquiry that, following his report on 27 January, Dr Blix had "got a bit cross" with the US because they felt that might in itself amount to a material breach. As a result, in his report on 14 February, Dr Blix had:

> "… within the scope that he felt he had for interpretation … said, 'They are actually beginning to cooperate … So I feel I'm getting somewhere.' The Americans were quite cross about that …"[110]

438. Sir Jeremy added that, "in the lunch after", Dr Blix "was tougher on the Iraqis and their lack of co-operation in private than he had been in public, and it was clear from my conversations with him … that … was affected by the reaction of the Americans to what he had said on 27 January".

439. Asked if that was because Dr Blix did not want to provide an automatic trigger for action, Sir Jeremy replied: "Yes".

440. Asked what Dr Blix had said about pressure from the US or UK, Sir Jeremy replied:

> "Hans Blix complained more than once to me about the pressures from the Americans. … [H]e felt the relationship with the British was much more reasonable and professional and we weren't trying to distort the facts for political reasons.
> "… I never heard a word of complaint from him about the pressure being put on him by the British …"[111]

[111] Private hearing, 26 May 2010, pages 18-19.

441. Mr Annan concluded that there were real differences on strategy and timing in the Security Council. Iraq's non-co-operation was insufficient to bring members to agree that war was justified; they would only move if they came to their own judgement that inspections were pointless.

442. The UKMIS New York record of a meeting between Mr Straw and Mr Annan reported that they had discussed the fact that the majority of Council members remained unpersuaded by the US and UK arguments.[112] The strong probability of Iraqi non-co-operation was not sufficient to bring them to agree that war was justified. There were real differences on strategy and timing and Council members would only move if they came to their own judgement that inspections were pointless.

443. Mr Straw had commented that Saddam Hussein's behaviour would be quite different if he really had zero WMD. The UK and US would look at the timing of a second resolution. The Council was more likely to be brought to a decision if we stuck to the game plan, but we also had to do the political arithmetic. The Americans would find it difficult to move forward if the Council majority really believed the inspections were working.

444. A separate record produced by the FCO reported that Mr Straw had commented that the public saw 200,000 troops in the region and heard belligerent language and thought we were determined to go to war tomorrow without good reason.[113] He and Mr Annan had discussed the need to keep the pressure on Saddam Hussein; and that the threat of force could be more effective than its use. There was a possibility of building a consensus with time but if the pace was forced there was a risk of one or more vetoes. The problem was that the burden of evidence had shifted to those who wanted military action. The fact that resolution 1441 required Iraqi compliance was lost. Time was needed to get people to look at things differently, but different countries faced different time pressures. American time was very expensive; others felt it was natural to ask for more time. When asked to define "a little time", Dr Blix had answered "one year".

445. Asked by the Inquiry whether, after the report on 27 January, he had expected Dr Blix to be firm in his determination of a material breach, Mr Blair stated:

> "… the whole point was that his [Dr Blix's] view was that Iraq was complying somewhat, but not fully and unconditionally, and as time went on, I became increasingly alarmed … that we were just back into a game-playing situation with Saddam … I think it is very clear from what we now know that he never had any intention of his people co-operating fully with the inspectors."[114]

446. Asked if he had been disappointed by Dr Blix's report of 14 February, Mr Blair replied:

> "It wasn't that I was disappointed. I was getting confused as to what he was really trying to tell us … what particularly struck me … and this then had a huge significance in what I then tried … to construct a final way of avoiding the war, is, on page 26 of his briefing, he deals with the issue of interviews and he says that the Iraqi side … are starting to move on interviews … they have made a commitment that they will allow it, but then, when he actually comes to the interviews themselves, people are reluctant …"[115]

Mr Blair's speech to the Labour Party conference, 15 February 2003

447. Mr Blair used his speech to the Labour Party conference on 15 February to continue to link the timetable for decisions on Iraq to a judgement about whether Iraq had decided to co-operate as required by resolution 1441.

448. Mr Blair also continued to emphasise the moral case for removing Saddam Hussein.

449. On 15 February, as part of a weekend of worldwide protests against military action in Iraq, a march organised by the Stop the War Coalition, the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament and the Muslim Association of Britain took place in London. The police described it as the UK's biggest ever demonstration, estimating that at least 750,000 people took part. The organisers put the figure closer to two million. There were also anti-war gatherings in Glasgow and Belfast.[116]

450. In the entry in his diaries for 13 February, Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair had decided to focus on a humanitarian theme to "at least give the marchers something to think about and something to put them on the defensive".[117]

451. Mr Campbell wrote the following day that Mr Blair had said Dr Blix's presentation was "a total disgrace, that he should have just told the truth, and the truth was Saddam was not co-operating". Mr Blair was in "a tough place", but "showed no signs of changing tack … said we were doing the right thing. But whether we liked it or not, we were moving towards a regime change argument." Mr Blair "felt we had to make more of the moral case but we agreed we could not really set out the forward plan he had devised on the back of this, because it would look like weakness …"

452. In the entry in his memoir for 14 February, Mr Cook wrote:

> "The news from New York is electrifying. The latest report by Hans Blix registers a lot of progress in co-operation from Iraq, fails to identify any evidence of weapons of mass destruction and expresses confidence that with more time more progress can be made. What Hans Blix was in effect confirming was that the UK strategy of applying pressure on Saddam to co-operate on disarmament, through the dual track of inspectors on the ground and the threat of force across his border, is working rather well."[118]

453. Mr Cook added his view that Mr Blair needed the inspectors:

> "… to prove that Saddam will not co-operate and that he is therefore justified in going to war … The ghastly dilemma he now faces is that without Hans Blix denouncing Saddam, there is little chance of getting a majority in the Security Council for military conflict, and therefore even less chance of getting a majority of the British people."

454. In his speech to the Labour Party conference in Glasgow on 15 February, Mr Blair stated that the Labour Party would come through an uncertain time by holding firm to its beliefs and the United Nations was one of those beliefs. He wanted:

> "… to solve the issue of Iraq and weapons of mass destruction through the UN. That is why last November we insisted on putting UN inspectors back into Iraq to disarm it.
> "Dr Blix reported to the UN yesterday and there will be more time given to inspections. He will report again on 28 February. But let no one forget two things. To anyone familiar with Saddam's tactics of deception and evasion, there is a weary sense of déjà vu. As ever, at the last minute concessions are made. And as ever it is the long finger that is directing them. The concessions are suspect. Unfortunately, the weapons are real."[119]

455. Mr Blair continued that the inspections regime in resolution 1441 was tough because for 12 years Saddam Hussein had played a "game with the inspectors" and:

> "The time needed is not the time it takes for the inspectors to discover the weapons. They are not a detective agency. We played that game for years in the 1990s. The time is the time necessary to make a judgement: is Saddam prepared to co-operate fully or not. If he is, the inspectors can take as much time as they want. If he is not, if this is a repeat of the 1990s – and I believe it is – then let us be in no doubt what is at stake.

"By going down the UN route we gave the UN an extraordinary opportunity and a heavy responsibility. The opportunity is to show that we can meet the menace to our world together … The responsibility, however, is indeed to deal with it."

456. Referring to the failure of the League of Nations, Mr Blair stated:

"… Saddam would not be making a single concession without the knowledge that forces were gathering against him. I hope, even now, Iraq can be disarmed peacefully, with or without Saddam. But if we show weakness now, if we allow the plea for more time to become just an excuse for prevarication until the moment for action passes, then it will not only be Saddam who is repeating history. The menace, and not just from Saddam, will grow; the authority of the UN will be lost; and the conflict when it comes will be more bloody. Yes, let the United Nations be the way to deal with Saddam. But let the United Nations mean what it says; and do what it means."

457. Referring to the threats posed by the proliferation of WMD and the threat from terrorism and their potential consequences, as well as Iraq's past behaviour, Mr Blair stated:

"That is why Saddam and Weapons of Mass Destruction are important.

"Every time I have asked us to go to war, I have hated it …

"At every stage, we should seek to avoid war. But if the threat cannot be removed peacefully, please let us not fall for the delusion that it can be safely ignored. If we do not confront these twin menaces of weapons of mass destruction and terrorism, they will not disappear …

"When people say if you act, you will provoke these people … remember that Al Qaida attacked the US …

"… Everyone agrees Saddam must be disarmed …

"No-one seriously believes he is yet co-operating fully. In all honesty, most people don't really believe he ever will … It's not really an issue of timing … It is a moral purpose, and I respect that.

"… I abhor the consequences of war."

458. Addressing the question of why he pressed "the case so insistently", Mr Blair stated that he had set out:

"… the "geo political reason – the threat of Weapons of Mass Destruction and its link with terrorism. And I believe it.

"If I am honest about it there is another reason why I feel so strongly …

"The moral case against war has a moral answer: it is the moral case for removing Saddam. It is not the reason we act. That must be according to the United Nations mandate on weapons of mass destruction. But it is the reason, frankly, why if we do have to act, we should do so with a clear conscience.

"Yes, there are consequences of war. If we remove Saddam by force, people will die and some will be innocent. And we must live with the consequences of our actions, even the unintended ones.

"But there are also consequences of 'stop the war'.

"If I … did not insist on disarmament … there would be no war. But there would still be Saddam … ruling the Iraqi people …

"This isn't a regime with weapons of mass destruction that is otherwise benign. This is a regime that contravenes every single principle or value anyone of our politics believes in.

"There will be no march for the victims of Saddam …

"I rejoice that we live in a country where peaceful process is a natural part of the democratic process …

"I do not seek unpopularity as a badge of honour. But sometimes it is the price of leadership. And the cost of conviction."

459. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair's speech was heard "in near silence … It was well received, not least because it was so serious". Mr Blair had been "confident and felt we had the right argument and we now needed a big strategy to put the case properly".[120]

460. In his memoir, Mr Blair wrote that he had been determined that "people should not be able to hide from the ghastly reality of Saddam continuing in power".[121]

Decisions on the way forward

461. After the discussions in the Security Council on 14 February, Dr Blix proposed consideration of a "benchmark approach" using "clusters" of issues being identified as part of the work programme required by resolution 1284.

462. Mr Straw spoke briefly to Dr Blix about the next steps after the presentation on 14 February. The report of the discussion stated that Dr Blix:

- had decided that Iraq had to destroy the (Volga) missile engines;
- did not think it worth pursuing any ultimatum which required Saddam to quit Iraq;

- was compiling a list of explicit questions about outstanding issues to "pin the Iraqis down";
- was looking at establishing a No-Fly Zone for the whole of Iraq; and
- was looking at freezing movements in certain areas to improve the chances of catching a mobile "bio-lab".[122]

463. Dr Blix recorded that he told both Mr Straw and Secretary Powell about the document being prepared by UNMOVIC, as required by resolution 1284 (1999), which "contained 'clusters' of unresolved issues and indicated precisely what was required of Iraq" that could be used "as a basis for selecting key disarmament tasks for the work programme" in a "'benchmark' approach".[123] Mr Straw and Secretary Powell were both "most interested" in the idea.

464. Dr Blix discussed the idea with both Dr Rice and Secretary Powell over the next two days. When he asked whether a deadline of 15 April was acceptable, Secretary Powell said that was too late.

465. Dr Blix also wrote that there was a lack of smoking guns that would impress the public; and that the British "who were most fervently in favour of a resolution embodying an ultimatum" had felt the resistance stiffen and "came to think that a change of focus might help. The new resolution could demand a declaration by Saddam showing that he had had a change of heart."

466. Mr Straw and Sir David Manning agreed with Secretary Powell and Dr Rice that, over the next few days, the US and UK should reflect on what the next steps should be.

467. Sir David Manning suggested that military action should not start before late March.

468. Discussing the next steps with Secretary Powell after the Council discussion, Mr Straw raised the possibility of issuing an ultimatum to Saddam Hussein and expressed caution on the timing of a second resolution. The US and UK had been on the back foot all day and needed to be clear about how they intended to play the end game before it began.[124]

469. Sir David Manning and Dr Rice agreed on 14 February to reflect over the next two to three days on what the next move at the UN should be, including an ultimatum.[125] Stressing that he was speaking personally, Sir David suggested that one possibility would be to use the French demand for a further meeting in a month to ask for another report from Dr Blix. It would also be important to leave time for an initiative to persuade Saddam to leave. That would mean delaying the start of military action until late March.

470. The British Embassy Washington reported that the US Administration was disappointed with Dr Blix's less than categorical verdict on Iraqi compliance.[126] A White House spokesman had downplayed the importance of the new avenues of co-operation identified by Dr Blix. The meeting had made securing a second resolution more difficult, but the Administration was determined to press ahead.

471. In the light of the position in the Security Council and the perception that the US would push for a vote by the end of February, FCO and No.10 officials proposed using the French proposal for a Ministerial discussion on 14 March to provide a deadline for a report from the inspectors on whether Iraq was co-operating.

472. Mr Ricketts wrote to Mr Straw on 15 February stating: "I know you want to cogitate over the weekend about how we adjust strategy." He set out the FCO's thinking "about how we might rally opinion in the Council through some version of an ultimatum and more time to give it effect".[127]

473. Mr Ricketts sent Mr Straw a minute from Mr Edward Chaplin, FCO Director Middle East and North Africa, of 13 February and a minute from Mr Stephen Pattison, FCO Head of the UN Department, which set out ways to make specific demands of Iraq.

474. Mr Chaplin had written that it was:

> "… probably the last opportunity to reflect on whether we can extract … a better outcome … than at present looks likely.
> "The mood in Washington points to early tabling of a second SCR and a quick drive to adoption. At best this will secure 9-10 positive votes and 5-6 abstentions. There is a substantial risk … that the text will be vetoed, at which point the US … will go for military action … I cannot imagine the Prime Minister then refusing to follow.
> "… No SCR and a feeble, at best, legal basis for military action is a nightmare scenario. The domestic consequences (and increased risk of terrorism to British citizens and staff) are daunting enough for Ministers. But the … longer term damage to UK interests would be more severe because longer lasting. The image of the UK, lone ally […] of a rampant US in its assault on Iraq, will be the touchstone for Arab and Muslim attitudes for a generation – this is the real Suez effect. A quick collapse of the Iraqi regime (quite likely); subsequent clear proof, because we find the stuff, that we were right all along about the Iraqi WMD threat (questionable – what convinces the experts may not convince public opinion unless it is pretty spectacular); and a smooth transfer to a democratic and stable government (improbable, especially without UN cover) would reduce the damage. But this is a high risk route.

"Before we go down this route, we should have a last look at alternatives, as Jeremy Greenstock is urging."[128]

475. Mr Chaplin suggested that the UK should consider a deal with France, Germany and Russia, insisting on full Iraqi compliance with a short list of key disarmament tasks, backed by the maximum number of inspectors and increased air surveillance, with a short deadline (15 March). There should be a signal in advance that, short of full compliance, the five Permanent Members of the Security Council (P5) would vote for an "all necessary means" text. This would come into force 10 days after the passage of a Security Council resolution to give time for the Arabs to persuade Saddam Hussein to stand down. The "goal would be one more last chance for Saddam Hussein".

476. Mr Chaplin and Mr Ricketts had agreed that the latter would discuss the idea with Mr Straw on their way to New York on 14 February.

477. Mr Pattison suggested two options to attract support from the "middle ground members":

- encouraging Dr Blix to set specific tasks to demonstrate Iraqi compliance, building on his own ideas; or
- the Security Council to set specific tasks for Iraq with a deadline.[129]

478. There would be difficulties with both approaches. The problem with the first option would lie in "getting the US to accept further delay and the likelihood that Iraq would do just enough to provoke future wrangling over the extent of their compliance". In addition, the US might be hesitant about giving Dr Blix a greater role. The problem with the second option was that it "would create an expectation that the UNSC would need to take a further decision to authorise serious consequences and we would expect Iraq to do just enough to split the Council".

479. Mr Ricketts advised Mr Straw:

"Each variant had pros and cons. The main difficulty could well be to bring the Americans to accept any specific ultimatum given the scope it would leave for Iraq to gain more time through minor concessions."[130]

[130] Minute Ricketts to Secretary of State [FCO], 15 February 2003, 'Iraq: Rethinking Strategy'.

480. Mr Ricketts wrote that he and Sir David Manning had discussed a variant of the approach Sir David had set out in his conversation with Dr Rice on 14 February. That was to use the French proposal for a ministerial discussion in the Security Council on 14 March to provide a deadline for asking Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei to state whether Iraq was "in full and active co-operation", including a demand that Iraq destroy its prohibited rocket motors, which would then be taken as the basis for a resolution. Dr Rice's initial reaction had been maybe, but she had wanted a deadline of 28 February. Mr Ricketts and Sir David thought that was too soon and would not allow sufficient time to rally middle-ground opinion. A 14 March deadline "should still fit with other time lines and demonstrate that we are listening to those who call for more time".

481. Mr Ricketts conceded that the proposal was "not a brilliant strategy" but it "might be a way forward avoiding signals of weakness".

482. Sir Jeremy Greenstock advised that more time would be needed and that the inspectors should be given the chance to deliver a judgement which would convince the Council.

483. Sir Jeremy Greenstock advised that the UK could table a resolution the following week.[131] The existing version would "not get nine votes, but it will signal the beginning of the end game and Council minds will have to concentrate within a harder context". In his view, the "Best area for plan B options" was "some kind of loaded ultimatum".

484. Sir Jeremy's view was that postponing the discussion to 14 March would not be sufficient to secure support: "If the judgement is left to Blix, e.g. to say whether or not Iraq has co-operated 'immediately, actively and unconditionally'", he "may not be capable of taking the heat or Council members may try to alter the terms in their favour".

485. There would also be a problem with the US. Sir Jeremy reported that Ambassador Negroponte had told him that President Bush would not agree to anything which changed the terms of 1441 (especially OP2), or altered their current legal foundation for action, or ensnared the Council in endless argument about interpretation. The current US thinking was to table their draft mid-week and to set a date (probably the end of February) for a vote.

486. Sir Jeremy reported that he had told Ambassador Negroponte "in general terms" that more would be needed:

> "Ideally, we should not move to the use of force without a find, a smoking gun. We should maximise the possibilities for that. We should expose the French reinforcement proposals as clearly inadequate for the disarmament of Iraq: indeed, no proposition other than war has yet been made which will realistically achieve that – something I said in terms to EU HOMS [Heads of Mission] meeting this morning."

[131] Telegram 270 UKMIS New York to FCO London, 15 February 2003, 'Personal Iraq Next Steps'.

487. Sir Jeremy suggested that elements in the ultimatum should "either test the French idea to destruction … or give the inspectors a real chance to deliver a judgement which will convince six more Council members". Dr Blix could play a role: "There should be room to move him to a firmer approach which raises the chances of the inspectors achieving more." Sir Jeremy reported that Dr Blix was interested in ideas for more vigorous inspections "though downbeat about the amount of time available from the US".

488. Sir Jeremy concluded:

> "If we and the US are true to our pronouncements of force as a last resort, bringing the Americans back to their mid-September approach as a last gasp before pressing the plunger at least has a certain logical force."

489. Sir David Manning proposed a resolution setting a deadline of 14 March for Saddam Hussein to demonstrate that he was complying fully with resolution 1441, after which he would be in further material breach.

490. Sir David envisaged that military action would not begin until late March, giving 10 days for Arab leaders to persuade Saddam Hussein to depart.

491. The resolution should specify what compliance meant. That would set the bar at a level it would be difficult for Saddam Hussein to reach and prevent equivocation in the inspectors' reports.

492. France would seek to block the resolution and to string out inspections indefinitely.

493. Sir David Manning advised Mr Blair on 16 February that Dr Blix's careful "fence sitting" in his report to the Security Council had:

> "… encouraged the wishful thinkers and procrastinators. For the moment, there is almost certainly a Security Council majority for letting the inspections run, not for moving to early military action."[132]

494. Sir David advised that it would be necessary "to go on making the argument that the issue is compliance. Our best bet may be to concede a little more time while issuing an ultimatum."

495. Sir David set out a proposal along the lines suggested by Mr Ricketts to Mr Straw, including a second resolution "stipulating that unless Blix reports on 14 March that Saddam is in full, unqualified, unequivocal compliance with 1441, he will be in further material breach". There would then be an immediate vote after Dr Blix reported.

[132] Minute Manning to Prime Minister, 16 February 2003, 'Iraq: Way Forward'.

496. Sir David suggested that, subject to advice from Sir Jeremy Greenstock, the UK might "spell out, either in the resolution or orally … that full compliance includes:

- explaining satisfactorily what happened to all the BW and CW unaccounted for when UNSCOM were forced out of Iraq in 1998;
- full and unfettered access to, and co-operation from […] who were allegedly involved in the destruction of Iraq's chemical stocks;
- full and unfettered access to, and co-operation from, all scientists UNMOVIC wished to interview both inside and outside Iraq, as provided for in UNSCR 1441."

497. Sir David added that those "conditions set the bar too high for compliance, yet are fundamental to it". Dr Blix would "find it hard to pretend otherwise, whatever marginal improvements Saddam may go on making on process as opposed to substance".

498. In tabling the resolution, the UK:

> "… should emphasise that we are giving the French the extra time they want; and we are taking Blix at his word … 'inspections could still be short if immediate, active and unconditional co-operation … were to be forthcoming'."

499. Sir David identified a number of disadvantages:

- The Americans will dislike it. As usual they are in a hurry. But the military timetable can be adjusted if necessary. It would probably mean action in the last few days of March i.e. after a vote on the second resolution on 15 March and a further 10 days for the Arabs to press Saddam to leave.
- Blix will dislike having to make a categoric judgement … We must draft the resolution so that he cannot equivocate and cannot honestly give a verdict of full compliance.
- The French … will work to block it. Their game is to string things out indefinitely …"

500. Sir David also identified the advantages:

- It gives us another month to find our secure nine votes. We can claim that we have been reasonable; four months on from 1441 no-one should seriously argue that it is impossible to tell if Saddam is complying. A deadline will also focus minds …
- We have another four weeks in which the inspectors just might get lucky. A real find would have a major impact on Security Council opinion …
- It will give Saddam four more weeks to make a mistake. He may do so, perhaps reacting badly if Blix announces later this week that the Iraqis must destroy their Al Samoud 2 missiles with their costly engines. If Saddam refuses to co-operate, it will be a glaring example of Iraqi non-compliance."

501. Sir David concluded that it was "impossible to be certain" that the strategy would work, "but it gives us a chance. The odds are against a successful second resolution at the end of February … an extra couple of weeks could make the difference."

502. Sir David advised "saying nothing" until after the European Council, allowing France a little more time, then hitting them with the draft resolution "probably in mid-week". Before that, Mr Blair would "need to do a heavy selling job" with President Bush.

503. Mr Blair agreed the proposals were worth exploring and asked for advice, particularly on the proposed "tests" for Iraq's compliance.

504. Mr Blair agreed that the ideas in Sir David Manning's advice of 16 February were worth exploring.[133] That is addressed later in this Section.

505. Mr Straw was told that President Bush believed Mr Blair would commit troops if the US took unilateral action.

506. Mr Straw discussed developments with Secretary Powell twice on 16 February.

507. In the first conversation at 1pm, Mr Straw set out his "emerging thinking", including the suggestion that a meeting might be held on 14 March at which Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei would be asked to report if Iraq was "actively and fully co-operating, perhaps against a checklist".[134] Mr Straw added that he thought that Dr Blix:

> "… would try to avoid responsibility for this. But whilst a further material breach and what we did about it were matters for the Security Council, saying whether Iraq was or was not co-operating had initially to be a matter for the inspectors since the information … was theirs. After all, it was Blix's statement … about further co-operation … on process which had put us on the back foot."

508. In a discussion about the content of any checklist, Mr Straw said that it was important it:

> "… did not become a 'tick in the box for compliance', but rather good evidence of compliance and it had to be very comprehensive, so that if he [Saddam Hussein] did all these things he was complying in reality."

509. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell agreed that if Saddam Hussein was faced with a choice, for example, of whether to destroy missile engines and the survival of his regime, he would choose the latter. Mr Straw added that:

> "… since the objective of HMG's policy was … the disarmament of Iraq's WMD if possible by peaceful means, clear and continuing evidence of Saddam's compliance on substance would be bound to negate the case for the UK's involvement in military action."

510. Secretary Powell was reported to have responded that he understood that:

"… but he was not sure that was where President Bush was. He might still be inclined to 'go it alone' for the removal of Saddam and the President believed that the Prime Minister would commit British troops in any event."

511. Mr Straw said that Mr Blair's "personal loyalty to the President was never in doubt; but that alone would not answer the question whether there was adequate legal and political justification for UK military involvement".

512. In response to Secretary Powell's comment that he assumed the demonstration on 15 February made a second resolution "even more necessary", Mr Straw replied:

"… yes. If there were nine votes or more in the Security Council for a second resolution, and this majority was subject to a veto by one only of the P5, I thought we could carry the day in the Commons and the country but there would have to be … clear evidence of substantive non-compliance by Iraq of 1441. Without the latter, we could have no chance. Regime change per se had never been the objective of HMG's strategy however desirable it was."

513. Mr Straw added that:

"… even with a second resolution (or a majority and a veto but good case) the political and public order consequences of the early stages of military action on current plans would be hard to handle: without a very strong case, consistent with our clear, already stated objectives, they could become unmanageable. Unless we were very lucky, military action without an effective international consensus could severely damage US as well as UK interests."

514. In a discussion of the timing for a second resolution, Mr Powell said he was still thinking about tabling a resolution that week but stating that a vote was not being asked for immediately. Mr Straw pointed out the disadvantages for the UK while Parliament was in recess, adding that tabling a resolution without any commitment for an early vote would be seen as a sign of weakness. It might also make it harder to secure the votes of the elected members of the Council. It might also be seen as ignoring the outcome of the inspectors' reports on 28 February.

515. In their second conversation at 8.30pm, following a conversation between Dr Blix and Secretary Powell, Mr Straw and Secretary Powell considered a list of particular issues which could be used to judge compliance.[135] Those need not be specified in the resolution but could include:

- the destruction of the Al Samoud 2 missiles;
- a push on interviews;
- control of road traffic;
- control of the Syrian pipeline; and
- legitimisation of existing No-Fly Zones and their potential extension to cover all of Iraq.

516. The bar would need to be set high enough to ensure that there really was compliance. Dr Blix had suggested a deadline of 15 April, which Secretary Powell said "would be difficult for the US", though it fitted with the deadline Mr Blair had "originally suggested".

517. Secretary Powell also suggested that there would be a presentational problem for President Bush if Saddam complied, and that "He would be unhappy publicly, but almost certainly relieved in private."

European Council, 17 February 2003

518. On behalf of the European Union, the Greek Presidency had delivered a demarche to Iraq on 4 February stating that it was "deeply concerned" about the crisis and that time was "running out". It called on Iraq "fully, unconditionally and immediately" to comply with all resolutions and to co-operate pro-actively with the inspectors. If Iraq did not comply, it would "carry the responsibilities for all the consequences".[136]

519. Mr Blair wrote to Mr Simitis,[137] other EU Heads of State and Government, Mr Romano Prodi, the President of the European Commission, and Mr Javier Solana, the Secretary General of the Council of the European Union, on 12 February, welcoming the decision to call an extraordinary European Council on 17 February and proposing that the 10 new EU Accession Partners and three candidate countries should also be invited "given their interests".[138]

520. Recognising that the debate would need to "take full account" of Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei's reports to the Security Council on 27 January and 14 February, Mr Blair set out a number of elements that "might form the basis for our debate and the conclusions we draw". Those included:

- Reaffirming the EU position agreed at the 27 January meeting of the General Affairs and External Relations Committee (GAERC), "particularly the full implementation of UNSCR 1441 to achieve the objective of Iraqi disarmament of all its WMD. Iraq must comply fully, actively, immediately and unconditionally with its international obligations".
- Clarity about the implications of resolution 1441. OP2 had given Iraq a final opportunity to comply: "But Saddam had not taken that opportunity. His false statements and omissions in the December declaration and failure to co-operate fully with the inspectors are a material breach of the resolution [OP4]". So, as OP13 made "explicit", Saddam faced "serious consequences".
- Military action was a last resort, but the Council "must make it clear that no Member State rules it out if needed to uphold the authority of the Security Council. We should also be clear that in the absence of full and immediate co-operation, the UNSC should move quickly to a second resolution."
- Maintaining and increasing the pressure on Saddam: "Time is now running very short. There is still a last opportunity for Saddam to co-operate unconditionally with the international community's demands or to leave. But failing that, we should be clear Saddam faces immediate and serious consequences."
- The EU should ensure it was ready to contribute to humanitarian and reconstruction issues.
- Addressing the regional implications of the crisis by "underlining … the importance we attach to early progress towards a lasting settlement between Israelis and Palestinians on the basis of the Road Map".

521. Mr Straw wrote to his Cabinet colleagues on 14 February, reiterating the point he had made in Cabinet on 6 February, about the importance of maintaining contacts with members of the Security Council in "the crucial period leading up to consideration of a new resolution on Iraq".[139] The position of the 10 elected Members of the Security Council (the E10)[140] would be crucial.

522. Mr Blair discussed Iraq, including the different expectations of what would constitute a material breach and the time required to bring people together and avoid further polarisation, with Mr Annan on 16 February.[141] Mr Blair said the time required was the time needed to "make a judgement on whether Iraq was co-operating".

523. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that, at the No.10 morning meeting on 17 February, Mr Blair "was keen on a major upgrade of our communications and believed we could win the argument as set out at the weekend".[142]

524. An extraordinary meeting of the European Council to discuss Iraq on 17 February pledged "full support" to Security Council efforts and to work with partners, "especially the United States", to disarm Iraq.

525. Mr Annan appealed for transatlantic unity and patient persuasive diplomacy behind closed doors. The UN would be seriously weakened if action was taken without its authority.

526. The discussion of Foreign Ministers addressed the objective of disarmament rather than regime change, the need for a second resolution whilst the inspections were continuing, the consequences of military action, and the role of the EU, its relationship with the US and its credibility.[143]

527. Mr Straw said:

> "… what was at stake was the future of multilateralism in a unipolar world. France emphasised the power of words but not the power of action. Europe was very multilateralist in decision-making but not so when it came to action. There were essentially three fundamental issues involved: Iraq remained a threat to international security; the only reason that inspections were taking place was because of military pressure on Saddam; and Iraq was not complying. The EU would not be having this discussion unless the US and the UK were willing to pay for this military build up and put their troops on the line. They could not stay there forever but that did not mean that events were being driven by a military timetable."

528. Mr Annan's address to the Council was reported as "uncompromising in putting the onus on Saddam to implement resolution 1441; and to implement it swiftly".[144] If the Security Council managed the current crisis successfully, it would emerge with its authority enhanced. But if it failed, and action was taken without its authority, the UN would be seriously weakened. If Iraq were allowed to defy the Security Council because the international community failed to impose itself, the foundations of collective security would be gravely undermined. An effective international security system depended on the Council and on its determination to take action in even the most difficult cases.

529. Mr Annan had appealed for transatlantic unity and patient persuasive diplomacy behind closed doors to build a common front. The greater the degree of consensus in dealing with Iraq, the greater the chance of resolving other crises, particularly Israel/Palestine.

530. In the discussion over dinner, Mr Blair said there were three issues at stake:

- The authority of the UN. That was set out in resolution 1441 passed after twelve years of Iraqi prevarication. The UN had made clear this was a final opportunity requiring full compliance. In neither the December declaration nor Dr Blix's reports to the Security Council in January and February was there any sign of full compliance on substance. If there were 100 percent Iraqi compliance, the inspectors could take as long as they needed. But the inspectors were not supposed to be a detective agency. Co-operation was key. If we were not careful we would be back in the situation we were in in the nineties.
- Iraq's WMD. There was no intelligence agency of any member state which did not know Iraq possessed these weapons. It was true that conflict meant bloodshed. But it was not true that the absence of conflict meant the absence of bloodshed. Thousands of Iraqis were dying under Saddam Hussein. Four million were in exile. The rate of Iraqi infant mortality in areas outside Saddam's control was a quarter of that in areas under Baghdad's rule.
- EU/US relations. Iraq had to be resolved in a way which met the objective of maintaining EU/US relations. That did not mean the EU had to do things simply because the US wanted. The way Europe handled Iraq would have profound implications for generations to come. The key was to ensure resolution 1441 was implemented. "The UN had to be the way of dealing with this issue, not a way of avoiding it."[145]

531. The Council statement agreed at the dinner left the decision on inspectors' time and resources to the UN Security Council and made it clear that immediate action was needed by Iraq.[146] It was seen by the media as more robust than expected.

532. The statement said that the European Council was "determined to deal effectively with the threat of proliferation of weapons of mass destruction"; and that it was "committed to the United Nations remaining at the centre of the international order". The European Council recognised that "the primary responsibility for dealing with Iraqi disarmament lies with the Security Council"; and it pledged its "full support". It wanted to achieve disarmament peacefully, and that was what the people of Europe wanted: "War is not inevitable. Force should only be used as a last resort. It is for the Iraqi regime to end this crisis …"

[146] Council of the European Union, 21 February 2003, Extraordinary European Council Brussels, 17 February 2003.

533. The European Council reiterated its:

> "… full support for the … work of the UN inspectors. They must be given the time and resources that the UN Security Council believes they need. However, inspections cannot continue indefinitely in the absence of full Iraqi co-operation. This must include the provision of all the additional and specific information on the issues that have been raised in the inspector's reports.
> "Baghdad should have no illusions … The Iraqi regime alone will be responsible for the consequences if it continues to flout the will of the international community and does not take this last chance."

534. The European Council would "work with Arab countries and The League of Arab Nations … to bring home to Saddam Hussein the extreme danger of miscalculation". It also reiterated "its firm belief in the need to invigorate the peace process in the Middle East and to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict".

535. The European Council concluded:

> "The unity of the international community is vital in dealing with these problems. We are committed to working with all our partners, especially the United States, for the disarmament of Iraq, for peace and stability in the region and for a decent future for all its people."

536. The UK had argued that the extraordinary meeting of the Council should have been extended to include Accession Partners and candidates to allow them to contribute fully to the debate.

537. After the Council, Mr Blair wrote to the Heads of State and Government of the Accession Partners and candidates setting out his impressions of the meeting. The letter concluded:

> "… it is essential that we keep the focus on Iraq and its obligation to disarm. This is a defining moment for the multilateral system. It calls for unity and unwavering determination on the part of the international community and, in particular, for solidarity between Europe and the United States …"[147]

538. The Partners and candidates subsequently agreed a statement supporting the outcome of the Council.[148]

539. In his monthly press conference the following day, Mr Blair made an opening statement setting out the "basic case" for the international community's response to Iraq.[149]

540. The points made by Mr Blair included:

- Saddam Hussein was "a threat" whose actions over the last 12 years made him unique.
- The stance taken by the world against Saddam was "not just vital in its own right", it was "a huge test of our seriousness in dealing with the twin threats of weapons of mass destruction and terrorism".
- If the UN was "to keep credibility, it must act to implement its stated will".
- It was "plain in our judgement that Saddam" continued to be "in breach". No country at the European Council had disputed that his co-operation was "neither unconditional nor complete".
- There was "no rush to war". It was "over three months" since Saddam Hussein had been given a final opportunity to comply. But without a change of heart, the inspectors were "never going to be able to play detective to search out weapons hidden in a country" the size of Iraq.
- The basis for action was disarmament.
- The demonstrators on 15 February had "a rightful hatred of the consequences of war", but they should "also listen to the voices of some of the four million Iraqi exiles". The nature of the regime could not itself provide justification for war, it could "at least show why if we do have to take military action, we do so in the sure knowledge that we are removing one of the most barbarous and detestable regimes in modern political history".
- People were against a war which they felt was "rushed or unnecessary" and wanted to know war was not inevitable. Saddam Hussein could avoid war if he co-operated fully and that was the "reasonable and easily delivered requirement" of the international community.

541. Asked if he reserved the right to go to war without a majority in the UN, Mr Blair stated that there were "certain situations in which you have simply got to say to people look this is what I believe and this is what I think is right". He added that there were "certain issues, particularly where there are issues of life and death, where I think the job and duty of the Prime Minister is to say to people what you honestly think, and then they have got to make up their minds".

542. Mr Blair subsequently stated that he did not believe that he would be in a position where there was no majority in the Security Council, and he did not want to indulge in speculation on that point.

[149] The National Archives, 19 February 2003, PM press conference 18 February transcript.

543. Asked about concerns that Washington was rushing unilaterally into action, Mr Blair responded that people who wanted "to pull Europe and America apart" were "playing the most dangerous game of international politics" he knew. That was "so dangerous for the security of the world". The US had listened to its allies and agreed to go through the UN to give Saddam Hussein a final chance to disarm. But having done that, if Saddam did not disarm, Mr Blair asked, "what prospect is there of persuading America in the future to go down the multilateral route if having taken that route we then just shy away from the consequences"?

544. Asked why public opinion was moving against action, Mr Blair replied that in relation to Kosovo and Afghanistan, there had been "a very immediate casus belli". It was "more difficult to persuade people of the link between a state like Iraq with chemical, or biological, or nuclear weapons and the link with international terrorism". It was his job to try to "persuade people of that, and also to persuade people of the moral case for removing Saddam".

545. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that "the plan was to consolidate" on the success at the European Council, and "restate the basic case and get going re Iraq exiles". In his meeting of the Iraq communications group on 18 February there was:

> "… a clear understanding that we were widening [the communications strategy] to take in the bigger dimension of the moral and humanitarian side, and we had to be clear about whether this was shifting to a regime change position. We had to be clear that it didn't, that the basic rationale hadn't changed, but equally we were entitled to make the case that the world would be better off without him [Saddam Hussein] in power."[150]

546. Mr Campbell also wrote:

> "The US was still giving out the message that it was going to happen and the rest was just giving us cover, eg saying that a second resolution wasn't absolutely necessary but they would try to get it. Maybe they were just getting irritated with us for having taken them down the UN route in the first place."

UK proposals for a draft second resolution

547. On 17 February, Sir David Manning had sent his advice to Mr Blair, of 16 February, to Mr Straw's Private Office and to Sir Michael Jay, FCO Permanent Under Secretary (PUS), Sir Jeremy Greenstock and Sir Richard Dearlove.[151] He wrote that Mr Blair had asked if they "could look particularly at the tests" suggested for Iraqi compliance.

548. Sir David asked:

- Were these the "right" tests?
- Were there others that could added?
- "Should the tests be included explicitly in a second resolution, or should this take the form of a short text simply stating that Saddam Hussein is in breach of 1441, while the conditions he must meet by 14 March are set out in an accompanying statement?"

549. Sir David asked for advice that day, stating that his letter and accompanying minute should be held "very tightly", handled "on a strictly need to know basis" and the addressees should "keep the papers off main files".

550. Sir David Manning spoke to Dr Rice before the EU Council on 17 February.[152]

551. In response to Dr Rice's report that, in a conversation with Dr Blix over the weekend, Dr Blix had "felt bad that he had given the Iraqis too much in his … presentation to the Security Council", Sir David said that Dr Blix had "overdone the course correction, worried by the reaction to his earlier presentation on 27 January".

552. Sir David told Dr Rice that Dr Blix "had hinted" to Mr Straw "that he might be in the market for an ultimatum" and they discussed his report which would summarise the outstanding disarmament questions. They also discussed whether the Security Council should instruct Dr Blix to destroy the Al Samoud missiles. Sir David commented that he "strongly favoured" that: "Saddam would hate having to do it and might be provoked into making a mistake."

553. Sir David said the UK was thinking about the shape and timing of an ultimatum:

> "We did not have nine votes in the Security Council at present, and were very unlikely to get there by 28 February … we needed time to shift three or four abstentions … If it became clear that we could win, we could hope the French would decide to abstain rather than veto. It was going to be a tough sell … Once the ultimatum was down, and the deadline was clear, the dynamics would change … We must take more time if we needed it."

554. In the subsequent discussion about how to increase the number of votes in favour of a resolution and whether, if there was a majority, France would abstain rather than veto, Dr Rice said that would be a "tough fight" in the US Administration about more time. She thought 8 March, "exactly four months" after the adoption of resolution 1441, might be better than 14 March as the French wanted. Sir David commented that he "saw the attraction", but: "We must take more time if we need it."

[152] Letter Manning to McDonald, 17 February 2003, 'Iraq: Conversation with Condi Rice'.

555. Sir David and Dr Rice discussed possible avenues to increase the diplomatic pressure on Saddam Hussein to leave. Dr Rice's view was that "there were still two possible outcomes to the crisis: Saddam could step down; or the Security Council would conclude that he was not complying with 1441 and that action must follow". They agreed it would be important to have a clear plan by the end of that week.

556. Sir David asked Sir Jeremy Greenstock to "sound out" Dr Blix about a possible visit to London "in the next few days" because Mr Blair "would like to see him, one on one, to discuss ideas about an ultimatum". He concluded that the evidence suggested Dr Rice's:

> "… thinking on the way forward is similar to ours. We shall have to think hard about whether to press for 14 rather than 8 March as the date for a vote … but at least Condi [Rice] has now moved away from 28 February. This is something the Prime Minister will want to discuss with Bush when they speak later this week."

557. Mr Blair spoke to Dr Blix on 20 February.

558. Separately, Mr Rycroft produced a list of possible elements for inclusion in an ultimatum, drawing on the provisions of resolution 1441:

- Full explanations of all the material unaccounted for in the last UNSCOM report, and answers to all of UNSCOM's questions.
- A full list of those involved in the destruction of old chemical weapons stocks, and full and unfettered access to them in interviews at the location of the inspectors' choice and without Iraqi government representatives.
- Similarly full co-operation over the interviews of any other witnesses called by the inspectors, inside or outside Iraq.
- Full co-operation over any exclusion zones declared by the inspectors.
- Full co-operation over the destruction of the Al Samoud rockets and all other material identified for destruction by the inspectors.[153]

559. Sir Richard Dearlove counselled against specifying the points on which Saddam Hussein should comply; there was "ample evidence" that he was not, and had no intention of, complying. There was no guarantee that inspections would produce conclusive physical evidence.

560. Sir Richard Dearlove stated that, in his view, the best course would be to stick with a short text stating that Saddam Hussein was not complying with, and was therefore in breach of, resolution 1441, backed by the available evidence that that was the case.[154] Listing the points on which we wanted Saddam Hussein to comply would undermine the overarching argument of resolution 1441 that it was Saddam Hussein, not the international community, who must do the work of disarmament. The UK should avoid further moves which perpetuated an inversion of roles. Setting Saddam Hussein an agenda would allow him to be seen to be making efforts to comply and therefore to be co-operating with the UN; and that it would be difficult to act on a deadline if Saddam Hussein was seen still to be co-operating.

[154] Letter Dearlove to Manning, 17 February 2003, 'Iraq: The Way Forward'.

561. Sir Richard also wrote that there was ample evidence, including from Dr Blix, that Iraq was not, and had no intention of, complying. Given the resources Saddam Hussein had available to thwart inspections, and the scale of the task of uncovering something "truly damning", there was no guarantee that the inspections would produce conclusive physical evidence.

562. Sir Jeremy Greenstock advised that the US would have difficulty with any language which renegotiated resolution 1441 or changed the legal basis for the use of force; and that there were difficulties in identifying concrete tests which did not go beyond the resolution.

563. Sir Jeremy questioned whether the material was available to convince the majority of the Security Council that the end of the road had been reached.

564. Sir Jeremy Greenstock discussed the way ahead with Dr Blix and, separately, Ambassador Negroponte on 17 February, including informal ideas for an ultimatum.[155]

565. Sir Jeremy told Dr Blix that the UK remained committed to disarmament by peaceful means and to a second resolution. But the UK "wanted to force the issue in the next four weeks"; and that there might be less time if the US "baulked".

566. Sir Jeremy reported that Dr Blix had "noted that it was amazing that, in all their inspections, UNMOVIC had found no WMD except the (empty) chemical warheads". Dr Blix had also commented that nothing had been found in the sites suggested by the US: "If they had come close there would at least have been a denial of access."

567. In response, the UK had "underlined the sophistication of the Iraqi deception regime – we were confident in our intelligence while some information, e.g. on BW production, was corroborated by a variety of sources"; and that "given the Iraq deception mechanism, the key thing was co-operation".

568. Sir Jeremy also reported that Ambassador Negroponte "showed interest in an ultimatum process with concrete tests", but he foresaw problems with Washington. The UK should not propose language which renegotiated 1441 or changed the legal basis for the use of force.

569. Reflecting further discussions with the US Mission in New York on 17 February, Sir Jeremy subsequently reported that:

- It was proving difficult to define concrete disarmament tasks with the information available and which did not go further than the resolutions required.
- It would be better if the benchmarks came from Dr Blix. The "key" would be "that they forced either Iraq to reveal its lie or the Council to come to a conclusion that Iraq was failing to co-operate".
- The US Mission still favoured a simple "serious consequences" resolution with a vote by a certain date (or abandon the exercise altogether) if Iraq had not radically changed its approach.[156]

570. Sir Jeremy advised that he remained of the view that we should put forward a resolution sooner rather than later to move the debate on. That could include a list of benchmarks discussed with Dr Blix, but he could also see the attractions of tabling a resolution now which simply called for disarmament, leaving Dr Blix or the middle-ground members of the Council to seek to define concrete actions. That would tie the US into the process. Delay risked appearing to be on the back foot, "uncertainty about our/the Council's intentions, perhaps reducing the likelihood that Iraq will realise the game is up and surrender its WMD (or ditch Saddam)".

571. The telegram also made clear that Sir Jeremy had commented to Ambassador Negroponte that "perhaps we just did not possess the material to convince others that we were right to claim it was the end of the road".

572. The UK Mission in New York offered suggested elements for a resolution which reflected discussions with Dr Blix.

573. The UK Permanent Mission to the UN in New York provided a paper overnight on 17/18 February setting out possible elements for a new ultimatum strategy.[157] It pointed out that resolution 1441 had used words like "active" and "unconditional" without defining them, and referred to a "final opportunity" for "immediate" co-operation without specifying how long that should take.

574. Addressing whether co-operation had been immediate, the UK Mission stated:

- "On the whole there has been great promptness of response", and co-operation on process had been "without delays or foot dragging".
- Co-operation on substance could "hardly be said" to have been "active", although "a few recent measures" could be, "provided their potential usefulness is borne out by real results".

- Iraq had appointed two Commissions, one to look for any remaining proscribed items and one to look for any relevant documentation. A third Iraqi initiative had been the provision of a list of personnel who had taken part in the destruction of proscribed chemical items in 1991.
- The Iraqi papers presented at the meeting in Baghdad on 8 to 9 February were spontaneous and "focused on central issues, but without any new evidence".
- Iraq claimed it was encouraging "persons to come for 'private' interviews In Baghdad", but there was doubt that they "really feel they can talk freely". Interviews outside Iraq were "certainly an option", but raised "difficult issues".

575. The UK Mission asked:

> "If it seems clear that many governments feel that enough time has not yet been given for the option of disarmament through inspection, how much further time, would they ask for inspections … before they give up on this option and how 'active' should Iraq be required to be?
> "It does not seem unreasonable to hold that 11 weeks of inspections, which have barely come up to full strength, and which come after a period of eight years of inspections between 1991 and 1998 and four years of non-inspections between the end of 1998 and November 2002, is a rather short period to allow a final conclusion that the disarmament requirements cannot be fulfilled through this method. What is clear … is that military and political pressure has been and remains indispensable to bring about compliance. A slackening of it would, in all likelihood, result in less co-operation."

576. The UK Mission proposed that, in the circumstances, an "explicit time line within which satisfactory co-operation and the required resolution of unresolved disarmament issues (or 'key remaining disarmament tasks') would be demanded", would "not seem unreasonable". Addressing how long would be needed, it stated:

> "Under resolution 1284 (1999) 120 days were thought to be a time frame within which 'progress' on key remaining disarmament tasks would be. It is evidently a question of political judgement how much time should now be given under resolution 1441 (2002). However, a time frame should not be set without any regard to what may be achievable …"

577. Addressing who would judge "whether there has been co-operation and disarmament", the UK Mission stated:

> "In the last resort the Security Council must provide the answer, but it seems likely that the Council would need to rely on a prior assessment by UNMOVIC and the IAEA."

578. Both questions were "very broad" and judgements would be easier if there were "some particular actions" or "benchmarks" which could be identified as "indispensable but not conclusive". Similarly, the extent of disarmament "could perhaps be judged on the basis of progress noted on some key issues (as was specified in resolution 1284 (1999)) rather than the whole catalogue of issues". Although some of the measures required might not be possible, because of lack of documents or witnesses, "it would probably be possible to see whether Iraq provided active, genuine co-operation to solve the issues rather than dragging its feet and be evasive".

579. The UK Mission provided an illustrative text for a draft resolution, including a request that UMOVIC and the IAEA submit a list of unresolved disarmament issues and questions "by [1 March] … indicating which, in their view are key points, and what … Iraq should do to solve these issues and to answer these questions". The draft left open the date by which UNMOVIC and the IAEA would be asked to submit a report with their judgement on whether the issues and questions had been resolved and Iraq had fulfilled its obligations.

Mr Blair's conversation with President Bush, 19 February 2003

580. Mr Straw and Mr Blair discussed the way ahead before a telephone call with President Bush. As result, the FCO produced an illustrative list of benchmarks which Dr Blix could be encouraged to propose alongside a "simple draft resolution" declaring Saddam Hussein to be in breach of resolution 1441.

581. Sir David Manning told Dr Rice on 18 February that the European Council had "gone well" and that the "emphasis had been on the need for Saddam's swift and full compliance" with resolution 1441: "Recourse to force, once other options were exhausted had been conceded albeit reluctantly in the usual quarters."[158]

582. Sir David and Dr Rice discussed the next steps, including the nature of a second resolution declaring simply that Saddam was in violation of resolution 1441; the possibility of a vote after Dr Blix's next report to the Security Council and the advantages and risks of setting rigorous benchmarks requiring total compliance to judge Saddam's performance.

583. Sir David told Dr Rice that Mr Blair's preference was for a vote on 14 March. That:

> "… had the advantage of playing to the date proposed by the French. But it also gave us a precious extra few days to secure nine votes. In the end this was what it was about. We had to fashion our ultimatum and choose our timing to give ourselves the very best chance of getting the necessary majority … this was critically important for us politically."

584. Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that the UK needed a second resolution, and that "everything now had to be subordinate to that".[159] He suggested setting Iraq

"benchmarks" for co-operation by "filleting" Dr Blix's paper. If the benchmarks were set high and Saddam Hussein co-operated, the US and UK would have "won by a different route". Although Secretary Powell had reservations about including benchmarks in a second resolution, they agreed that Sir Jeremy Greenstock and Ambassador Negroponte should discuss a list with Dr Blix.

585. In response to a request for advice in preparation for Mr Blair's discussion with President Bush, Sir David Manning wrote that:

- Mr Blair should seek to secure President Bush's agreement to delay a vote in the Security Council until 14/15 March to provide "a few, precious extra days … [which] might make the difference to securing the critical nine votes".
- The second resolution should be "very simple, declaring Saddam in violation/ breach of [resolution] 1441 – without specifying what happens or when". That should be accompanied by tough tests "agreed with Blix if possible" which Saddam Hussein would have to pass "in full". Sir David wrote that Saddam Hussein "almost certainly won't comply. If he does, we've won anyway"; the tests should "stick to what is stipulated in resolution 1441 and to the general disarmament categories, otherwise Saddam will play games"; and that the UK would be looking for "yes/no answers" from Dr Blix.
- There would also be a much better chance of gaining support for the resolution if it was clear that the UN would have a "key role" after any military action and that a "massive humanitarian aid programme" would be instituted; and by publishing and implementing the Road Map on Israel/Palestine before any military action. Sir David advised that both points would be a "tough sell" with President Bush, but "both are very important in helping us to win the argument".[160]

586. Following a discussion between Mr Blair and Mr Straw, Mr Ricketts sent Sir David Manning an illustrative list of benchmarks, which Dr Blix could be encouraged "to propose alongside a simple draft resolution".[161] Mr Straw recommended allowing a few days before tabling the draft resolution early the following week.

587. Mr Ricketts wrote that Dr Blix had "spoken about selecting benchmarks from the list of unresolved disarmament issues which UNMOVIC has drawn up (the cluster document)"; and that it would "not be easy to circulate the cluster document before 1 March".

588. Mr Ricketts suggested the UK could propose its own benchmarks as a way to get Dr Blix to focus quickly. The illustrative list covered biological weapons, chemical weapons, ballistic missiles, documentation and unrestricted interviews with key personnel.

[161] Letter Ricketts to Manning, 18 February 2003, 'Iraq: The Way Forward in the Security Council'.

589. In his memoir, Dr Blix recorded that he had finalised his ideas about how UNMOVIC's work on clusters might be used on 17 February, producing both a draft resolution and a background paper which he gave to Sir Jeremy Greenstock.[162] Sir Jeremy gave the documents to the Americans.

590. Explaining his thinking that inspections offered Iraq "an opportunity that was not open endlessly" and that it was "for the Council – but not individual members of it – to consider and decide on the alternative to inspections", Dr Blix wrote that military pressure "was and remained indispensable to bringing about Iraqi compliance" but:

> "… many delegations felt that not enough time had yet been given to inspections; eleven weeks was rather a short time to allow the final conclusion that disarmament could not be achieved through the inspection path and would have to be abandoned. It would not seem unreasonable … to set 'an explicit time line' within which satisfactory co-operation and resolution of unresolved disarmament issues and key remaining disarmament tasks would be demanded. It was a political judgement … to decide how much time would be given.
> "It would be for the Security Council to judge – after a report by the inspectors – whether there had been adequate co-operation and resulting disarmament …
> "My draft requested that UNMOVIC/IAEA submit by 1 March a list of 'key points' … along with indications of what Iraq should do to resolve them (the benchmarks). It further spelled out a number of demands for Iraqi actions … It requested UNMOVIC/IAEA to report to the Council before a specific date … whether Iraq had done what was asked of it. Lastly, it stipulated that if the Security Council were to conclude that Iraq had not fulfilled what was demanded and thus had 'not made use of the inspection process,' the inspections would be terminated and the Council would 'consider other measures to solve the disarmament issue'."

591. Sir Christopher Meyer advised that there was no agreed position within the US Administration about how to work on a second resolution and UK views were best registered directly with President Bush.

592. Sir Christopher Meyer advised that the US Administration was still debating the timing and contents of a second resolution and that there was no agreed interagency position on how best to work with Dr Blix on a second resolution.[163]

593. There was concern about Dr Blix's reluctance to press Iraq on mobile biological weapons facilities, because the "knowledge" of those facilities came from intelligence, which "appeared to put the onus on the US/UK to prove these existed rather than on Iraq to reassure the Council that they did not"; and that he might have lost sight of the fact that Iraq's co-operation on process was not synonymous with disarmament.

594. The US Principals were minded to see benchmarks as a record of what Iraq had not done, rather than a headline list of what Saddam Hussein should do.

595. Sir Christopher also advised that the UK's views were "best registered directly by the Prime Minister" with President Bush.

596. Mr Blair sent President Bush a six-page Note on 19 February.

597. Mr Blair proposed focusing on the absence of full co-operation and a "simple" resolution stating that Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity, with a side statement defining tough tests of co-operation and a vote on 14 March to provide a deadline for action.

598. Mr Hoon was not consulted about the approach to be adopted.

599. Mr Blair sent President Bush a six-page Note on 19 February.[164]

600. Mr Blair stated that it was "a defining moment in EU/US relations and in the future direction of Europe". He wrote that it was "apparent to me from the EU summit that France wants to make this a crucial test: is Europe America's partner or competitor? … For the first time … a strong bloc prepared to challenge France and Germany" was emerging.

601. Mr Blair wrote that "European public opinion seemed to favour France" and that was being used "to embarrass the pro-US case, to inhibit the pro-US leaders". Those leaders had been:

> "… remarkably firm in the face of really difficult polls and demonstrations.
> "But the issue will be this: is it the US that is forced to go it alone with the UK, or is it France that is left isolated with a choice as to whether to use its veto?
> "That is in turn a function of where public opinion is outside … the US."

602. Mr Blair added that was "far more nuanced than people think". In his view, public opinion outside the US was:

> "… not against conflict in all circumstances. What they fear is that we are hell bent on war, come what may, that we don't really want the UN to succeed."

603. Mr Blair wrote that fear was "absurd":

> "The issue of time for the inspections has become vicariously, the focus for this sentiment. At the heart of this is a confusion between active and passive co-operation. The duty on Saddam is to co-operate fully; ie actively to help the Inspectors. If he isn't he's in breach. But the France/Germany view – too much shared by others on the Security Council – is that the inspectors should have > the time they need to "sniff out" the weapons … and all Saddam needs to do is to offer passive co-operation, ie the absence of obstruction. Obviously if this is right, they could be there for months or years."

604. Mr Blair added:

> "Our view, which is correct is that time is irrelevant unless he [Saddam] is co-operating fully and actively. If he isn't, the time needed is just the time necessary to make a judgement as to his co-operation: is it full or not? And actually, no one … is seriously suggesting Saddam is co-operating fully."

605. Mr Blair wrote that Dr Blix "unfortunately" embodied that confusion. His report to the Security Council on 14 February "never suggested there was full co-operation; indeed the opposite". But the tone "seemed to imply that because Saddam was co-operating more on process, that was an improvement despite the fact that there was no co-operation on substance".

606. Mr Blair reported that recent conversations with Dr Blix showed that he was "aware of this problem, and is prepared to countenance a definitive judgement and was shocked at how negatively for the US/UK his report was spun". Mr Blair added: "My faith in Blix is somewhat shaken. But he remains key."

607. Mr Blair suggested:

> "… the trick we need to take is this: we have to find a way of re-focusing the issue on the absence of full co-operation … and do so in a way that pulls public opinion and the UNSC waverers back to us by showing that we have indeed made every effort to avoid war."

608. Mr Blair proposed that the US and UK should:

- Put down a new resolution "soon, probably early next week". That resolution would be "simple and clear and as easy to vote for as we can make it".
- Put the resolution "to a vote on 14 March, the date France has suggested for a [Security Council] meeting of Foreign Ministers". That would then become "the deadline for action".
- "At the same time" the resolution was tabled, there would be a side statement defining the categories of full co-operation: "full disclosure of the 1998 leftovers; witnesses interviewed outside Iraq; destruction of the rocket motors etc". That should be "sufficient if he did it, to amount to a complete and total capitulation by Saddam". That was "the ultimatum".

609. Mr Blair wrote that he would be speaking to Dr Blix the following day to try to "tie" him in "to accept this is indeed what must happen".

610. Mr Blair continued that the UK and US should say that:

> "… failure in any respect to meet this test, will amount to non-co-operation; that this is a final attempt by us to disarm Saddam peacefully; that by 14 March it will be 4 months since 1441, quite long enough to assess whether he is co-operating or not.
> "We work like crazy next week to get the UNSC members to agree or at least not oppose this strategy; and then build the support to carry a majority for 14 March."

611. Mr Blair recognised that there were both advantages and disadvantages in his proposed approach. The disadvantages were identified as:

- The risk that Saddam Hussein "might conceivably comply fully – but the chances of this, according to all the intelligence are minimal". If he did comply, "it would still amount to a huge humiliation [to Saddam Hussein]".
- Saddam Hussein might "seem" to comply but that was "a risk in any event and by defining non-compliance so clearly" the "chances of ambiguity" would be minimised.
- The start of military action might be delayed by a week: "But this is not long and the blunt truth is that by next Friday i.e. 28 February or even a week later … the chances of securing nine votes are very slim. A week's wait is worth a resolution; or at least a majority on the UNSC."

612. Mr Blair saw the advantages as:

- putting the US and UK "back in the driving seat, with a clear deadline and ultimatum";
- re-focusing the "debate where it should be" on Iraq's duty "fully to co-operate";
- giving the "doubters a reason to sign up";
- helping "the Arab world come on board";
- accepting the French date;
- allowing the US and UK to "show the world we are going to war, not because we want to, but because we have to"; and
- "Above all":
  - show "the US reaching out";
  - set "the UN a fundamental test";
  - give the Europeans something to rally round; and
  - "When we do act, it will show we went the last mile for peace."

613. Mr Blair told President Bush:

> "A successful second resolution would be an enormous success for your diplomacy over the last few months.

> "I have never come across an issue in which the dividing line between overwhelming support and overwhelming opposition is so slender."

614. Mr Blair added that, in the UK, which was "reasonably typical of European opinion", "large majorities" believed:

- Saddam Hussein was "a threat and needs disarming";
- "without the threat of action, he wouldn't disarm"; and
- "in military action if there is a new UN resolution or even without a resolution if we had a majority of the UNSC … ie France would veto and we could still do it."

615. Mr Blair wrote: "Around 80 percent" in the UK supported an ultimatum and acknowledged that inspections could only work if Saddam co-operated. Yet a majority opposed action at that time. The "only explanation" was that:

> "… they needed to be persuaded that the US and UK would prefer peaceful disarmament if that were possible. Proving it isn't possible is the huge benefit of the ultimatum route."

616. Finally, Mr Blair offered "two further thoughts":

- "Publishing the MEPP Road Map would have a massive impact in Europe and the Arab world."
- There was a "need to start firming up the humanitarian work for the aftermath of the conflict … and show how we will protect and improve the lives of Iraqi people."

617. Mr Campbell wrote that the Note had set out the basic strategy: "that we put down a UNSCR, not to push to a vote, instead use it like an ultimatum, give him two weeks or so to take us to the French date of 14 March."[165]

618. In their discussion at lunchtime on 19 February, Mr Straw and Secretary Powell discussed the fact that Dr Blix was "not yet ready to say that Iraq was not co-operating on substance" and the difficulties of agreeing a list of tests with him that "set the bar satisfactorily high".[166]

619. Sir David Manning spoke to Dr Rice before the phone call between Mr Blair and President Bush on 19 February to explain the UK's thinking. He reported that he had "emphasised yet again that … It was critical to give ourselves enough time to secure nine votes."[167]

620. Sir David had also addressed in some detail the importance of a US commitment to the Road Map, for the MEPP.

621. Mr Straw spoke twice to Secretary Powell on the evening of 19 February.[168]

622. Mr Straw continued to press for the draft resolution to be tabled after the weekend, not before, and for a vote to take place on 14 March. He and Secretary Powell also discussed the text of the resolution, benchmarks and a possible ultimatum to Saddam Hussein telling him to leave. Mr Straw commended Sir Jeremy Greenstock's language in the draft resolution, stating that the Council "decides the final opportunity has not been taken" and talking more about Saddam Hussein's obligation for "voluntary disarmament".

623. In the context of conversations with Palestinian and Israeli representatives, Mr Straw repeated the imperative for publication of the Road Map to secure Arab support for action on Iraq.

624. President Bush and Mr Blair agreed to introduce a draft resolution at the UN the following week but its terms were subject to further discussion.

625. Mr Blair telephoned President Bush later on 19 February.[169] They discussed the positions of France, Germany and Russia and key regional countries. Mr Blair said it was "a defining moment".

626. Mr Blair repeated the arguments that the resolution and ultimatum route would help to demonstrate that the US and UK did not want war but were prepared to use force if that was the only way to disarm Saddam Hussein. Addressing the question of whether disarmament should be defined for Dr Blix and if identifying tasks for Saddam Hussein would allow Saddam Hussein to do some and try to show he was co-operating, Mr Blair said that, when the resolution was tabled, "we should set out the issues that were part of full co-operation".

627. Mr Blair and President Bush agreed the resolution would be introduced at the UN the following week.

628. Mr Blair also set out the reasons for a vote around 14 March. It would be important for No.10 and the White House to remain in close contact on communications. Mr Blair said that the resolution and ultimatum route would "help us to demonstrate that we did not want war but were prepared to use force if that was the only way to disarm Saddam".

629. Finally, Mr Blair underlined the importance of progress on the MEPP to help transform opinion in Europe and the Arab world.

630. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair told President Bush that we couldn't dispute public opinion was against us but he strongly felt that the French and Germans were in the right place for public opinion but in the wrong place for the world.[170]

631. President Bush wrote in his memoir that, in his Note of 19 February, Mr Blair had "urged that we forge ahead" and that he had written: "The stakes are now much higher". Mr Blair had also written that it was "apparent" to him "from the EU Summit that France wants to make this a crucial test: Is Europe America's partner or competitor?", and that there was support for the US from a strong European coalition.[171]

JIC Assessment, 19 February 2003: 'Southern Iraq: What's in store?'

At the request of the Cabinet Office Overseas and Defence Secretariat, the JIC produced an Assessment on 19 February of the situation in southern Iraq and what might happen there before, during and after any coalition military action.[172]

The Assessment and Mr Blair's request for further advice are addressed in Sections 6.2 and 6.5.

Security Council open debate, 18 and 19 February 2003

632. An open debate of the Security Council requested by the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) was held on 18 and 19 February.[173] The debate gave the Security Council the opportunity to hear the views of non-members.

633. Sixty UN Member States or Permanent Observers spoke in the debate, the overwhelming majority opposing the use of force. The members of the Security Council did not speak. Ms Louise Fréchette, UN Deputy Secretary-General, attended the debate, but did not speak.

634. Mr Dumisani Kumalo, South African Permanent Representative to the UN, speaking on behalf of the NAM, said that NAM members considered resolution 1441 to be "about ensuring that Iraq is peacefully disarmed". The Security Council was yet to "fully utilize the inspection mechanisms of resolution 1441".

635. Mr Aldouri stated that the United States had transformed a "technical and scientific issue" into a "political" one, and reaffirmed Iraq's commitment to "full and active co-operation with UNMOVIC and the IAEA".

636. Mr Paul Heinbecker, Canadian Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that, since the withdrawal of inspectors in 1998, there had been "no proof" that Iraq had rid itself of WMD. There were reasons to believe the opposite was the case. Recent Iraqi co-operation had only come in response to intense international pressure. More time for inspectors could be useful, but only if Iraq decided to co-operate "fully, actively and transparently, beginning now".

637. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that the debate had been a "necessary exercise" which had been organised by Germany (as President of the Council).[174] "Almost all" Member States who had spoken "expressed a preference for a peaceful outcome, but almost all stressed the need for better Iraqi compliance".

Deployment of South African scientists to Baghdad

When Mr Blair met Mr Thabo Mbeki, the South African President, at Chequers on 1 February, they had three hours of private talks.[175]

On Iraq, the readout from the discussions was that Mr Blair had "debriefed" Mr Mbeki on his talks with Washington and set out the UK position "in normal terms". Mr Mbeki told Mr Blair that Mr Tariq Aziz, the Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister, "had asked South Africa to send a team to Iraq to advise on how disarmament should be done". Mr Blair "commented that there was not much doubt about what Iraq should do".

Mr Aziz Pahad, the South African Deputy Foreign Minister, told the British High Commission that, following his visit to Baghdad from 9 to 13 February, where he had had meetings with Saddam Hussein, Mr Tariq Aziz and others, South Africa would be sending a team of apartheid-era scientists to advise Iraq on disarmament.[176]

Mr Pahad said that he had delivered the message that Iraq must comply fully with resolution 1441, and the time for compliance was running out. Subsequently he added that he had urged full rather than partial co-operation; this was "an all or nothing" decision.

Mr Pahad's assessment was reported to be that:

- Iraqi attitudes were slowly shifting;
- the inspectors to whom he had spoken had noticed and reported this mood change;
- those in favour of co-operation might be "winning out"; and
- the resolution of the U2 over flights issue was "major progress".

Mr Pahad said South Africa's objective was to prevent war by ensuring the success of weapons inspections. A team of experts would be sent to Iraq "imminently". They would not have direct contact with the UN inspectors, "but would be proactive in helping Iraq to co-operate and demonstrate this co-operation".

Mr Pahad added that the initiative gave Iraq "the possibility of a face-saving climb-down … if Saddam seriously rushed to comply".

The British High Commission commented that Mr Pahad was "cautiously optimistic that South Africa might be able to help resolve the current stand-off in Iraq", but was "realistic about the obstacles" that remained.

Mr Blair's conversation with Dr Blix, 20 February 2003

638. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told Dr Blix that the Security Council had to realise that if it was not willing to authorise force if Iraq did not disarm, the issue would be taken out of its hands.

639. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told Dr Blix on 19 February that the UK was likely to go for an approach "signalling the end game on Iraq".[177] The UK "would say that the Council had to realise that this would be out of the hands of the UN unless it decided that Iraq had to start the process of real disarmament and was willing to authorise force if it did not". The UK "still hoped to avert the use of force – but we had to be realistic".

640. Sir Jeremy reported that Dr Blix was not averse to a deadline but 15 March was "not theoretically doable". He concluded that the "Blix benchmark possibilities" had been "tested" and "set aside as too risky".

641. Sir Jeremy also reported that Dr Blix had said he would issue a decision on missiles to Iraq within 24 hours; and that UNMOVIC had "just received an 'amazingly' detailed document on the persons involved in the destruction of biological weapons which could be significant". The meeting of the College of Commissioners for UNMOVIC on 24 and 25 February would discuss the "clusters" document. Dr Blix expected it to be finalised by 3 March, but he did not intend to submit it to the Security Council; it "was an exercise to help UNMOVIC define the key remaining disarmament tasks due under 1284 – but would do so if asked".

642. Sir Jeremy commented that the UK was "likely to say that, if Iraq did not rapidly demonstrate it was engaging in voluntary disarmament, this document was academic".

643. Mr Blair told Dr Blix that he wanted to offer the US an alternative strategy which included a deadline and tests for compliance. He did not think Saddam would co-operate but he would try to get Dr Blix as much time as possible.

644. Dr Blix stated that full co-operation was a nebulous concept; and a deadline of 15 April would be too early.

645. Mr Blair telephoned Dr Blix on 20 February.[178] They spoke for 45 minutes.

[178] Letter Cannon to Owen, 20 February 2003, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Conversation with Blix'.

646. The record of the discussion stated that Mr Blair referred to US disappointment with Dr Blix's report of 14 February and that it was "now difficult to dissuade the Americans from going down the military route". Mr Blair told Dr Blix that he was concerned about the risk of the UN being marginalised and of a split in the international community; and that he wanted to offer the US "an alternative strategy".

647. Mr Blair outlined the need to devise an ultimatum including a deadline and imposing a duty on Saddam Hussein to co-operate actively; and that failure to do so would be a breach of resolution 1441. That would accompany a "simple" resolution that would be Saddam Hussein's "final final" warning. There were "some indications" that, with a second resolution, "the Arabs might be able to lever Saddam out of power". Mr Blair added that co-operation would need to be defined and Saddam Hussein would need to comply in full.

648. Dr Blix was attracted by timelines but commented that "full co-operation was a nebulous concept". Later he stated that demands for co-operation had to be related to what was "realistically do-able".

649. Dr Blix told Mr Blair that the UN should have a catalogue of the action required on disarmament by the end of the following week. He should be able to share the "clusters" of unanswered questions with the UNMOVIC College of Commissioners by 24 February. The intelligence he had received was "not all that compelling". While he still tended to think that Iraq was concealing some WMD, he needed evidence to put to the Security Council. He was receiving "a flow of half promises" on Iraqi co-operation and needed more time.

650. Mr Blair said that the Iraqis could have signalled a change of heart in the December declaration. The Americans did not think that Saddam Hussein was going to co-operate: "Nor did he. But we needed to keep the international community together."

651. Dr Blix suggested that "key disarmament tasks" could be selected from resolution 1284 as it would be easier to judge compliance on those. They discussed the difficulties with interviewing Iraqis, which Dr Blix said he would be working on the following week. It was important to keep the pressure on Iraq.

652. Dr Blix confirmed that he had suggested a deadline of 15 April to the US, which they thought was too late. He thought it was too early. The threat of war was making it difficult to recruit and retain inspectors.

653. Mr Blair told Dr Blix that he would pursue the ultimatum route and try to get Dr Blix as much time as possible.

654. Dr Blix commented that "perhaps there was not much WMD in Iraq after all". Mr Blair responded that "even German and French intelligence were sure that there was WMD in Iraq". Dr Blix said they seemed "unsure" about mobile BW production facilities:

"It would be paradoxical and absurd if 250,000 men were to invade Iraq and find very little."

655. Mr Blair responded: "our intelligence was clear that Saddam had reconstituted his WMD programme".

656. The record stated that Dr Blix had "concluded that he accepted the need for timelines and benchmarks".

657. In his account of the conversation, Dr Blix wrote that he had said:

> "Only at three sites to which we had gone on the basis of intelligence had there been any result at all.
> "Personally I tended to think that Iraq still concealed weapons of mass destruction, but I needed evidence. Perhaps there were not many such weapons in Iraq after all."[179]

658. After the conversation between Mr Blair and Dr Blix, Sir David Manning told Dr Rice that while Dr Blix had understood the key point that Iraq was not co-operating fully with the UN, it was "equally clear that he was not ready to say so to the Security Council".[180] The need was therefore to keep him focused on this question of co-operation and "persuade him that the logic of the situation was that we should now issue an ultimatum". Dr Blix would need to decide whether "he was going to be a party to the pretence that Iraq was co-operating with the UN system when, in fact, Saddam's defiance risked wrecking it".

659. Sir David also recorded US/UK agreement to table a second resolution on 24 February and the UK's preference for the "very light" resolution proposed by Sir Jeremy Greenstock. There would be a need to prepare the launch carefully with members of the E10 and potential allies in the Security Council.

660. Asked about his response to Dr Blix's comment about the implications of invading Iraq and finding "very little", Mr Blair told the Inquiry that he had told Dr Blix: "What you have to tell us is … whether he is complying with the resolution. Is he giving immediate compliance and full compliance or not?" Dr Blix's answer was: "No, but, you never know, it may be that, if we are given more time, he will."[181]

661. Mr Blair added that the conversation had led to him working with Dr Blix "to try and get a fresh … resolution. I kept working on that right up until the last moment."

662. Sir Richard Dearlove's Private Secretary advised Sir David Manning on 20 February that the "chances of a successful inspection are increasingly slim".[182] SIS had sent messages to its best placed sources "emphasising the utmost importance of a major find in the next two weeks, and asking them to do everything possible to try and identify where materials or papers being hidden". The chances of a potential defector were "not encouraging".

663. An internal FCO minute of the Iraq morning meeting on 20 February recorded that the UK was "now moving away from the idea of benchmarks from Dr Blix, given US concerns … and the difficulty of coming up with anything specific enough".[183]

664. The FCO instructions for Dr Bryan Wells, MOD Director Counter-Proliferation and Arms Control and UK representative on the UNMOVIC College of Commissioners, for the discussion of the "clusters document", stated that it was important that he did:

> "… nothing which suggests the UK endorses the document, or even accepts the validity of proceeding with work against the SCR 1284 timetable in present circumstances. That is not to say that we regard … 1284 as invalid. But it must now be viewed in the light of SCR 1441, which requires Iraq to co-operate 'immediately, unconditionally and actively' with the inspectors. We see no point in proceeding with work mandated by … 1284 so long as such co-operation is lacking."[184]

665. The FCO added: "We realise that this will not be an easy line to take. It may in the event be best simply to say that the paper appears irrelevant in present circumstances of Iraqi non-co-operation, and then decline to engage on the substance."

666. The FCO also wrote that it realised the position might "annoy" Dr Blix, and UKMIS New York was asked to forewarn him of the UK's likely approach, and to:

> "… explain our concern that the … document may be exploited by some countries as an excuse to postpone a further decision on the fundamental issue of Iraqi co-operation … thereby undermining the pressure on Baghdad."

667. The letter showed that the initial view of officials had been that the document "could be played into the long grass" as "no more than an internal piece of UNMOVIC work-in-progress"; and that "As such there should be no question of it being presented to the Security Council." But there were suggestions that others might present it "as a set of benchmarks" which could be used to "focus the Council's attention on the middle distance – well past the mid-March date we and the US are looking at for a decision".

Agreement on the text of a second resolution

668. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell reached agreement on the text of the draft resolution on 20 February.

669. Sir Jeremy Greenstock gave Ambassador Negroponte a revised "light draft resolution" on 19 February which:

- noted (draft preambular paragraph 5) that Iraq had "submitted a declaration … containing false statements and omissions and has failed to comply with and co-operate fully in the implementation of that resolution [1441]"; and
- decided (draft OP1) that Iraq had "failed to take the final opportunity afforded to it in resolution 1441 (2002)".[185]

670. Sir Jeremy reported that he had told Ambassador Negroponte that the draft "was thin on anything with which Council members could argue and would be less frightening to the middle ground". It did not refer to "serious consequences" and that "instead of relying on OP4 of 1441", the draft resolution "relied on OP1 of 1441, re-establishing the material breach suspended in OP2".[186]

671. Sir Jeremy added that issuing the draft would signal the intent to move to a final debate, which they should seek to focus "not on individual elements of co-operation but on the failure by Iraq to voluntarily disarm" and being "thrown off course by individual benchmarks or judgement by Blix". It should be accompanied by a "powerful statement about what 1441 had asked for" which had "been twisted into partial, procedural, and grudging co-operation from Iraq"; and that "substantive, active and voluntary co-operation was not happening".

672. In response to a question from the US about whether the "central premise", that the final opportunity was "now over", would be disputed, Sir Jeremy said that: "was where we would have to define our terms carefully: voluntary disarmament was not happening."

673. The US and UK agreed they should co-sponsor the resolution with Spain and that the UK would "lead in explaining it to the Council".

674. Lord Goldsmith's response to Sir Jeremy Greenstock's rationale for the second resolution is addressed in Section 5.

675. Mr Straw had two conversations with Secretary Powell on 20 February. In the first, they discussed UK and US drafts for a second resolution. Mr Straw said that he had "no firm view about which one was best".[187] Sir Jeremy Greenstock's view was that the lighter the language the more likely the UK was to attract the support needed from “swing countries”. Mr Blair wanted a report to the Council on 7 March but there were indications that Dr Blix might want longer. If a majority in the Security Council supported more time, Mr Blair would be in “a very difficult position”. Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that an agreed strategy was needed, including tabling a side document with the resolution “containing our list of demands”.

676. Concluding the conversation, Mr Straw stated that if “extraordinarily Iraq complied, the UK could not go to war”. Secretary Powell was reported to have replied that “in the end, there was only one difference between us: President Bush had already made his decision”. If Mr Blair’s “efforts did not permit the UK to be there, Bush would still go alone”.

677. Following the first conversation with Secretary Powell, Mr Ricketts advised Mr Straw that the US draft would be “much more difficult for middle ground opinion” to accept.[188] Mr Ricketts wrote that it was the UK, not the Americans, which needed the resolution; and that the Greenstock text delivered what the UK needed and would be more difficult to oppose. It was “more compatible with building a case in the Security Council that the issue is a simple one of whether or not Iraq is in compliance”.

678. Mr Ricketts advised Mr Straw to go back to Secretary Powell to press the UK view.

679. Mr Ricketts suggested that the UK might also “move away from the concept of tabling lists of benchmarks”. He wrote that the work with the US delegation in New York had “shown up how difficult it is to isolate questions which are susceptible [to] yes/no answers in the time-frame we need”; and that there was a risk that it would “play into the hands of the ‘more time’ merchants”. Mr Ricketts suggested that it might be better to draw on the work that had been done to “set out in a co-ordinated way some illustrative tests such as the destruction of rocket motors or producing specified people for interview in acceptable conditions”.

680. Mr Ricketts concluded that would be “more compatible with the approach in the Jeremy Greenstock draft resolution of making our case on the basis of whether Iraq was in full co-operation or not”.

681. In his second conversation with Secretary Powell on 20 February, Mr Straw stated that the UK Government “was signed up to the Greenstock language. If countries voted for that … they would … be voting to let us go to war.”[189]

682. In response to questioning from Secretary Powell about whether he was sure that was the right call, Mr Straw said that “we were sure that the Greenstock language would do the trick”.

683. The British Embassy Washington reported overnight that, subject to a final word from President Bush, the US was prepared to "go with" the UK draft and was gearing up for a major lobbying exercise.[190]

684. Mr Blair spoke to President Bush, Mr Berlusconi and Mr Aznar about tabling the resolution in a conference call on 22 February.[191]

685. In a conversation with Prime Minister Aznar, Mr Blair agreed that the resolution should be tabled late on Monday 24 February, after the meeting of the General Affairs and External Relations Council of the EU.[192]

Presentation of the UK's strategy

686. In response to the level of concern in the UK, Mr Blair asked for a communications strategy based on the theme of a "last push for peace".

687. Mr Campbell wrote that, on the morning of 20 February, Mr Blair "was getting more and more worried about Iraq, and with good reason". He had asked for a strategy on the theme of "the last push for peace", with a strong media plan to underpin it. Mr Campbell had emphasised the need for a sense that "we were trying to avoid war, not rush towards it.[193]

688. Dr Rowan Williams, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Cardinal Cormac Murphy O'Connor, the Archbishop of Westminster, issued a joint statement on 20 February about "the crisis involving Iraq".[194] Recognising the "huge burden of responsibility carried by those who must make the ultimate decision", the statement said:

> "The events of recent days show that doubts still persist about the moral legitimacy as well as the unpredictable humanitarian consequences of a war with Iraq.
> "We recognise that the moral alternative to military action cannot be inaction … It is vital therefore that all sides … engage through the United Nations fully and urgently in a process, including continued weapons inspections, that could and should render the trauma and tragedy of war unnecessary.
> "We strongly urge the Government of Iraq to demonstrate forthwith its unequivocal compliance with UN resolutions on weapons of mass destruction.
> "… We must hope and pray … an outcome that brings peace with justice to Iraq and the Middle East may yet be found."

689. In a speech on reintegrating Iraq into the international community at Chatham House on 21 February, Mr Straw focused on the threat which Saddam Hussein posed to the people of Iraq and the moral case for action.[195]

690. Mr Straw stated that there was international unity about the objective of disarming Saddam Hussein who posed "a unique threat to international peace and security". But "with each passing year" of Iraq's defiance, there had "been a growing awareness of the immense consequences of a failure to match our words with actions", and:

> "The stakes could not be higher. If the UN proves unable to act on the spirit and the letter of mandatory Chapter VII resolutions when faced with the most egregious non-compliance it risks joining its predecessor, the League of Nations, as a footnote in history."

691. Mr Straw said that, without military pressure on Iraq, there would be "no co-operation; no inspections". Mr Straw also stated that the threat of military action was "and always has been, about pressuring Saddam Hussein to comply with resolution 1441".

692. In preparation for visits to key capitals to pursue support for the UK's position, Mr Julian Miller, Chief of the Assessments Staff, informed Sir David Manning that a script was being prepared which would:

> "… briefly summarise evidence and judgements on Saddam's WMD, describe the effect of some of the agents; set out the Iraqi response to UNSCR 1441, including the flaws in the 7 December declaration; and cover what we know of concealment, intimidation of witnesses and other aspects of non-co-operation. It will also provide supporting material on Saddam's regime and – briefly – on links with terrorism. We will update the pack as new material becomes available."[196]

693. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that, during a briefing for E10 representatives in New York on 21 February, he had made clear that the UK viewed war as a last resort, but the objective of disarming Iraq had to be achieved and the threat could not be allowed to continue for much longer. Verified disarmament had not happened; and no-one had explained how inspections could work without Iraq's co-operation. The UK supported the UN as a relevant international body, and did not favour unilateral action. Sir Jeremy stated:

> "We had to factor in the US determination to deal with Iraq … [The UK was] prepared to work with the E10 members to achieve a unified Council keeping the pressure on Saddam and perhaps allowing him to crack."[197]

694. The UK strategy was set out in a telegram from Mr Ricketts to diplomatic posts on the evening of 21 February.[198] The key points were:

> "The present plan is to table a simple draft resolution in the Security Council, probably on 24 February. This would provide the … legal authority for military action if necessary. We would make clear that it was part of a strategy to give Iraq another short period in which to demonstrate finally and fully whether it was co-operating in order to achieve voluntary disarmament of its WMD. We would … not be seeking a vote … for another two weeks or so, but were not prepared for the process to string out in the absence of a clear will by Iraq to comply with 1441.
> "… we would expect several further rounds of discussion in the Security Council … culminating in a report by the inspectors to a meeting on or around 7 March, probably attended by Foreign Ministers."

695. Mr Ricketts advised that there would be an intensive lobbying campaign of the elected members of the Security Council with a "good deal of travel by Ministers". The campaign would be co-ordinated with the US and Spain. The FCO would be setting up a system to "provide an up-date at least twice a week while the crisis remains at its present pitch", and was producing a daily "core script" for media purposes.

696. In a letter to Mr Campbell about statements over the weekend of 22 and 23 February, Mr Straw advised against any reference to either an "ultimatum" or to "benchmarks".[199] Mr Straw explained that the US was hostile to the use of the former term because "it would cut across a real ultimatum which President Bush had in mind to issue at about the time the resolution was voted – to Saddam to 'get out of town'".

697. On benchmarks, there was:

> "… a trap here for us to avoid. If we are too specific about how we judge Saddam's compliance, we set ourselves up as a target, both from Saddam but also from Blix. Saddam will know what he appears to have to do to get ticks in the right boxes. Judging from the Prime Minister's conversation with Blix yesterday, I think Blix is also in the mood to say if he possibly can that Iraq has passed any benchmarks that we offer. Most of the members of the Security Council will look to Blix for their judgement."

698. In his diaries, Mr Campbell wrote that, on 21 February, Mr Blair, who was on his way to Rome, had called him to say that "everything now had to be set in the context of pushing for peace, that we wanted to resolve it peacefully". Mr Campbell had worked with the White House on a briefing note. Mr Blair and Mr Straw had been happy to include a reference to an ultimatum until Mr Straw spoke to Secretary Powell "who said the real ultimatum would be made just before action when we tell Saddam to get out of town".[200]

699. In his press conference with Mr Berlusconi on 21 February, Mr Blair warned that military action on Iraq could not be avoided unless Saddam Hussein chose "the route of peaceful disarmament".[201] Mr Blair emphasised that no one wanted war. That was why:

> "… last summer, instead of starting a war, we went to the UN …
> "But there is a moral dimension to this question too. If we fail to disarm Saddam peacefully, then where does that leave the authority of the UN?
> "And if we leave Saddam in charge of Iraq with his weapons of mass destruction, where does that leave the Iraqi people who are the principal victims of Saddam?"

700. Asked about the opposition to conflict expressed by church leaders, Mr Blair replied:

> "I don't pretend to have a monopoly of wisdom … and I totally understand why people don't want war …
> "That's the very reason why we have given every single opportunity for this to be resolved peacefully. All I ask people to do is understand that however sincerely they hold their view, I hold my view sincerely too. And there is another side to this argument.
> "I understand exactly why people feel so strongly, but in the end, I have got to make a decision and that's the difference between leadership and commentary.
> "I have got to make a decision. If we cannot disarm him peacefully, are we just going to ignore the issue and hope it will go away?"

701. Late that evening, there was a conference call, including Dr Rice, Mr Stephen Hadley (US Deputy National Security Advisor), Sir David Manning and Mr Powell as well as Mr Campbell.[202] The US was worried about the text, which included "a side statement directly challenging Saddam". In his diaries, Mr Campbell wrote that Dr Rice:

> "… feared that setting it out as a final chance – again – or a challenge to Saddam, suggested there was something here beyond 1441. She said 1441 was all that we needed. We tried to use the call to get over the need for a different sort of language on this, but they really didn't get it."

702. Mr Campbell added that despite five phone calls including the conference call, the US and UK:

> "… were not really in the same place. I could sense that Condi thought we were weakening. She really didn't like the final, final opportunity line, couldn't see it was simply a way of trying to show we preferred peace to war …"

703. Mr Campbell told Dr Rice that she had to understand "we were hit hard here because people felt we were rushing to a timetable set by others".

704. On 23 February, Mr Blair spoke to President Putin who was prepared to work on a second resolution which put tougher requirements on Saddam Hussein, but President Putin did not think it should provide an automatic start to hostilities.[203]

705. Mr Blair also spoke to Mr Vicente Fox, the Mexican President,[204] and Mr Ricardo Lagos, the Chilean President.[205]

706. Mr Straw and Sir David Manning also made a number of telephone calls.

707. Mr Straw spoke to Mr de Villepin on 23 February about French concerns that pushing for a second resolution was premature and indicated that the US and the UK had no faith in the inspection process.[206]

708. On 24 February, Mr Campbell wrote that "Iraq was totally dominating" and he had suggested in Mr Blair's morning meeting that "something concrete, like signs of Arab pressure, or a new diplomatic effort that meant something" was "needed to add some substance to the 'last push for peace', which at the moment just sounded vacuous".[207] Mr Blair "said the last push WAS the pressure being applied, or the pressure was the last push", which Mr Campbell "still felt looked like we were trying to meet a US timetable, not genuinely trying to avoid war. But all the US politicians did was communicate an impatience to get to war."

Response to the draft resolution of 24 February 2003

709. The UK, US and Spain tabled a draft resolution on 24 February stating simply that Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity offered by resolution 1441 and that the Security Council had decided to remain seized of the matter.

710. Sir Jeremy Greenstock stated that resolution 1441 required Iraq "visibly and unmistakably to divest itself of weapons of mass destruction immediately, unconditionally and actively"; that had not happened and the US and UK had concluded that Iraq had decided to defy the international community.

711. A meeting of the Security Council was held on 24 February at the request of the UK.[208]

712. A draft of a second resolution was tabled by the UK, US and Spain. The draft operative paragraphs stated simply that the Security Council:

- "Decides that Iraq has failed to take the final opportunity afforded to it by resolution 1441"; and
- "Decides to remain seized of the matter."[209]

713. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Security Council that:

> "The co-sponsors are convinced that Iraq is not achieving, nor intending to achieve, the objective of SCR 1441 … its unanimous message represented a powerful signal that the UN was in control. The Security Council was challenged by the US President to raise its game on its most difficult agenda item … The resolution set out the most stringent terms ever decided upon by the United Nations for the process of disarmament. But there was also an olive branch … Iraq was given every incentive to repair its documented non-compliance.
> "Today, 15 weeks on … we are no further advanced towards that objective of complete disarmament. Indeed, nor is Iraq taking adequate steps to correct its wider breaches of 687, including its support for terrorism. The terms of resolution 1441 are not being respected …"[210]

714. Sir Jeremy stated:

> "What we all asked of Iraq was, first, a marked change from its denial and deception of 1991 to 2002, which had already placed it in material breach of relevant resolutions; and second, full compliance with and co-operation with the implementation of 1441. In other words, a decision by Iraq visibly and unmistakably to divest itself of weapons of mass destruction immediately, unconditionally and actively. That means bringing proscribed materials or programmes to the notice of inspectors and providing a full and credible account of Iraq's WMD activity backed up by documentary evidence and testimony from personnel.

"What 1441 was not was the establishment of a detective or a containment exercise … The final opportunity afforded in SCR 1441 was not for the Council to slide back into process, but for Iraq to recognise a new determination in the Security Council to complete the business in a way which represented a complete change of attitude in Baghdad.

"That has not happened."

715. Sir Jeremy said that the UK was "convinced" that Iraq had "decided to remain in defiance of the UN". The reasons included:

- Iraq had "only agreed to inspections" after President Bush's speech on 12 September 2002 "in a cynical attempt to scupper any new resolution strengthening them".
- The Iraqi letter of 13 November 2002 was "full of tirades and complaints", "grudgingly accepting that it would 'deal with' the resolution". That was "way short of the wholehearted commitment to voluntary disarmament we had hoped for".
- Iraq's 12,000 page declaration was "indisputably inadequate".
- Iraq had "done everything possible to prevent unrestricted interviews".
- Iraq had "dragged its feet on as many other elements of procedural co-operation as possible. Instead of serious collaboration with the inspectors, Iraq has tried to make the process into a tightly monitored media circus …"
- "Iraq's co-operation on substance has been non-existent … UNMOVIC have not been able to close a single outstanding issue … And there are now even more unresolved questions …"
- "This continues … an all too familiar pattern of Iraq trying to get us to focus on small concessions of process, rather than on the big picture … there is no semblance of whole-hearted co-operation … nothing like a regime with nothing to hide …"

716. Sir Jeremy concluded that the UK was seeking:

"… to keep the Council in control of the process and to build renewed Council consensus … that Iraq has made the wrong choice: the choice not to take … the final opportunity voluntarily to disarm … We shall, in detailed discussions, set out further the argument that this choice has been made, that the choice is a defiance of 1441 and the available remedies are fast disappearing."

717. The UK was "not asking for any instant judgements": there was "time still … for Iraq to make the right choice". The UK would not "call for a vote … until a proper debate has been held". There was:

"… still an opportunity to avert conflict. But the Council's judgement that Iraq has made the wrong choice should be clear and consensual. The last chance for peace is that the Council should say this together and formally, confront Baghdad with the stark implications, and trust … the response will be complete disarmament which we demanded … in SCR 687 [1991] …"

718. Mr Sergei Lavrov, Russian Permanent Representative to the UN, asked Sir Jeremy for the "additional facts justifying" his reference to Iraq's support for terrorism. Sir Jeremy reported that Mr Lavrov also stated that the "allegations being levelled against Iraq" addressed the process of disarmament, not the substance.[211]

719. In subsequent remarks to the press, Sir Jeremy stated that resolution 1441 "had set out the terms. Iraq had failed to co-operate. The draft resolution was about taking the hard decisions that followed."[212]

720. Asked by the Inquiry why the UK had tabled that draft resolution when, unlike UNSCOM in December 1998, Dr Blix had stated he was getting co-operation on process, Mr Blair replied:

"Whether he thought the action was justified or not, his reports were clear that the compliance was not immediate and the co-operation unconditional. It plainly wasn't."[213]

721. Mr Blair added that he did not believe that "if Dr Blix had another six months, it would have come out any differently". Saddam Hussein "was definitely in material breach" of resolution 1441; Mr Blair "had to decide" whether his (Saddam Hussein's) behaviour "really" indicated that he was "someone who had had a change of heart".

722. Asked if there was a risk in tabling the resolution that it would appear that the UK was trying to curtail the process because of the demands of military planning, Mr Blair replied:

"It was more, actually … the other way round … what we were trying to do was to say: how do you resolve what, on any basis, is a somewhat indistinct picture being painted by Dr Blix …

"… I think we [Mr Blair and Dr Blix] … had a long conversation on the phone. I remember Jack Straw was very much involved in this. Jeremy Greenstock, I think, at the UN, was very much involved in this. We tried to construct these tests, and the most important one, to me, was this ability to get the scientists out of the country."[214]

723. France, Germany and Russia responded by tabling a memorandum which proposed strengthening inspections and bringing forward the work programme specified in resolution 1284 and accelerating its timetable.

724. France, Germany and Russia responded to the draft resolution by tabling a memorandum, building on the earlier tripartite declaration of 10 February, stating that "full and effective disarmament" remained "the imperative objective of the international community".[215] That "should be achieved peacefully through the inspection regime". The "conditions for using force" had "not been fulfilled". The memorandum stated that the Security Council "must step up its efforts to give a real chance to the peaceful settlement of the crisis". A "combination of a clear programme of action, reinforced inspections, a clear timeline and the military build-up" provided "a realistic means to unite the Security Council and to exert maximum pressure on Iraq".

725. Canada also circulated ideas for a process based on key tasks identified by UNMOVIC.

726. In a "non-paper" circulated on 24 February, Canada set out its ideas on establishing "a defined process for a specific period of time to address the Iraq situation".[216]

727. The document stated that the Security Council divisions on Iraq "could have serious long-term implications for the UN and for international peace and stability"; and that both sides of the division had a point:

- An open-ended inspection process would relieve the pressure on the Iraqis to disarm.
- A truncated process would leave doubt that war was a last resort."

728. Canada suggested that the inspectors should bring forward their "clusters" document "early" on 28 February and provide the Council with a prioritised list of key substantive tasks for Iraq to accomplish. The inspectors would then provide four, weekly, reports on the substance with a final report on 28 March for discussion at a Ministerial-level meeting of the Security Council on 31 March.

729. If the 28 March report indicated that Iraq had not complied, "all necessary means could be used to force them to disarm". If Iraq co-operated "an enhanced inspection, verification and monitoring system would be implemented".

730. Mr Rycroft commented to Mr Blair on 26 February that the paper was "unhelpful".

731. The UK began an intense and determined effort to secure support for the draft resolution.

732. Between the discussion in the Security Council on 24 February and the reports to the Security Council from Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei on 7 March, the UK, US and Spain began an intense and determined effort to try to persuade the members of the Council, and other allies, to support the draft resolution.

733. The campaign included letters from Mr Blair, telephone calls, meetings and visits by Ministers and Sir David Manning, as well as discussions in New York and capitals and public statements in the US and UK.

734. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell discussed developments on 25 February and the "troublesome" implications of the request for more time. Mr Straw commented that "everyone was running for cover, finding any reason not to take action". In the tea room of the House of Commons, he had "found much support for continued containment as the best way of avoiding unintended consequences".[217]

735. Iraq was reported to have "dominated" the discussion during a meeting and lunch between Mr Straw and Mr Fischer on 25 February.[218]

736. The record stated that "there was no meeting of minds". Mr Fischer had:

- made it clear that Germany could not vote for the UK/US/Spanish resolution, which in "German eyes would lead directly to war";
- questioned why the inspections should stop now;
- suggested that destruction of Al Samoud 2 missiles would "prove resolution 1441 was working", and that there were "other hopeful signs";
- stated that the German/French/Russian joint memorandum set out the only process that would lead to peace; containment was working; and
- stated that "war would lead to serious repercussions; increased terrorism; insecurity in the Middle East".

737. Mr Straw was reported to have argued that the problem with Saddam Hussein was that: "he had history of 'stringing it out'. He only made concessions which represented the bare minimum, under the threat of force, and at the last minute." The joint memorandum "made the error of putting the burden on the inspectors to find Iraq's weapons of mass destruction"; and that it "would merely lead to loose containment not disarmament". The burden should be on Saddam Hussein; he "could comply quickly" and, as Mr Blair had said, "if Saddam complied, then he could stay in power". The joint memorandum "simply created the message that Saddam wanted to hear; that the international community was divided".

738. In a letter to Sir David Manning on 25 February, Mr Straw's Private Office identified the core arguments for the UK to use in persuading other members of the Security Council to support the resolution as:

- There is an objective case against Iraq. We have given inspections 12 years already. SCR 1441 (2002) set clear benchmarks – immediate, unconditional and active co-operation. Iraqi co-operation has not been forthcoming.
- More time will make no difference. Inspections are not a detective agency. How many last chances can you have?
- The authority of the UN is at stake. Collective threats in a globalised world means taking on threats where they emerge …
- It is in no-one's interest to see the US go unilateral. We need to show the US that the UN can play a constructive role."[219]

739. Following their discussion of the next steps on 25 February, Sir David reported that Dr Rice thought there would be no vetoes of the resolution.[220]

740. President Chirac's position was identified as important but Mr Blair decided to wait for "the right moment" to resume their dialogue.

741. Sir John Holmes wrote to Sir David Manning on 24 February offering advice on the way ahead.[221] He recommended that it remained important that Mr Blair continued to talk to President Chirac, "even if there is at present no chance of changing his mind". There would be "the usual problems about who picks up the phone first" but it would be "much easier to attempt any final persuasion if we have kept up a dialogue".

742. Recognising that it was "outside my province, and very much for" Sir Jeremy Greenstock, Sir John also wrote:

> "… the assumption here is that the French will not have to veto if we cannot assemble nine positive votes … But have we thought about going ahead with a vote even if we know we cannot get nine positive votes? Might there not be value in a vote with six or seven positive votes and everyone else abstaining – it would be a diplomatic failure in one sense, but if no-one had voted against, perhaps more of a political mandate than otherwise? There might of course still be the risk of a French vote against, but would they really want to do it in these circumstances? It is obviously too soon to know how all this will play out in the end, but it might be worth keeping the thought in mind."

743. Sir David Manning commented that he was not sure Mr Blair would have much enthusiasm for Sir John's first recommendation, but it was worth "bearing the argument in mind".[222] Sir David agreed with Sir John's second point.

744. Mr Blair replied: "We sh[oul]d wait 'til the right moment."[223]

745. Sir Jeremy Greenstock remained concerned about the lack of support in the Security Council and the implications, including the legal implications, of putting the resolution to a vote and failing to get it adopted.

746. Sir Jeremy Greenstock advised that in the circumstances Sir John Holmes had identified (fewer than nine positive votes but everyone else abstaining), the resolution would not be adopted and it would have no legal effect.[224] He found it:

> "… hard to see how we could draw much legal comfort from such an outcome; but an authoritative determination would be a matter for the Law Officers. (Kosovo was different: in that case a Russian draft condemning the NATO action as illegal was heavily defeated, leaving open the claim that the action was lawful … (or at least was so regarded by the majority of the Council).)
> "Furthermore, in the current climate … the political mandate to be drawn from a draft which failed to achieve nine positive votes seems to me likely to be (at best) weak … The stark reality would remain that the US and UK had tried and failed to persuade the Council to endorse the use of force against Iraq. And the French (and the Russians and Chinese) would no doubt be sitting comfortably among the abstainers …
> "My feeling … is that our interests are better served by not putting a draft to a vote unless we were sure that it had sufficient votes to be adopted … But we should revisit this issue later – a lot still had still to be played out in the Council."

747. Following discussions with the US and Spanish Missions in New York on 25 February, Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that the "key arguments" in relation to Canadian and other benchmarking proposals were:

> - it was impossible accurately to define key remaining disarmament tasks, or other benchmarks, in the absence of Iraqi co-operation …
> - the Council had to accept there would never be total clarity …
> - 1441 set the benchmarks for Iraqi co-operation, benchmarks it had manifestly failed; and > - the big picture was that we were being taken for a ride …"[225]

748. Mexico had raised questions about the legal effect of the UK draft and whether it signalled that peaceful means had been exhausted and whether a third Council decision would be needed for the use of force.

749. Sir Jeremy suggested that "consistent with being legally accurate", the "most persuasive answers" might be along the lines that:

- the resolution itself asked the Council to conclude that Iraq had failed to take its final opportunity to comply. This was something on which, given Iraq's pattern of non co-operation, the Council should be able to unite;
- the consequence of that judgement, deriving from 1441 and previous resolutions, was that force would be authorised;
- this did not mean that the resolution would lead to the use of force or that peaceful means were exhausted. Rather, with a clear Council decision … there was still a chance of last minute radical moves by the Iraqis. We recognised that the probability of Iraq taking that chance … was low, but it was perhaps the only route by which we could secure disarmament and a peaceful outcome."

750. Sir Jeremy also reported that Mr Lavrov had suggested the inspectors had said that there were no false statements and Iraq's submission of 30 documents might have rectified the omissions in the declaration.

751. Sir Jeremy emphasised the importance of the Council meeting on 27 February and asked for "additional detailed punchy arguments" he could deploy.

752. Reporting discussions in New York on 26 February, Sir Jeremy Greenstock wrote:

- There remained "a general antipathy to having now to take decisions on this issue, and a wariness about what our underlying motives are behind the resolution".
- The German position was that the process of inspections had not been exhausted; the work programme and key tasks envisaged in resolution 1284, which had not been revoked, had not begun; it had good reason to suspect that that Iraq had WMD, but there was no proof and it could turn out that Saddam Hussein was telling the truth.
- The US position was that resolution 1441 had found Iraq in material breach and partial compliance would not do. Continued inspections was, in effect, an argument for containment; and "Business as usual" would not produce the radical Iraqi transformation needed. The US was willing to ensure disarmament by itself if necessary and the Council had to factor that into its decisions.[226]

753. Sir Jeremy reported that he had argued that the UK had not given up on a peaceful outcome. The second resolution would maximise pressure on Saddam Hussein and there was still a chance for him to make a last minute decision to leave or genuinely yield all his WMD. The UK:

> "… wanted a further Council decision because we wanted it to stay in control of this issue. Saddam's assertion that he had no WMD made benchmarks a pipe-dream – how could we benchmark something the Iraqis said did not exist? Having unanimously adopted 1441, we could not go back to extended inspections under 1284 … The fact … that Iraq was not fully co-operating – was the point. If colleagues believed that Iraq was co-operating fully, then it was justified to vote against the text or amend it. If they voted against the text for any other reason, they were denying what was unanimously agreed in resolution 1441."

754. Sir Jeremy concluded that the US was focused on preserving its room for manoeuvre while he was "concentrating on trying to win votes". It was the "middle ground" that mattered. They "resent[ed] being forced to choose" between the P5 and wanted "to come to an objective judgement". Mexico and Chile were the "pivotal sceptics"; and "effective arguments (and intelligence evidence) to show that Iraq's zero is a huge lie are going to be more productive … in bringing them over".

755. Sir Jeremy also reported that an UNMOVIC contact regarded letters received from the Iraqis in the last few days, which included names of people involved in the destruction of VX, as showing that the Iraqis were trying to be active.

756. The UK considered that the Franco/German/Russian proposals were "misconceived".

757. The UK viewed the Franco/German/Russian approach as "misconceived". A telegram to posts setting out the UK position on 26 February:

- Questioned the assertion that there was no evidence that Iraq still possessed WMD. That was a "Fundamental misunderstanding of the inspections process", which had "to date left very large questions unanswered – particularly about Iraqi chemical and biological programmes". It was "not for others to prove that Iraq has got WMD, but for Iraq to prove that it has not, through full, immediate and active co-operation with the inspectors as required by resolution 1441". It was "an extraordinary statement". "Substantial evidence", including the September dossier, had been presented "of continuing Iraqi programmes and capabilities".
- Described Secretary Powell's presentation to the Security Council on 5 February as having "offered extensive evidence of Iraqi activities to hinder inspections". In addition, in relation to specific provisions in resolution 1441, "no interviews have taken place with individuals … under the conditions requested"; the Iraqis had complied with the requirement to provide names of personnel "partially, belatedly, and under pressure"; and the inspectors had faced "obstruction and delay in attempting to search sites". For example, on 16 January they were obstructed by Iraqi officials when they attempted to enter a scientist's private home. After insisting on their rights, the inspectors discovered a cache of documents on nuclear enrichment.

- Asserted that the proposals put the onus on the Security Council, not "where it should be – on Iraq".
- Asked how offering more time would increase the pressure on Iraq.
- Questioned how identifying key tasks would oblige Iraq to co-operate as "even when requirements are stated very clearly", as in resolution 1441, Iraq complied "belatedly, grudgingly, partially or not at all".
- Stated that none of the proposals for strengthening inspections could be implemented quickly.
- Questioned the need to allow 120 days for a report on progress in completing key tasks: "we already have ample evidence to the contrary".
- Stated that it was: "Disingenuous to express support (indeed encouragement) for the military build-up while at the same time making proposals which would require forces to be held at a high state of readiness for a wholly unrealistic period."[227]

Parliament, 25 and 26 February 2003

758. Mr Straw published key documents on Iraq on 25 February.

759. Mr Straw stated that Iraq continued to pose the clearest possible threat to international peace and security. He still hoped that Iraq would comply, but if it did not, he hoped the international community would recognise its responsibilities.

760. During Oral Questions to the Foreign Secretary on 25 February, Mr Straw announced the publication of a Command Paper on Iraq.[228]

761. The Command Paper was "intended to bring together in an easily accessible form some of the key international documents relevant to the Iraq crisis". It comprised:

- key Security Council resolutions;
- the report of the Amorim Panel in 1999;
- the briefings to the Security Council by Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei on 27 January and 14 February 2003;
- statements by the European Union on 13 December 2002 and 27 January and 17 February 2003;
- the NATO Summit statement of 21 November 2002; and

- Mr Straw's statements to the Security Council of 20 January, 5 February and 14 February 2003.[229]

762. Mr Straw told Ms Annabelle Ewing (Scottish National Party):

> "… Iraq has been, and remains in material breach of a string of very clear obligations that have been imposed on it. It has had a final opportunity to deal with those violations … but continues to pose the clearest possible threat to international peace and security through its possession of weapons of mass destruction and long-range missiles, and its defiance of international law. I hope that the whole of the international community will recognise the responsibilities borne by it and by individual members of the Security Council to ensure that international law means what it says. I still hope that we can gain enforcement by peaceful means but, if we cannot, the serious consequences … we spelled out in … resolution 1441 will have to follow through."[230]

763. Subsequently, in response to Ms Joan Ruddock (Labour), Mr Straw stated:

> "I continue to hope that a vote [on the draft resolution] can be avoided because the purpose of the resolution is to serve very clear notice on Saddam … that the final opportunity has nearly passed."[231]

764. In a statement on 25 February, Mr Blair rehearsed the Government's strategy.

765. On 25 February, Mr Blair made a statement in the House of Commons on Iraq.[232]

766. Mr Blair provided a brief history of the crisis in which he emphasised Saddam Hussein's concealment of his biological and nuclear weapons programmes from the inspectors and his continued deception.

767. Mr Blair stated that the intelligence was "clear" that Saddam Hussein continued "to believe that his weapons of mass destruction programme is essential both for internal repression and for external aggression". It was also "essential to his regional power". "Prior to the inspectors coming back in", Saddam Hussein "was engaged in a systematic exercise in concealment of those weapons". The inspectors had reported some co-operation on process, but had "denied progress on substance".

768. Mr Blair said that the UK, US and Spain had introduced a resolution deciding that Iraq had "failed to take the final opportunity", but would "not put the resolution to a vote immediately" to "give Saddam one further final chance to disarm voluntarily". The UN inspectors would have a further report to make in March but the time had come for Saddam Hussein to decide. Peaceful disarmament required active co-operation.

769. Mr Blair said that the memorandum put forward by France, Germany and Russia called "for more time – up to the end of July at least". But the issue was not time but will. The risk was that Saddam Hussein wanted to drag the process out until the attention of the international community waned.

770. Mr Blair emphasised that the objective was disarmament but "the nature of Saddam's regime was relevant", first because "weapons of mass destruction in the hands of a regime of this brutality" were "especially dangerous, in particular because Saddam has chosen his willingness to use them". Secondly, the innocent were dying in Iraq every day.

771. Mr Blair concluded that the authority of the United Nations and the international community was at stake. If that was not upheld, the consequences would "stretch far beyond Iraq".

772. In response to questions about the threat posed by Iraq, Mr Blair stated that that the "whole basis of resolution 1441" was that Saddam Hussein constituted a threat, adding:

> "Moreover, there is a whole set of related dangers to do with unstable states developing or proliferating such material and with potential links to terrorism. That is why, in the end, the world has to take a very strong view of the matter and deal with it."

773. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that Mr Blair had called him later and said:

> "… it was going to be really tough from now on in. The truth was we may well have to go without a second UNSCR, or even without a majority on the UNSC. The Bush poodle problem would get bigger … but he was adamant it was the right thing to do, and worth the political consequences."[233]

774. Mr Campbell added that "an awful lot" of Labour MPs were "committed to rebellion" and were asking if Iraq was a threat "to us, and now"? Mr Blair was "dismissive" of Dr Blix; he had "said his job was to set out the facts, but he now saw his mission as to stop war".

775. In his memoir, Mr Cook wrote that Mr Blair had been:

> "… at his most effective. He was convincing and passionate about his own belief in the correctness of his course of action …
> "However, no amount of skilled presentation could conceal the immense confusion that we are in over the role of the UN. Tony knows that he desperately needs the blessing of the UN if he is to have any chance of carrying domestic opinion with him, > but since he knows that Bush will go to war whatever the UN says, Tony's attempt to wrap himself in the UN flag is fatally hobbled by his inability to say that the UN will have the last word."[234]

776. Mr Cook added that Mr Blair's exchanges with backbenchers had "clearly laid out the nexus of issues which have brought him to his present conviction". That was that "proliferation, plus unstable states plus terrorism adds up to a new and serious threat". That was:

> "… a way of linking action against Saddam to the response to 9/11, and avoids the irritating evidence that Saddam has no link whatsoever to 9/11 and has no link with Al Qaida. But it does still leave unanswered why Iraq is the focus of so much effort. Whatever else we may say about the Iraqi regime, it is not unstable …"

777. Asked by Mr Duncan Smith during PMQs on 26 February whether he would support action in the absence of a majority in the Security Council, Mr Blair responded that he believed that there would be support for a second resolution.[235]

778. Mr Blair subsequently stated that he was "working flat out" to achieve a second resolution, and that the best way to do that was "to hold firm to the terms of resolution 1441". That required "full, unconditional and immediate compliance" from Iraq, and was intended "genuinely to be the final opportunity" for Saddam Hussein.[236]

779. The House of Commons was asked on 26 February to reaffirm its endorsement of resolution 1441, to support the Government's continuing efforts to disarm Iraq, and to call upon Iraq to recognise that this was its final opportunity to comply with its obligations.

780. The Government motion was approved by 434 votes to 124; 199 MPs voted for an amendment which invited the House to "find the case for military action against Iraq as yet unproven".

781. The Government motion tabled for debate on 26 February invited the House of Commons to:

> "Take note of Command Paper Cm 5769 on Iraq; reaffirm its endorsement of United Nations Security Council resolution 1441, as expressed in its resolution of 25 November 2002; support the Government's continuing efforts in the United Nations to disarm Iraq of its weapons of mass destruction; and call upon Iraq to recognise this is its final opportunity to comply with its disarmament obligations."[237]

782. In his statement opening the debate, Mr Straw said that the motion meant what it said. It was "not an endorsement of military action" and no decision "to deploy British forces in action" had "yet been taken".[238] Any decision on military action would be put to the House and "subject only to the usual caveat about the safety of our forces". It was "as much in the Government's interest as it is in the paramount interest of the House, that we should do so before the start of hostilities". The House would be kept informed on the business of the Security Council and have "a full opportunity to debate and vote on the outcome of proceedings on any second resolution".

783. Stating that he intended to answer the "central and continuing question in people's minds", Mr Straw said that the 13 Security Council resolutions in the Command Paper provided the best answer to the question "Why Iraq?" They showed "paragraph by paragraph, the exceptional danger posed by Iraq, and its continued defiance of the United Nations". Iraq had "flatly and completely" refused to comply with resolution 1284 (1999). Resolution 1441 gave Iraq its "final opportunity". Iraq was the "only country in such serious and multiple breach of mandatory UN obligations".

784. In response to the question "Why now?", Mr Straw stated that Saddam Hussein's aim was that "now" should never arrive. His tactics were to "prevaricate in the hope that by exploiting people's natural anxieties" he could "string out the process forever and keep his arsenal". Since the inspectors' return to Iraq, Saddam Hussein had not provided new evidence and there were concerted Iraqi efforts to prevent unrestricted interviews with scientists. The inspectors had not been able to close a single outstanding issue.

785. In response to calls for "more time and more inspections", Mr Straw said that in the absence of active and immediate Iraqi co-operation, more time would not achieve anything of substance. The disarmament of South Africa had taken nine inspectors and three years. The "grudging concessions on process" from Saddam Hussein had been "secured only because of the military build up". Saddam Hussein "must either embark immediately on voluntary and full disarmament or the Security Council must face up to its responsibility to see that he is disarmed by force".

786. Iraq had made "a string of cynically timed concessions" that were "calculated to divide and delay". A second resolution was needed to "bring this game to a halt". If the words "final opportunity" in resolution 1441 were to have any meaning, it was that Saddam Hussein should not be allowed to "lure the international community into endless indecision". Saddam Hussein:

> "… would use a further 120 days to bring the authority of the United Nations lower week by week, to tie the weapons inspectors in knots, and create further divisions within the international community."

[238] House of Commons, Official Report, 26 February 2003, columns 265-276.

787. Mr Straw added:

> "Worse, this delay would send Saddam the clearest possible signal that his strategy is succeeding. It would tell him that the international community lacked the will to disarm him, and it would tell all those who threaten our security that Saddam Hussein has broken the United Nations as an instrument for defending peace through the force of international law."

788. Mr Straw argued against persisting with a policy of containment. That was "not the policy of disarmament as set out in resolution 1441 or any of the preceding resolutions". There could be "no stable, steady state for Iraq unless it is properly disarmed". Nor could there be stability for the region and the international community: "What may appear to be containment to others is rearmament for Saddam." "Far from keeping a lid on Saddam's ambitions", the policy of containment between 1998 and 2002 had "allowed him to rebuild his horrific arsenal, his chemical and biological weapons, and the means of delivering them". Mr Straw cited Iraq's refurbishment of prohibited equipment and the building of a missile test stand as proof of that activity. Containment required "a degree of trust in Saddam that we cannot risk and which runs contrary to all the evidence".

789. In relation to questions about double standards, especially in relation to Israel and Palestine, Mr Straw said that he and Mr Blair accepted that there had been a "considerable amount to that charge" but the way to deal with that was "not by ignoring outstanding UN obligations, but by working even harder to see all of them implemented". The UK was "working actively to implement" UN policy on Israel/Palestine "including the early publication of the Road Map".

790. Mr Straw stated:

> "International terrorism and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction are the crucial strategic questions of our time. Our answer to the threats will determine the stability of the world for decades to come. This is an awesome responsibility. It calls for courageous leadership and it requires a vision and foresight to act decisively and, if necessary, with military force."

791. Mr Straw concluded that a "moment of choice" had been reached for Saddam Hussein and for the Iraqi regime, and for the United Nations. The:

> "… issue of what we do about tyrannical states with poison gases, nerve agents, viruses and nuclear ambitions, and which defy international law and the principles of the UN, will not go away. We have to face the issue. We have to give Saddam Hussein a categorical choice, and after 12 long years he has to give us his answer now."

Points made during the debate

The debate that followed Mr Straw's statement returned repeatedly to the question of whether the inspectors should be given more time, and whether the case had yet been made that military action was necessary.[239] A number of MPs referred to the need for an authorising UN resolution if action was to go ahead, and for plans for the delivery of humanitarian aid to Iraq.

Mr Chris Smith (Labour) told the House that there must be "the clearest possible reasons" for going to war and risking thousands of lives, and added "I do not believe those reasons are there".

Mr Kenneth Clarke (Conservative) said: "I cannot rid myself of doubts that the course to war upon which we are now embarked was decided on many months ago, primarily in Washington, and there has been a fairly remorseless unfolding of events since that time."

That point was echoed by Mr John Gummer (Conservative), who said: "There is no Member of Parliament who does not know that this war is war by timetable, and the timetable was laid before the United States had any intention of going to the United Nations."

792. After the debate, 199 MPs voted for an amendment to the Government motion which invited the House to "find the case for military action against Iraq as yet unproven".

793. The Government motion was approved by 434 votes to 124.

794. Sir David Manning spoke to Dr Rice on 27 February to explain the political difficulties in the UK:

> "Yesterday's outcome [in the House of Commons] emphasised in stark terms that a second resolution was absolutely vital …"[240]

795. Mr Cook wrote that it was the largest rebellion against the Government in his 30 years in Parliament, and that the newspapers the following morning had described it as the "biggest government rebellion since Gladstone introduced the Home Rule Bill".[241]

President Bush's speech, 26 February 2003

796. In a speech on 26 February intended to make the case for action against Iraq, President Bush stated that the safety of the American people depended on ending the direct and growing threat from Iraq.

797. President Bush also set out his hopes for the future of Iraq.

798. In a speech at the American Enterprise Institute on 26 February, President Bush stated that Saddam Hussein was "building and hiding weapons that could enable him to dominate the Middle East and intimidate the civilized world"; and that the US would "not allow it".[242] In addition, Saddam Hussein had "close ties to terrorist organizations, and could supply them with terrible means to strike" the US. The danger that posed "could not be ignored or wished away" and "must be confronted". The US hoped:

> "… that the Iraqi regime will meet the demands of the United Nations and disarm, fully and peacefully. If it does not, we are prepared to disarm Iraq by force. Either way, this danger will be removed.
> "The safety of the American people depends on ending this direct and growing threat. Acting … will also contribute greatly to the long-term safety and stability of our world … A liberated Iraq can show the power of freedom to transform this vital region, by bringing hope and progress into the lives of millions."

799. If it "must use force", the United States and "our coalition" stood ready to: "help the citizens of a liberated Iraq"; "lead in carrying out the urgent and dangerous work of destroying chemical and biological weapons"; "provide security against those who try to spread chaos, or settle scores, or threaten the territorial integrity of Iraq"; and "protect Iraq's natural resources from sabotage … and ensure those resources are used for the benefit of the owners – the Iraqi people".

800. The US had "no intention of determining the precise form of Iraq's new government"; that choice belonged to the Iraqi people. But the US would "ensure that one brutal dictator is not replaced by another":

> "All Iraqis must have a voice in the new government and all citizens must have their rights protected.
> "Rebuilding Iraq will require a sustained commitment from many nations … we will remain in Iraq as long as necessary, and not a day more … in the peace that followed a world war … we did not leave behind occupying armies, we left constitutions and parliaments. We established an atmosphere of safety, in which responsible, reform-minded local leaders could build lasting institutions of freedom …
> "… The nation of Iraq – with its proud heritage, abundant resources and skilled and educated people – is fully capable of moving towards democracy and living in freedom."

801. A new regime in Iraq would:

> "… serve as dramatic and inspiring example of freedom for other nations in the region …

> "Success in Iraq could also begin a new stage for Middle Eastern peace and set in motion progress towards a truly democratic Palestinian state. The passing of Saddam Hussein's regime will deprive terrorist networks … of a wealthy patron … And other regimes will be given a clear warning that support for terror would not be tolerated."

802. President Bush also stated that a future Palestinian state must abandon for ever the use of terror and that, as the threat of terror receded, Israel must support efforts to create a viable state. He reiterated his personal commitment to implement the Road Map, but without setting a timetable.

803. President Bush said that confronting Iraq showed the US "commitment to effective international institutions"; and that he wanted the words of the Security Council to have meaning. The world needed:

> "… international bodies with the authority and will to stop the spread of terror and chemical and biological weapons … High-minded pronouncements against proliferation mean little unless the strongest nations are willing to stand behind them – and use force if necessary … the United Nations was created, as Winston Churchill said, 'to make sure that the force of right will, in the ultimate issue, be protected by the right of force'."

804. In her memoir, Dr Rice wrote that the speech was made after she and Mr Hadley had "realized belatedly" in late February "that the President had not made the broader arguments" for action in Iraq. She also commented: "But the die had been cast. This was a war that had been justified by an intelligence judgement, not a strategic one."[243]

805. Following the speech, Mr Straw asked for further work on the draft vision for the Iraqi people, which had first been produced in 2001, on the grounds that a "public commitment on the lines of the draft could have a powerful impact in Iraq and the region as well as on the British domestic debate".[244] It would not be launched or trailed until after the UN had voted on the second resolution because of the risk that it would be presented as "discounting the role" of the Security Council. Care would also be needed to avoid confusing the message that the justification for military action rested firmly on disarmament of WMD.

806. Mr Straw thought it essential that the UK, US and "other coalition members" were speaking to a common script. That underlined the importance of making progress with the US on post-conflict planning; and although there was nothing in the UK draft that "could not be squared with US policy" as set out in President Bush's speech, "elements … go further than the US has so far done in public or, on some issues including UN involvement, in private".

JIC Assessment, 26 February 2003: 'Iraq: Prospects in the North'

At the request off the FCO the JIC produced an Assessment on 26 February of how the Iraqi regime would respond in northern Iraq to a Coalition attack; the likely attitudes and actions of Turkey and the Iraqi Kurds; and the prospects for northern Iraq post-Saddam Hussein.[245] The Assessment highlighted the short and longer-term risks of action in northern Iraq.

The JIC specifically asked Mr John Scarlett, the Chairman, to draw the Assessment to the attention of Mr Blair, Mr Straw and Mr Hoon.[246] He wrote that it noted:

- "The continued presence of significant military forces in the North and the possibility that they were equipped with WMD."
- "The potential for fighting between Turkish and Kurdish forces."
- "The potential for Iranian involvement".

Mr Blair commented: "I need to talk on this."[247]

Cabinet, 27 February 2003

808. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 27 February that:

- he would continue to push for a further Security Council resolution;
- humanitarian and reconstruction planning needed to take "centre stage", and he would pursue that with President Bush in the coming days;
- decisions had to be made; and
- failure to achieve a second resolution would reinforce the unilateralists in the US Administration.

809. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that Mr Blair had held a meeting with Mr John Prescott, the Deputy Prime Minister, and Mr Straw, "at which we went over the distinct possibility of no second resolution because the majority was not there for it".[248] Mr Blair "knew that meant real problems, but he remained determined on this, and convinced it was the right course".

810. Mr Straw told Cabinet that the draft resolution could be put to the vote in the week after the 7 March discussion of Dr Blix's and Dr ElBaradei's reports in the Security Council, which was likely to be at Foreign Minister level.[249] There had been considerable diplomatic activity to win the votes of the 10 non-permanent members of the Council. He thought that Spain and Bulgaria would support; and Syria and Germany would vote against or abstain. Angola, Cameroon, Chile, Guinea, Mexico and Pakistan were being encouraged to vote for the resolution. France and Russia would need to "think through their responsibilities".

811. Reporting on his visit to Bahrain, Kuwait and Qatar, Mr Hoon said that they were supportive of "our approach". The Royal Navy Task Force and about half the total British military commitment of 45,000 service men and women was in the region. He was "confident that the troops and their equipment would arrive in place as planned".

812. Mr Hoon had "one particular concern" which he had discussed with General Tommy Franks, Commander in Chief US Central Command (CENTCOM), that:

> "Not enough planning had been done on the post-conflict phase of operations, including humanitarian relief. British forces could find themselves in charge of a portion of Iraq quite quickly if resistance to Coalition military action collapsed. It would be helpful if experts from the Department for International Development could work with military planners in the region and consider pre-positioning humanitarian supplies so that there was no hiatus in the event that military action took place."

813. Ms Short said that experts had been involved in talks in the Pentagon. Preparations were "just beginning and needed to be expedited". A UN legal mandate was "essential" for the humanitarian and reconstruction tasks that lay ahead. Without that, "proper preparation was impossible". That matter "needed to become a priority for the Coalition". It would be "difficult" to accommodate action in Iraq within her department's contingency reserve: "Greater resources were likely to be needed."

814. The points made in discussion included:

- The MEPP needed to be revived quickly. That was the focus of much Arab frustration.
- Unity inside Europe needed to be restored "as soon as possible after any military action".
- Keeping to the UN route and winning support for a new Security Council resolution would garner support in the UK.
- In the event of a veto, gaining a preponderance of votes for a new resolution could still be important.
- Insufficient credit had been given to the value of the No-Fly Zones and the difference between life in northern Iraq, which was beyond Saddam Hussein's direct control, and that elsewhere in Iraq.

[249] Cabinet Conclusions, 27 February 2003.

- There had been “sharp differences of view” in the debate in Parliament on 26 February, the tone was not “unpleasant, but the issues were difficult, and views could still be swayed”. The commitment to a further debate had been “wise”.

815. Mr Blair said that he would continue to push for a further Security Council resolution. President Bush’s commitments the previous day in respect of the MEPP were “helpful”. Looking beyond the current divisions in the international community it would be “important to seek unity of purpose through the humanitarian and reconstruction work which would follow any military action”. Planning in this field “needed to take centre stage”. He would pursue that with President Bush “in the coming days”. The “transitional civil administration in Iraq should have a United Nations mandate, although the scale of United Nations involvement should balance the administrative effectiveness with the necessity for proper authority”.

816. Mr Blair described the debate in the UK and Parliament as “open”:

> “Feelings were running high and the concerns expressed were genuine. But decisions had to be made. The central arguments remained the threat posed by weapons of mass destruction in the hands of Iraq; the brutal nature of the Iraqi regime; and the importance of maintaining the authority of the UN in the international order. Failure to achieve a further Security Council resolution would reinforce the hand of the unilateralists in the American Administration.”

817. Mr Campbell wrote:

> “At Cabinet, things were pretty much rock solid … I could sense a few of them only fully realising … the enormity of the decisions, the enormity of the responsibility involved. Robin [Cook] was the trickiest … Clare [Short] was doing her usual … and for her was relatively onside. She wanted to do a big number on aftermath preparations but TB was there ahead of her. He was very calm, matter of fact, just went through where we were on all the main aspects of this. Margaret Beckett [Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs] … made a very strong intervention. She was a really useful barometer and she was very supportive. Nobody was really looking to make TB’s position more difficult … with the possible exception of Robin.”[250]

818. Mr Campbell added that Mr Blair had:

> “… said later that he felt only now was [President] Bush really aware of the full extent of the stakes here. This had the potential to transform for good America’s relations with Europe and the rest of the world, and in a worst-case scenario was a disaster for everyone. He wanted to get the thing done quickly, but he also wanted them to understand better the broader agenda. He felt Bush had moved a good deal on that but was less convinced it permeated through the rest of the Administration."

LORD GOLDSMITH'S MEETING WITH NO.10 OFFICIALS, 27 FEBRUARY 2003

819. When Lord Goldsmith met No.10 officials on 27 February he advised that the safest legal course would be to secure a further Security Council resolution.

820. Lord Goldsmith told them, however, that he had reached the view that a "reasonable case" could be made that resolution 1441 was capable of reviving the authorisation to use force in resolution 678 (1990) without a further resolution, if there were strong factual grounds for concluding that Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity offered by resolution 1441.

821. Lord Goldsmith advised that, to avoid undermining the case for reliance on resolution 1441, it would be important to avoid giving any impression that the UK believed a second resolution was legally required.

822. At the request of No.10, Lord Goldsmith met Mr Powell, Baroness Morgan (Mr Blair's Director of Political and Government Relations) and Sir David Manning on 27 February.[251] The discussion, and Mr Powell's request that Lord Goldsmith's advice should not "become public", are addressed in Section 5.

Discussions at the UN, 27 and 28 February 2003

823. Informal consultations in the Security Council on 27 February showed there was little support for the UK/US/Spanish draft resolution.

824. The Security Council held "informal consultations" on the UK/US/Spanish proposal on 27 February.[252]

825. Mr Miller provided a brief for Sir Jeremy Greenstock to use in the Council discussion, setting out the UK assessment of Iraq's WMD and its response to resolution 1441.[253] That is addressed in Section 4.3.

826. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported:

- Ambassador Negroponte had said he "hoped for a decision on the resolution in the not too distant future"; and that it "asked only if Iraq had complied with its final opportunity". "The Council should judge the facts on the basis of what had happened over the last 108 days." He would be "concerned" about the message to Iraq "if the Council were not able to pass this straightforward justified resolution".

- Mr Lavrov had said implementation of 1441 and 1284 should continue "until the inspectors encountered impediments and obstacles". Iraq was "not blocking the work of [the] inspectors and was more and more actively co-operating on substance". That was "the result" of "continuing pressure" from a "unified" Council "and the strong inspection mandate which could, if necessary, be made more effective". Facts were needed "to close this issue". He suggested distribution of UNMOVIC's "clusters" document to provide the basis for discussion.
- Mr Aguilar Zinser, Mexican Permanent representative to the UN, said Mexico "still wanted: disarmament; a peaceful solution; inspections … and multilateral consideration of this issue" and, unusually, asked the UK, US and Spain a series of questions about the proposal.
- Mr Juan Gabriel Valdés, Chilean Permanent Representative to the UN "urged the P5 to find a solution". He "did not reject the use of force but it must only be once all peaceful means had been exhausted". He "wanted the continuation of inspections for some time before a definitive report".
- Mr Inocencio Arias, Spanish Permanent Representative to the UN, had said the draft was "one more step in imposing serious diplomatic pressure". Saddam Hussein co-operated only under pressure. The more time was given, "the less pressure he would face".[254]

827. Sir Jeremy reported that the points he had made included:

- We were not getting Iraqi co-operation because "the 'zero' Iraq had declared was a lie".
- Iraq was "trickling out concessions to divide the Council, buy time and avert military action while continuing concealment".
- It was "very probable that Iraq would decide to destroy the Al Samoud missiles. In addition they might also start trickling out what they claimed to be newly discovered documents and announce 'private' interviews which would in reality still be monitored and taped."
- He "recognised" that he was "saying things that could not be confirmed by the inspectors", but the UK had "invested in facilities not available to other member states or the inspectors because our national interest was at stake and the UN was being defied. We were providing detailed intelligence to the inspectors".
- It was "our word against Saddam's – but Council members had to choose whom they believed".

[254] Telegram 318 UKMIS New York to FCO London, 28 February 2003, 'Iraq: 27 February Consultations and Missiles'.

828. Sir Jeremy reported that he had used "the points provided by the Assessments Staff", including Iraq's:

> "… capacity to produce chemical and biological weapons; its delivery mechanisms; the efforts the regime had taken to conceal WMD; the fact that the regime had considered whether to declare some weapons but concluded it was too risky; plans to obstruct … [the inspectors] if they got too close; and the intimidation to prevent private interviews which Iraq saw as the weak link that could expose their WMD".

829. In addition, he stated that "UNMOVIC had been tagging proscribed equipment that had been repaired by the Iraqis".

830. Directly challenging the French/German/Russian proposal, Sir Jeremy reported that he had said it "wrongly claimed inspections were not being hindered" and "wrongly suggested" a number of other proposals to strengthen inspections and allow more time. It "did not add up to a solution delivering disarmament, but at best temporary containment while Iraq continued to exploit major holes in sanctions to develop WMD".

831. Addressing the legal arguments "using the lines agreed with London", Sir Jeremy said that the "new draft, if adopted, would confirm the authorisation of the use of force inherent in resolutions 678, 687 and 1441". It would increase the pressure on Iraq; but it:

> "… did not necessarily mean that its adoption would in practice lead to immediate use of force. There was still a chance that at the last minute Iraq would take radical action to disarm. The UK hoped that would be the result. This was the only remaining route to secure disarmament and a peaceful outcome."

832. Sir Jeremy stated that he "recognised that [resolution] 1441 set an awkwardly high standard. But we had adopted it and at no point had inspectors reported the immediate, active and unconditional co-operation demanded". He "accepted delay was more comfortable and that there were downsides to the action … proposed". But colleagues should read the relevant provisions of resolution 687 (1991). Iraq "continued to cheat the UN".

833. Mr Jean-Marc de La Sablière, French Permanent Representative to the UN, had responded that Sir Jeremy's statement showed that the resolution "was not about increased pressure but about force". He questioned whether the Council "would be strengthened by supporting a war against which so many objected". He set out the French/German/Russian proposal "in standard terms". There was "no reason to resort to force in the current circumstances nor to discuss a resolution to legitimise it".

834. Mr Wang Yingfan, Chinese Permanent Representative to the UN, said that "the road of peaceful inspections had not run its course".

835. Dr Gunter Pleuger, German Permanent Representative to the UN, said "the resolution was about war". The goal was "peaceful disarmament – if we went to war we would have failed".

836. Sir Jeremy commented that: "Positions remain generally unchanged" but the co-sponsors had produced a "more effective line of argument than the opposition".

837. Following the meeting, details emerged of a letter from Iraq to Dr Blix confirming "agreement 'in principle' to the destruction of Al Samoud 2 missiles". Sir Jeremy reported that he had "tried to discount it in advance with the Council". If Iraq's "acceptance 'in principle'" did not turn into concrete destruction before 1 March, which Sir Jeremy thought "unlikely", that would be "a bonus".

838. Dr Blix told the UK Mission that he could and would make the "clusters" document available for the Council meeting on 7 March. But preparation of the work programme and key remaining tasks would not be ready by then.

839. Dr Blix lunched with EU Heads of Mission in New York on 28 February.[255]

840. The UK Mission reported that Dr Blix had made a number of points including:

- Iraq "had not actively co-operated until recently". It was now producing documents, a list of participants in destruction activities in 1991, and digging up R-400 bombs. But Iraq had not started to disarm, the picture on interviews was "disappointing", and the flow of documents was "limited".
- He shared the US view that it "was for Iraq to declare its WMD holdings and show how it was disarming". UNMOVIC was not a detective agency. There was plenty Iraq could do to address allegations which were well known to Baghdad, such as checkpoints for trucks and an inventory of underground facilities.
- Iraq could have acted earlier. Iraq was not co-operating fully and actively. Full co-operation should not take a long time. If UNMOVIC secured full co-operation, "verification would take neither years nor weeks but months".
- There had been no change of heart, just more activity. Iraq had attempted to conceal things.
- The debate was "somewhat over-focused on the outstanding questions identified by UNSCOM". It was not possible to prove a negative (Iraq's claim that it had not resumed any WMD programmes): "But Iraq could certainly make the negative plausible (e.g. producing documents; opening underground facilities)." It could "certainly do more on interviews".
- He thought there was increasing acceptance in the Council that he should circulate UNMOVIC's clusters of unresolved questions. But UNMOVIC should not "grade" Iraq's co-operation; that was "the responsibility of the Council". But producing the document would facilitate Iraq's task.
- He did not think he was bound to deliver the work programme required by resolution 1284 "only on 27 March". It would be "fairly short", but the Commissioners had still to take a view.

[255] Email Thomson to Greenstock, 1 March 2003, 'Iraq: Blix'.

- It would "make sense for UNMOVIC to identify some priorities" within the clusters. He suggested VX, anthrax and SCUD missiles.
- "… just three months of inspections was 'not fully satisfactory' as a decent amount of time to give the inspections effort. But that was a Council decision."
- If the Council voted for war, there would be a long term monitoring requirement. It would be for the Council to decide whether UNMOVIC should go back and on what terms.

841. Dr Blix subsequently told the UK Mission that he could and would make the clusters document available for the Security Council meeting on 7 March. But preparation of the work programme and key remaining tasks would not be ready by then.

842. The UK Mission also reported that Ambassador James Cunningham, US Deputy Permanent Representative to the UN, had:

- said he was "not opposed to surfacing the clusters document … provided it was not accompanied by the list of key remaining tasks"; and
- agreed that, "after any conflict, US forces should certainly be accompanied by UNMOVIC inspectors to witness the uncovering of WMD and missiles. But there was Pentagon resistance … and, if the resolution failed to pass, giving UNMOVIC a role could be a difficult argument."

843. The UK continued to provide information to UNMOVIC on potential targets for inspection but, by late February, it was "less confident about these than some of the previous targets".[256]

UNMOVIC report, 28 February 2003

UNMOVIC issued its quarterly report to the Security Council on 28 February.[257]

The UK Permanent Mission to the UN in New York reported that UNMOVIC had concluded that Iraq had been helpful on process but there was no explicit conclusion on substance.[258]

Other points included:

- The "clusters" document could serve as an important source for the selection of key remaining tasks.
- Verified disarmament would be "problematic" without co-operation and even with co-operation it would take some time.
- Results in terms of disarmament had been very limited so far.

- Iraq could have made a greater effort in the period and it was hard to understand why some measures which might achieve results had not been taken earlier.
- It was only after mid-January that Iraq took a number of steps that had the potential to result in the presentation of either proscribed items or of relevant evidence.

The report was discussed in the Security Council on 7 March.

UK attempts to secure support for the draft resolution

844. In meetings in Madrid on 27 and 28 February, Mr Blair and Mr Aznar discussed the need for a second resolution and the positions of other members of the Security Council, including:

- Mr Aznar's concerns following his meeting with President Bush that the US might be over-confident.
- Doubt that France would actually veto a resolution although it was attempting to prevent nine positive votes.
- The need for the US to "win" the Mexican vote given its "history of non-intervention … strong anti-US nationalism, and [President] Fox's lack of a majority in Congress".
- President Lagos' understanding "that military action would go ahead", his view that "it would be better for it to do so in the UN context", his wish not to have the "decisive vote", and the need "to find something to help Mexico and Chile".
- Pressure from, for example, Brazil for a common Mexican/Chilean position.
- The outcome of the visit to Africa by Baroness Amos, FCO Parliamentary Under Secretary of State.
- Hopes that Pakistan could be persuaded to vote in favour of the resolution.
- Uncertainty about President Putin's position.
- That it was "unlikely that the Arab idea of exile for Saddam would work, but it was worth a try".[259]

845. Mr Blair focused on:

- the importance of keeping close to Dr Blix, who "must not be taken in by the likely Iraqi destruction of the Al Samoud missiles";
- the UK's assessment of Iraq's concealment of its WMD;
- the need to focus on the "1999 left-overs" and interviews;

[259] Letter Rycroft to McDonald, 28 February 2003, 'UK/Spanish Summit, Madrid, 27-28 February: Iraq'.

- the need to show "as quickly as possible that military action had brought the Iraqi people a humanitarian benefit"; and
- the need to press the US that the UN "had to be centrally involved, legitimising the international presence".

846. To address the difficulties created by "the impression that the US was determined to go to war come what may", Mr Blair and Mr Aznar agreed the need to pursue a communications strategy showing that they "were doing everything possible to avoid war". Mr Blair would also seek more public support from Denmark and the Netherlands.

847. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries:

> "Blix was now causing us significant problems. He was talking now about Saddam's line on [potential decommissioning of] Al Samoud missiles being a significant piece of disarmament. TB was raging again, said the man was supposed to be a civil servant, but had decided to behave like a politician. He is just desperate not to be seen as the person who allowed a war to start, but his job is to present the facts. He felt Blix was being bullied successfully by the French who, he was now convinced, wanted as their main foreign policy objective to build Europe as a power rival to the US, and determined to shaft TB …"
> "He was also worried that Kofi [Annan] … was getting closer to the Franco-German position …"[260]

848. At the end of February, a senior official in the US Administration sought the UK's views on whether the resolution should be put to a vote or withdrawn if it was judged that there was insufficient support for its adoption.

849. No.10 took the view that it would want a vote.

850. Following his farewell calls in Washington, Sir Christopher Meyer reported that Mr Richard Haass, the Director of Policy Planning in the State Department, had produced a memorandum which challenged the conventional wisdom by suggesting that the second resolution should be withdrawn if it was likely that it would not be adopted; and that Secretary Powell would be interested in Mr Straw's views.[261]

851. Sir Christopher's letter was also copied to Sir David Manning, Sir Michael Jay, and Sir Jeremy Greenstock.

852. Mr Powell sought Mr Blair's views, commenting that he had told Mr Haass on 28 February that the UK "would prefer to put the resolution to a vote and that, "having thought about it", that was "even more strongly" his view: "Refusing to put this to the vote and claiming we had nine votes would hole us below the waterline." In addition,

Mr Powell commented, "how do we know if the French will veto if we don't put it to the test".[262]

853. Mr Powell also recorded that Mr Blair was very opposed to the idea.

854. Sir David Manning commented "Me too".[263]

855. In his memoir, War of Necessity War of Choice, Mr Haass described a "mini-debate" within the US Administration:

> "… about whether to press for a second resolution despite its poor prospects. Some … favored doing so as a means of pressurising others to stand up and declare themselves against going to war, even if it did not appear that we had the votes to win. I never understood this logic and thought this approach misguided, and instead argued that the worst of all outcomes would be to lose a vote and then go to war. This would be widely viewed as … arrogant … and raise even more fundamental questions concerning the legitimacy and legality of what the US was contemplating. I also thought it would do real and lasting damage to the United Nations. Far better to explore getting a second resolution and then pull back if consultations demonstrated that it was likely that we could not prevail … I argued all this out in a memorandum that Powell distributed to the [NSC] Principals. Fortunately, this position carried the day, and the Administration decided to pull back if and when it became obvious that no international consensus favoring war would emerge."[264]

856. An Arab League Summit on 1 March concluded that the crisis in Iraq must be resolved by peaceful means and in the framework of international legitimacy.

Arab League Summit, 1 March 2003

An Arab League Summit meeting, held in Sharm al-Sheikh on 1 March, discussed the "serious developments in the crisis over Iraq". The communiqué recorded that the Summit had resolved:

- "To reaffirm its absolute rejection of a strike on Iraq … The Iraqi crisis must be resolved by peaceful means and in the framework of international legitimacy."
- "To demand that the inspection teams should be given enough time to complete their mission … and to call upon them to continue to observe objectivity …"
- "To emphasise the UNSC's responsibility to ensure that Iraq and its people are not harmed, and to protect Iraq's independence and the integrity and unity of its territories …"

- "To re-affirm that their countries should refrain from taking part in any military action targeting the security, territorial integrity and unity of Iraq or any other Arab country."
- "To emphasise solidarity with the Iraqi people … and to stress that it is time to lift the sanctions imposed …"
- "The Kingdom of Bahrain to form a Presidential Committee …"
- "The affairs of the Arab world and development of its regimes are a thing decided by the peoples in the region in [a] way that suits their national interests, not by foreign interference. In this context the leaders denounce reported attempts to impose changes on the region, interfere in its internal affairs or ignore its interests and just causes."
- "To consider the disarmament of WMDs in Iraq an inseparable part of the WMD disarmament of the region, including Israel …"[265]

Mr John Sawers, British Ambassador to Egypt, reported that the proceedings had been broadcast live on Egyptian television and that the statements by Arab leaders had "displayed a more balanced approach than was evident from the communiqué".[266] Mr Hosni Mubarak, the Egyptian President, had said that the best way to solve the crisis would be for Iraq to comply with international law represented by the UN; and to co-operate fully with the inspectors. Mr Bashar al-Assad, the Syrian President, had said that war was inevitable and the region should focus on the aftermath of war. Sheikh Zayed, the Emir of Qatar, had tabled a written suggestion that Saddam Hussein should be given an amnesty and step down.

857. Sir David Manning and Mr Scarlett visited Mexico and Chile on 1 and 2 March to explain the UK's position to Presidents Fox and Lagos and to seek their support.

858. On 27 February, Mr Gregory Faulkner, British Ambassador to Chile, reported Chilean concerns that the Permanent Members of the Security Council were not seeking to resolve their differences on Iraq.[267] The Chileans thought that passed the buck for decision-taking to the non-permanent members, which was unfair. Chile wanted an amendment to the draft resolution asking the inspectors to produce a conclusive report within a specific deadline of a week to 10 days. This would also help Mexico.

859. Sir David Manning was reported to have told President Fox on 1 March that Mr Blair believed that matters had come to a head, UN credibility was eroding and containment was not sustainable.[268] Iraq must come clean now or face the consequences. Mr Blair was convinced that Iraq's WMD had to be dealt with now or we would face a worse situation later. The Iraqi declaration of 7 December 2002 had been a disappointment which did not address vital issues such as the whereabouts of anthrax and VX. Since then, the inspectors had been prevented from doing their job properly. War must be a last resort but the international community could not allow Saddam Hussein to play games and spin things out. Proper access to scientists was one key to progress.

860. Mr Scarlett was reported to have told President Fox that the UK had developed:

> "… a range of sources, some inside Iraq, that had proven reliability. We had built up a consistent picture in which we had confidence. Our allies, including Europeans, had no serious differences of substance with us …
> "While we believed that UNSCOM had been able to disarticulate Iraq's nuclear programme it had not been able to account for a wide range of chemical and biological materials – we were particularly worried about VX and anthrax. Even conservative estimates of material Iraq still held indicated the capacity to assemble thousands of WMD artillery shells. Since 1998 Iraq had continued to produce new agents, develop its missile capability and, with less success, reconstitute its nuclear programme.
> "In 2002 a conscious decision was taken to deny possession of WMD to frustrate a renewed and strengthened inspection programme. We had watched a policy of concealment and intimidation develop. Evidence had been dispersed, factories cleaned up and scientists cowed.
> "… Some UNMOVIC successes in January resulted in further efforts to hide evidence and deceive inspectors. Continued small successes forced Iraq to move to a policy of slow, small concessions to give the impression of movement (eg on missiles). For the UK, the litmus test would be interviews with scientists. Iraq realised their knowledge was their Achilles heel, hence the intimidation."

861. President Fox was reported to have listened carefully and with an open mind. Mexico wanted to continue to seek consensus. It did not like talk of action "with or without the UN"; overriding international institutions had grave internal consequences for countries nurturing fragile newly created institutions. He was attracted to the Canadian idea of benchmarking Iraqi co-operation.

862. Sir David Manning had concluded that Mexican support for a second resolution was "not impossible, but would not be easy and would almost certainly require some movement".

863. In a telephone conversation with Mr Blair on 2 March, before his meeting with Sir David Manning and Mr Scarlett, President Lagos wondered if there was room for clarification of what the Security Council was trying to achieve.[269] He was worried that talk of regime change was overshadowing the issue of disarmament in the media.

[269] Letter Cannon to Owen, 3 March 2003, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Conversation with President of Chile, 2 March'.

He wondered if the Council could set benchmarks and mentioned interviews with scientists. He understood UNMOVIC had interviewed only seven scientists. “Setting benchmarks … looked better than going to war over a few missiles.”

864. President Lagos said that he was calling on other P5 states to assume responsibility for what was going on. It was not acceptable for them to say: “We’ll abstain, it’s not our war”. He had told President Chirac that was not good enough; if he did not agree with the resolution, he should veto rather than shift the responsibility on to others. President Chirac had sent an emissary to try to win him [Lagos] over, but he thought it would be possible to work out a compromise in the Security Council “during the week” and he wanted to talk through the benchmarks idea with Sir David Manning.

865. Mr Blair recommended that Chile should look again at the 1999 UNSCOM report which made clear the scale of outstanding material and the extent of Iraqi deceit. The issues were the “unaccounted for WMD and the need for real co-operation”. The missiles were “a side issue”. Saddam Hussein “had admitted their existence thinking they were not in breach of sanctions”, and he “had had little choice but to destroy them when UNMOVIC decided that they were”.

866. Mr Blair stated that he:

> “… took [President] Lagos’ point about the need to be precise and specific about what the Security Council wanted. Otherwise people interpreted the destruction of the missiles as real progress and said that we should leave the inspectors in longer.”

867. President Lagos agreed. The real issue was CBW not missiles, and that should be put to the international community. Mr Blair was right that Saddam Hussein was only co-operating because of the pressure on him, but he wanted the P5 to “participate and assume their responsibilities”.

868. President Lagos added that the French political system seemed to be divided on a veto: “There was an internal discourse … But the French were not producing alternative ideas, they were just playing for time.” President Chirac had told him that he was against any deadline at all, not just that suggested by Canada.

869. Mr Blair stated that he was “in no doubt that Saddam had CBW and was concealing it”, but he “accepted the need to think about how to present the case”.

870. In his subsequent meeting with President Lagos, Sir David Manning was reported to have set out the need to act on Iraq to prevent other potential proliferators; the importance of the UN delivering after President Bush had been persuaded to go down the UN route; and Saddam Hussein’s failure to take his opportunity and the continued pattern of obstruction.[270] Sir David “regretted” the split in the Security Council; without it, Saddam Hussein might have cracked. The UK saw war as a last resort and “needed a second resolution because of public pressures"; it liked the Canadian idea of a deadline. Resolution 1441 already contained benchmarks, but they might have to be presented in a different way. Sir David had also said that, if it came to war, it would have to be "through the UN and with the UN heavily involved in the aftermath".

871. Mr Scarlett was reported to have described the intelligence assessment and, in response to a specific question, informed President Lagos that "although there were some differences of detail e.g. over the degree to which Saddam could weaponise, the French assessment was similar" to the UK's.

872. President Lagos repeated his concerns, including the difficulty of securing nine votes or winning the presentational battle without further clarification of Iraq's non-compliance, and his suggestions to identify benchmarks with a short deadline. Sir David Manning agreed to report the conversation to Mr Blair.

873. Mr Blair wrote in his memoir that, during February, "despite his best endeavours", divisions in the Security Council had grown not reduced; and that the "dynamics of disagreement" was producing new alliances. France, Germany and Russia were moving to create an alternative pole of power and influence.

874. Mr Blair thought that was "highly damaging" but "inevitable": "They felt as strongly as I did; and they weren't prepared to indulge the US, as they saw it."

875. Mr Blair concluded that for moral and strategic reasons the UK should be with the US.

876. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair had called him on 1 March "for a chat re Blix": "A combination of Blix and the recent moves by the Iraqis had got us on the back foot again." Mr Blair:

> "… felt it was all now about the politics of the UNSC, and would come down to a hard-headed argument for votes. It was all going to ebb and flow but we just had to keep going. He was clear that the consequences of not being with the US now were incalculable.
> "I said I felt there had been various points where we could have done something different vis-a-vis the US. He said no, the only way to have had influence with them was to be clear from the start that we would be with them when things got really tough. He was clear that our interests were aligned."[271]

877. In his memoir, Mr Blair wrote that, "politically, as well as to put the issue beyond any legal claim to the contrary, a second resolution was certainly desirable".[272] During

February 2003, "despite his best endeavours", divisions in the international community had grown not reduced:

> "The ten new accession countries [in the EU] came out strongly for the US position … Spain and Italy both supported action. Allies of the US outside Europe such as Japan and South Korea also rallied. So did many of the applicant countries for NATO. Australia gave unstinting and determined support.
> "But public opinion in many traditionally supportive countries, like Turkey was strongly anti. Canada decided they couldn't support without a new resolution, as did Mexico …
> "Basically, there were nations for whom the American alliance was a fundamental part of their foreign policy. They tended to back the US. Then there were those for whom the alliance was important, but not fundamental. They backed off … the dynamics of disagreement then started to fashion new alliances, with France, Germany and Russia, in particular, moving to create an alternative pole of power and influence."

878. Mr Blair added:

> "I thought this was highly damaging; but I also understood it was inevitable. They felt as strongly as I did; and they weren't prepared to indulge the US, as they saw it. They thought conflict would harm relations between the West and Islam, and of course the more they said this, the more they rather played into that analysis and strengthened it.
> "… I agreed with the basic US analysis of Saddam as a threat; I thought he was a monster; and to break the US partnership in such circumstances, when America's key allies were all rallying round, would in my view, then (and now) have done major long-term damage to that relationship.
> "I had one last throw of the dice. The problem which sensible opinion had with it all was the feeling that it was a rush to war … the US position was that this was all very well but … they couldn't simply wait until a diplomatic dance, which they had fair evidence for thinking would be interminable, was played out. Their position was: resolution 1441 was a final chance; if he didn't take it; if we give him time, we just allow him to mess us around as he has before; he won't reform; we're kidding ourselves if we think he will; so let's go and get the job done.
> "The inspectors' reports were at best inconclusive, but they certainly weren't evidence of 'immediate, unconditional and active compliance'. The US was champing at the bit. President Bush was actually losing support by waiting. The international community was split. The party was split. I was between numerous rocks and hard places.

> "The strain on everyone around me was almost unbearable …
> "Gradually I did deal with it. I sat and reasoned it all through. I knew in the final analysis I would be with the US, because it was right morally and strategically. But we should make a last ditch attempt for a peaceful solution. First to make the moral case for removing Saddam … Second, to try one more time to reunite the international community behind a clear base for action in the event of a continuing breach."

879. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair had telephoned him at 7:45am on 3 March and was:

> "… even more worried than he had been on Friday. He felt things were just not where they needed to be. David M[anning] and John Scarlett came back from their weekend trip … both countries were very firmly on the fence and could see no reason to come off it. TB said it was still possible we could get a majority on the UNSC but if it was in circumstances where people felt we bullied and arm-twisted, the French would be less worried about putting down a veto. The Americans were frankly alienating people by their tactics. David M said the message these smaller countries got was the basic assumption from the Americans that they would come over in the end.
> "I said … that our problem on the communications front was largely caused by US friendly fire … They looked the whole time like they were desperate for war. We at least didn't look like we were desperate for war, but we did look like we were desperate to be with them … TB said he would have to tell Bush that it was not possible to get the votes at the moment. It was totally what they didn't want to hear but they had to hear it from someone. He was very down on the Americans … I sensed they were becoming irritated with us …"[273]

880. Mr Campbell added that the destruction of missiles had "tipped the balance" of public opinion "towards giving the inspectors more time". Mr Blair was "moving to the Canadian position of a bit more time to get the questions finally answered".

881. Mr Straw proposed an offer of safety and immunity if Saddam Hussein would go into exile and returned to the earlier idea of setting out publicly some key benchmarks against which Iraq's "full and active" compliance could be judged.

882. Mr Straw spoke twice to Secretary Powell on 2 March to discuss progress in securing support for the UK/US/Spanish draft resolution and possible ideas for addressing the concerns that had been raised by other members of the Security Council.[274]

[274] Letter Straw to Manning, 3 March 2003, 'Iraq: Conversations with Colin Powell, 2 March'.

883. In a discussion on the position of Russia, Secretary Powell said that Mr Ivanov had stated that there was nothing in it for Russia to vote for the second resolution. It meant an end to inspections and Iraq's neighbours were not threatened by Saddam Hussein.

884. In the context of remarks reported to have been made during a visit to China, Secretary Powell had asked Mr Ivanov if Russia would veto the second resolution. Mr Ivanov had responded, "You know me better than that"; he had simply been explaining that, under the UN Charter, Russia had the right of veto but he had avoided getting drawn into whether it would be used. Secretary Powell would be urging President Bush to speak to President Putin.

885. Mr Straw reported that he had told Secretary Powell that the level of support in the UK for military action without a second resolution was palpably "very low". In that circumstance, even if a majority in the Security Council had voted for the resolution with only France exercising its veto, he was "increasingly pessimistic about whether we could carry the Party" to support military action.

886. Mr Straw added that the debate in the UK was:

> "… significantly defined by the tone of the debate in Washington and particularly remarks made by the President and others to the right of him, which suggested that the US would go to war whatever and was not bothered about a second resolution one way or another."

887. Mr Straw had proposed consideration of additional language in the second resolution "pledging immunity to Saddam and entourage if he were to leave Iraq by a specific date". Secretary Powell had declined, commenting that he did not think Saddam Hussein would agree.

888. Mr Straw sought Mr Blair's agreement to adding an ultimatum to the draft resolution.[275]

889. Mr Straw wrote: "Things may be moving towards a majority but I will not believe it until it happens", There were concerns that the draft resolution looked like a "fait accompli" and a "blank cheque for war". Key potential allies "needed a better reason" for supporting the resolution.

890. Mr Straw's view was that the language in the resolution on performance targets and deadlines would not be acceptable "to either US or UK for obvious reasons", but he had "two thoughts":

- an offer, subject to legal advice, of safety and immunity if Saddam Hussein would go into exile; and
- returning to the earlier idea of setting out publicly some key benchmarks against which Iraq's "full and active" compliance could be judged.

[275] Minute Straw to Prime Minister, 3 March 2003, 'Iraq: Second Resolution'.

891. Mr Straw thought that an ultimatum had "significant" advantages: "It would indicate that we still wanted a peaceful outcome to the crisis; help get the moderate Arabs on board; help our friends on the Security Council; and put France especially on the spot." It might make France "think twice about a veto"; "they knew as well as we did that he [Saddam Hussein] was only likely to take it [the final opportunity offered in resolution 1441] when he knew for certain there was no other way out".

892. Mr Straw suggested that the "clusters" document could be turned to the UK's advantage by "setting out a few carefully selected tests" and pointing to the document for further amplification. There was a risk that Saddam Hussein might produce "thousands of pages of commentary" and the UK would need to keep the emphasis on the need for "compelling evidence that he was now committed to full and active compliance".

893. Mr Straw advised that, to "be credible with the middle ground", his proposals would need "another week or two" to "convince some of the crucial swing voters". In his view, that might "be possible without disrupting the military plan".

894. On 3 March, Mr Blair proposed an approach focused on setting a deadline of 17 March for Iraq to disclose evidence relating to the destruction of prohibited items and interviews; and an amnesty if Saddam Hussein left by 21 March.

895. In a conversation with Mr Jan Peter Balkenende, the Dutch Prime Minister, Mr Blair commented that "Saddam was still playing around"; and that he was "struck by the parallels with 1997-98".[276] The "situation would be clearer by the middle of the week"; the UK was "working flat out to get the votes in the Security Council". Mr Blair stated that "a majority in the Security Council with a French veto would be almost as good as a SCR". He hoped the French were carefully considering the implications of a veto. "Unless Saddam co-operated in full, the inspectors would never find all the WMD: the history of UNSCOM showed a pattern of Iraqi concealment and deceit."

896. In a conversation with Mr Anders Fogh Rasmussen, the Danish Prime Minister, Mr Blair stated that "the 'middle group' in the Security Council was moving in the right direction. We needed to focus on the facts that Saddam had still not accounted for the WMD identified by UNSCOM up to 1998 and no real interviews of scientists had taken place."[277]

897. Mr Blair also told Mr Rasmussen that he thought the timing "would move pretty quickly – days rather than weeks" after Dr Blix's report on 7 March; and that the Americans would take action if there was no further resolution.

898. Mr Rycroft sought Mr Blair's agreement to a strategy to secure the Chilean vote, adding that if that was obtained, "we will probably also get the Mexicans". President

Lagos was "In particular … looking for a little more time and a report from Blix judging Saddam's compliance against specific benchmarks".

899. Mr Rycroft suggested that the three main elements of a strategy could be:

- "A slight change to the draft resolution." We could add in explicit references to the reports from Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei, concluding that they confirmed either that Saddam Hussein had "failed to comply with, and co-operate fully in the implementation" of resolution 1441, or that Iraq had "failed to take the final opportunity" afforded by the resolution.
- "Benchmarks." Making public "in the next day or so what is required of Saddam in one or more key areas". The benchmarks would not be set out in the resolution but the date of the vote would provide a deadline for compliance. That would allow Chile to say that "as there is not full compliance", it would vote for the resolution.
- "Offer of exile/amnesty to Saddam." Making "clear publicly again that we are not intent on war come what may, and that we are determined to explore every last avenue for peace. This includes making clear that we support Arab attempts to get Saddam to leave Iraq and go into exile in exchange for an amnesty."[278]

900. Mr Blair produced a handwritten note on 3 March setting out a list of potential actions, including;

- Setting Saddam Hussein a deadline of 17 March for disclosure of documentation and proof of destruction.
- Presenting the "20 best" scientists for interview outside Iraq, with their families identified and their safety guaranteed.
- If Saddam Hussein failed, giving him until 21 March to leave Iraq with an agreed amnesty.
- A declaration "by the nine/ten [non-permanent members of the Security Council]" endorsed by Canada.
- A "launch" following Dr Blix's report to the Security Council on 7 March in Chile or Mexico.
- "… trying to persuade Russia".
- Agreeing a:
  - UN role in post-conflict Iraq;
  - broad-based government; and
  - humanitarian effort.
- Making "a last plea to France not to veto but to help".
- Publishing an "analysis of Saddam's deception alongside the … declaration".[279]

[278] Minute Rycroft to Prime Minister, 3 March 2003, 'Iraq: Securing the Chilean Vote'.
[279] Note (handwritten) [Blair], 3 March 2003, [untitled].

901. A typed version of Mr Blair's note, with Mr Rycroft's comments, is published with this report.[280]

902. A separate minute from Mr Rycroft, stating "You asked for a plan we could work up with the Mexicans and Chileans, as a way of bringing them to vote for the second resolution", elaborated on the suggestion of identifying benchmarks to define "full co-operation", making clear that judgements were for the Security Council; and that Dr Blix's reports "would form an important basis for the facts underpinning the judgements".[281]

903. Mr Rycroft added that that differed from previous work on benchmarks because it was "us" not Dr Blix "putting forward the benchmarks and answering the questions on Iraqi compliance".

904. The minute set out the key demands in resolution 1441 and a note listing benchmarks on biological weapons, chemical weapons, missiles, documentation and personnel. On tactics and timing, Mr Rycroft advised Mr Blair:

- "we face an uphill struggle securing US agreement to any further time".
- The judgements on Iraqi performance "must not" be tied to Dr Blix's report to the Security Council on 7 March, and the UK should not "seek or encourage a further Blix report after 7 March".
- The UK "must avoid at all costs a further Council decision after our second resolution".
- The UK "could be vague publicly about when we would judge Iraqi behaviour".
- The UK "would have to make clear privately to the US that we were talking about making those judgements at some point next week or at the latest early in the week of 17 March".

905. Mr Rycroft also wrote:

- Sir David Manning had not seen the proposals.
- Mr Straw wanted to talk to Mr Blair "as soon as possible".
- The FCO opposed benchmarks on the grounds that Saddam Hussein would fulfil a few of them.
- The UK needed to make clear that "full, positive answers to all of the questions" would be needed to demonstrate full co-operation – "destruction of a handful of Al Samouds is a small part of the picture".
- Sir Jeremy Greenstock should advise on the tactics: "His advice so far is that we should not respond to the Chilean concerns until after 7 March, because it may be unnecessary if by then the Chileans intend to vote for our resolution and because it would cause a split with the US …"

[281] Minute Rycroft to Prime Minister, 3 March 2003, 'Iraq, Blix, Benchmarks and More Time?'

906. Following a discussion with Mr Blair, Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that Mr Blair:

> "… was concerned that, having shifted world (and British) public opinion over the months, it had now been seriously set back in recent days. We were not in the right position. The Prime Minister was considering a number of ideas which he might well put to the President."[282]

907. Mr Straw recorded that Secretary Powell had advised that if Mr Blair wanted to make proposals, he should do so quickly.

908. Mr Straw also recorded that the US was not enthusiastic about the inclusion of an immunity clause for Saddam Hussein in the resolution. He had told Secretary Powell that Mr Blair had thought that "might be seen as premature"; and that "if necessary" it might be done "at the appropriate time in a separate resolution".

909. Mr Straw reported that he and Secretary Powell had discussed the problems in the UK. Secretary Powell had told President Bush that he judged a vetoed resolution would no longer be possible for the UK. Mr Straw said that he had been told that, without a second resolution, only 100 Conservative MPs would vote with the Government. In those circumstances, approval for military action would be "beyond reach".

910. In the context of a discussion about the lack of real serious US planning for post-conflict, the number of troops that might be required to secure the ground behind the US advance to Baghdad, and the role envisaged for the UN, Mr Straw recorded that he had told Secretary Powell that, "whilst the US Administration had to be the best judge of its long term interests", he "thought that it would reap a whirlwind if it failed to secure legitimacy for what it was doing in respect of Iraq. We were not there yet."

911. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that Dr Blix continued to see attractions in the Canadian proposal but was talking about a deadline of 1 May or 1 June.

912. Sir Jeremy Greenstock's report of discussions in New York on 3 March, included:

- Discussion with the US delegation about:
  - US thinking that a French veto would not severely undercut the legitimacy of military action and Ambassador Negroponte's "guess" that France was "talking up the veto to deter us from putting the resolution to a vote".
  - Setting Iraq a deadline for Iraq to be "unconditionally disarmed" by 17 or 21 March with the UK suggesting a variant setting a deadline by which Iraq would have "failed to take its final opportunity".
- In response to a suggestion from Sir Jeremy Greenstock that it might make more sense for UNMOVIC temporarily to withdraw before any vote on a resolution, Dr Blix said he would discuss that with Mr Annan, but "he would not want to be accused of playing to a minority in the Council".

[282] Letter Straw to Manning, 4 March 2003, 'Iraq: Conversation with Colin Powell, 3 March'.

- Dr Blix would circulate the "clusters" document to the Security Council on 7 March, but the work programme would not be ready.
- Dr Blix was concerned that while it was possible to establish material balances up to 1998, it was less clear how Iraq's flat denial of any activity since then should be treated.
- Iraq was being "hyper-active"; there has been some private interviews over the previous weekend, one of which – on UAVs – had been "informative". In response to UK questions reflecting concerns that interviews would still be monitored, Dr Blix said that interviewees had not been searched and "there could of course be bugs in the room".
- Dr Blix saw attractions in the Canadian proposal, which would help to unite the Council around key tests, which were becoming evident from the "clusters" document, and a deadline; and had mentioned possible deadlines of 1 May or 1 June.
- The UK had argued that the risk was that "we would simply end up back at square one a couple of months hence".
- In a separate E10 discussion of the Canadian proposal, Germany had declared it could not countenance an ultimatum and others "had not seemed particularly interested, perhaps as it brought the Council back to the same place in the end".
- The majority of the E10 were more concerned about US statements the previous weekend that the aim of US action was regime change.[283]

913. In separate advice "on the end game options", Sir Jeremy Greenstock stated that there was little chance of bridging the gap with the French – "senior politicians were dug in too deep"; and that a French veto appeared "more of a danger than failure to get nine votes".[284]

914. Sir Jeremy had told Mr Annan that "the UK would not give up on finding a non-war route if we possibly could"; and that "the French/German/Russian proposal … merely diminished the pressure on Saddam".

915. Sir Jeremy identified the options as:

- "… stay firm … and go with the US military campaign in the second half of March with the best arguments we can muster … if a second resolution … is unobtainable, we fall back on 1441 and regret that the UN was not up to it …";
- "… make some small concessions that might just be enough to get, e.g. Chile and Mexico on board". The "most obvious step" might be "ultimatum language" making military action the default if the Council did not agree that Iraq had come into compliance with resolution 1441;

[284] Telegram 339 UKMIS New York to FCO London, 4 March 2003, 'Personal Iraq: End Game Options'.

- "… try something on benchmarks, probably building on Blix's cluster document". That "would be better done outside the draft resolution" to "avoid diluting 1441 (and avoid placing too much weight on Blix's shoulders)";
- "… putting forward a second resolution not authorising force", although it was clear that Sir Jeremy envisaged there would be an "eventual use of force";
- "… a peaceful introduction of forces into Iraq for the purposes of complete disarmament". That would be a "genuine last resort", which would "cut across the short-term timetable of the Americans and could only be feasible if there was a genuine wish to avoid an international bust-up." As Saddam Hussein would be unlikely to co-operate, it would be a longer route to military action.

916. Commenting that the talk of vetoes "may be as much to scare us off as an indication of genuine voting intentions", Sir Jeremy concluded:

"We will need to:

- remain robust that disarmament must be achieved, that there is very little time left, and that we are willing to contemplate military action without a further resolution if necessary;
- keep up the lobbying with key swing voters, but also with Russia (… even if the noises right now are negative), so that France increasingly faces the prospect of an isolated veto;
- work on a sample ultimatum that could be proposed by Chile or Mexico …;
- continue to reflect internally on whether we would rather:
  - force a vote …;
  - not force a vote …"

917. Sir Jeremy concluded: "So long as we have enough swing votes, the simplest route may just be to force our (slightly amended) resolution to a vote, and test the French to veto or not."

918. Mr Ricketts told Mr Straw that he and Sir David Manning had discussed Sir Jeremy's telegrams and believed that the "best package" might comprise:

- Adding a deadline to the draft resolution requiring "a bit more time". A US suggestion "that Iraq should have 'unconditionally disarmed' in ten days" would be "seen as unreasonable".
- A small number of carefully chosen benchmarks "set out separately from the resolution, ideally by the Chileans and Mexicans … We could then use the clusters document to illustrate how little compliance there had been across the board."
- The US to make clear that it "accepted a significant UN role in post-conflict Iraq".[285]

[285] Minute Ricketts to Private Secretary [FCO], 4 March 2003, 'Iraq: UN Tactics'.

919. On 4 March, Sir David Manning and Dr Rice discussed progress in securing support for the resolution, including the desire of some members of the Security Council for clear evidence of Saddam's failure to comply to justify a vote for a second resolution and possible amendments.[286] Sir David said that "interviews were a litmus test of Saddam's intentions"; UNMOVIC "would be having no difficulties … if Saddam had nothing to hide". He also suggested pre-empting the argument that Dr Blix's "clusters" document might provide the benchmark needed for full Iraqi disarmament: "Instead we should emphasise that Blix was producing a list … of all the disarmament tasks that Saddam had failed to undertake …"

920. Sir David told Dr Rice that the vote on the resolution should not take place until "we knew we could get nine votes".

921. Mr Straw told the Foreign Affairs Committee on 4 March that it was "a matter of fact" that Iraq had been in material breach "for some weeks" and resolution 1441 provided sufficient legal authority to justify military action against Iraq if it was "in further material breach". He emphasised Iraq's attempts to conceal its capabilities and deceive the inspectors.

922. Mr Straw also stated that a majority of members of the Security Council had been opposed to the suggestion that resolution 1441 should state explicitly that military action could be taken only if there were a second resolution.

923. Mr Straw gave evidence to the Foreign Affairs Committee on 4 March.[287]

924. In an opening statement setting out the UK Government's position on Iraq's failure to comply with resolution 1441, Mr Straw said that Saddam Hussein's tactics had been:

> "… to deny the existence of weapons of mass destruction and, if caught out, to offer the smallest concession possible in order to work for delay … We can expect more concessions right up to the point at which Saddam Hussein concludes that the international community has, once again, been lured into doing exactly what he wants. Then the concessions will stop, and Saddam Hussein will be left in possession of an arsenal of deadly weapons."

925. Mr Straw stated that it was assessed that Iraq had the capability to produce a range of chemical and biological agents and:

> "The Iraqi regime has put up an elaborate screen of concealment based on intimidation and deception to cover this capability … [W]e know that sensitive materials and documents have been hidden in the homes of employees and hidden too in hospitals, farms and other sites. Intelligence also suggests that WMD-related items may have been buried and others were being kept on the move every 12 hours using trucks and trains. Throughout the period of inspection

[287] Minutes, Foreign Affairs Committee (House of Commons), 4 March 2003, [Evidence Session].

> Iraq's security and intelligence agencies have been monitoring UNMOVIC and the IAEA and plans are available to obstruct them if they come close to WMD itself … Iraq is particularly concerned about … interviews of scientists and others because if they were carried out as mandated by [resolution] 1441 they would unquestionably expose the regime's deception and its stockpile of weapons … In early December we know that Saddam Hussein issued instructions that scientists were to be threatened with serious consequences for themselves and their families if they revealed any sensitive information to UNMOVIC. They were ordered not to agree to any interviews taking place outside Iraq … The potential witnesses have been coached in the answers they have to give. Some of them have been removed from their homes and places of work and detained to prevent them from being interviewed."

926. Mr Straw added:

> "… we can expect Iraq will continue trickling out so-called concessions, one at a time, at the last minute to split the Security Council and buy more time while continuing an active policy of concealment; to start trickling out 'newly discovered' documents as part of a co-ordinated plan to tie down UNMOVIC on what the regime considers to be expendable parts of its WMD programme. We can also expect Iraq soon to announce that interviews may take place unaccompanied …"

927. Mr Straw concluded that it was clear that:

> "… Saddam Hussein believes he can once again divide and outwit the international community through a pretence of co-operation. We cannot afford to send him … any signal, that he is close to success … He is also hoping that he final opportunity, which was originally afforded to him 12 years ago and then repeated by 1441, was not final at all …"

928. Mr Straw was asked a series of questions by Mr Donald Anderson, the Chairman of the Committee, about the legality of military action without a second resolution.

929. Asked about Mr Blair's "escape clause" and whether the Government "would not feel bound to await" a second resolution "or to abide by it if it were to be vetoed unreasonably", Mr Straw replied:

> "The reason why we have drawn a parallel with Kosovo is … it was not possible to get a direct Security Council resolution and instead the Government and those that participated in the action had to fall back on previous … resolutions and general international law … to justify the action that was taken … We are satisfied that we have sufficient legal authority in 1441 back to the originating resolution 660 [1990] … to justify military action against Iraq if they are in further material breach."

930. Mr Straw added that was "clearly laid down and it was anticipated when we put 1441 together". The Government would "much prefer" military action, if that proved necessary, "to be backed by a second resolution", but it had had to reserve its options if such a second resolution did not prove possible. That was what Mr Blair had "spelt out".

931. Asked if the Government should proceed without the express authority of the UN, Mr Straw replied:

> "We believe there is express authority … There was a … a very intensive debate – about whether … 1441 should say explicitly … that military action to enforce this resolution could only be taken if there were a second resolution. That … was not acceptable to a majority of members of the Security Council, it was never put before the … Council. Instead … what the Council has to do … is to consider the situation …"

932. Mr Straw told Sir Patrick Cormack (Conservative) that Iraq had "been in material breach as a matter of fact for some weeks now because they were told they had to co-operate immediately, unconditionally and actively". He added:

> "… we are anxious to gain a political consensus, if that can be achieved … which recognises the state of Iraq's flagrant violation of its obligations. As far as … the British Government is concerned, that is a matter of fact; the facts speak for themselves."

933. Mr Straw also stated:

> "What we also believe, because we want this crisis resolved peacefully, is that the only way you are going to get this active, immediate and full co-operation by Saddam Hussein, even at this late stage, is if he realises fully what the alternative is … [F]or all the suggestions that it is diplomacy that has brought about what co-operation there has been … it has come about … above all, by the fact that there are now a large number of US and UK troops stationed on Saddam's doorstep concentrating his mind."

934. Asked by Mr Andrew MacKinlay (Labour) how there was going to be "proper conscious decision-making" about whether Iraq was complying, Mr Straw replied:

> "… we make our judgement on the basis of the best evidence. I have to say it was on the basis of the best evidence that the international community made its judgement on 8 November. They had hundreds of pages of reports …"

935. Mr Straw also told Mr Mackinley that:

- "by simply passing …1441" Saddam Hussein "readmitted the inspectors having said he would not".
- "I have seen nothing at all which says we have to take action immediately because of military planning necessities. The point we are making … is that the reason we want immediate compliance is because that is what the Security Council said … 110 days … is stretching the meaning of the word 'immediate' to breaking point."

- France took "the view that it was possible by continuous diplomacy to secure Saddam Hussein's compliance. We take a different view. I think the facts and history are with us."

IAEA position on Iraq's nuclear programme

The FCO advised No.10 on 4 March that the UK Mission in Vienna had confirmed that the IAEA was on the verge of closing the file on nuclear issues in Iraq, despite information from the UK that had "still not been followed up".[288] The IAEA had apparently concluded that:

- There was "no significant evidence that Iraq had attempted to procure uranium from Niger". The documents the IAEA had seen "that formed the basis of such an allegation appeared to be forgeries".
- Aluminium tubes, "although imported illegally", were "not connected with a gas centrifuge programme". The Iraqis had "satisfactorily explained the use of the tubes, and the reasons for their various fine tolerances". The Iraqis "were no longer (if ever) in a position to manufacture a gas centrifuge, especially without foreign assistance".
- There was "no evidence to link the magnets with a covert nuclear programme"; the IAEA had found the part in the guidance system of a missile.
- The IAEA had evidence that a significant amount of the missing 32 tonnes of HMX (a high explosive used to help trigger nuclear fission), had been used for commercial purposes, as the Iraqis had claimed".

The positions of other members of the Security Council

936. Sir John Holmes advised on 4 March that France was intent on preventing the US and UK mustering the nine positive votes required for a majority in the Security Council.

937. Sir John Holmes confirmed on 4 March that France's main aim was to "avoid being put on the spot" by influencing the undecided, preventing the US and UK mustering nine votes, and keeping alongside the Russians and Chinese; and that there was "nothing that we can now do to dissuade them from this course".[289] He advised that "nothing the French say at this stage, even privately, should be taken at face value".

938. If the French strategy failed, Sir John advised that "a lone French veto remains hard to imagine but is by no means out of the question".

[289] Telegram 110 Paris to FCO London, 4 March 2003, 'Iraq: Avoiding a French Veto'.

939. Sir John repeated his advice of 24 February that Mr Blair (and President Bush) should, "if and when it becomes clear that we have the votes, and that the Russians and Chinese will not veto", attempt to dissuade President Chirac.

940. A subsequent telegram set out the key elements of the French position and the suggestions for arguments the UK might use.[290] They included:

- France had repeatedly said that war was the worst of all possible solutions, but "war had been made more likely by Saddam's ability to exploit differences in the international community". The chances of Saddam Hussein taking the opportunity to avoid war looked "slim". A veto would not help and "the only conceivable way of achieving a peaceful solution now is to increase the pressure on Saddam by re-establishing the maximum degree of consensus in the UN".
- France had argued that war was a disproportionate response to the threat posed by Saddam Hussein's WMD, but the point had been reached where failure to act firmly caused "disproportionate damage to the credibility of the will of the international community and to wider efforts to limit the proliferation of WMD".
- If war became inevitable, it would be easier to "limit the destabilising effect elsewhere in the region, about which France has rightly been concerned, if military intervention is seen to be taken with the authority of the international community".
- Weakening UN credibility would make it more difficult "to re-establish the clear and authoritative UN-backed administration and the rapid transition to a civil regime in Iraq … and more difficult for Europe to play the role the region and the world will need at that point".

941. Separately, Dr Michael Williams, Mr Straw's Special Adviser, sent Mr Straw an analysis of the use of the veto by France.[291] He did not think France would veto on its own; but if it believed Moscow would veto, the second resolution would be lost. It was "perhaps most likely, if the yes votes creep up to nine and beyond", that France would "back down and say it accepts a majority verdict". But the UK could not rely on that. Dr Williams advised that a strategy was needed which reminded France "of the dangers and consequences of its present course of action"; and that would need Mr Blair's engagement.

942. The analysis was sent to Sir David Manning and was seen by Mr Blair.

943. Sir Roderic Lyne, British Ambassador to Russia, had reported on 27 February that Russia's position was hardening and it largely agreed with President Chirac. President Putin would find it hard to vote in favour of military action without a "smoking gun" or near-consensus in the Security Council.

[290] Telegram 111 Paris to FCO London, 4 March 2003, 'Iraq: Avoiding a French Veto – Arguments to Use with the French'.
[291] Minute Williams to Secretary of State [FCO], 4 March 2003, 'France and the Security Council'.

944. Sir Roderic had reported on 27 February that: "Influenced by Paris and Berlin", Russia's position was hardening and it "largely agreed with" President Chirac. The policy was "to stay with (and behind) the French and Germans while trying not to antagonise the Americans". Russia recognised that US action was "not far off": "Their preferred option is to prevent nine positive votes and thus avoid an awkward choice on the veto." Russia was "unlikely to be the first to break ranks", and it seemed "far-fetched" to conceive of Russia "helping the UK to get the swing votes [in the Security Council]".[292]

945. Sir Roderic wrote:

> "In the political class, almost everyone would vote for endless containment rather than conflict. US arguments for bringing this to a head are not accepted. There is nervousness about the wider consequences. US policy is seen as potentially dangerous, and part of a right wing 'axis-of-evil' agenda … no-one to the right of the Communists is arguing that Russia should obstruct the Americans. The prevailing mood is that Russia should not endorse the war, but should stand to one side …"

946. President Putin "would find it very hard to justify internally a vote in favour of war, absent a smoking gun or a Security Council near-consensus". The Russians did "worry about the UN's authority"; but they did not "buy our argument that this obliges them to support the US regardless". They would "prefer it if we were forced not to put our resolution to the vote".

947. Sir Roderic concluded:

> "The best, and probably the only, chance of getting the Russians onside without a smoking gun would be for [President] Bush to spell out personally to [President] Putin that support for the resolution will determine the future of the US/Russian relationship."

948. Mr Ivanov told Mr Straw on 4 March that Russia had failed in an attempt to persuade Saddam Hussein to leave and it would veto a resolution based on the draft circulated on 24 February. President Bush had already decided to go to war.

949. Mr Straw reported that he had told Mr Ivanov that the international community had no choice but to pay attention to President Bush's priorities.

950. During his visit to London on 4 and 5 March, Mr Ivanov informed Mr Straw that Mr Yevgeny Primakov, the former Russian Prime Minister, had just visited Baghdad in a failed attempt to persuade Saddam Hussein to leave.[293] Russia, and others, would veto the resolution tabled on 24 February. Mr Ivanov also expressed doubts about claims that military action in Iraq would be quick.

[292] Telegram 68 Moscow to FCO London, 27 February 2003, 'Ivanov's Visit to London: Iraq'.
[293] Telegram 37 FCO London to Moscow, 3 [sic] March 2003, 'Iraq: Foreign Secretary's Meetings with Russian Foreign Minister, 4 March'.

951. In response to a comment from Mr Ivanov that President Bush had already decided to go to war, Mr Straw responded that President Bush "would go to war unless – and the unless had to be big and happen quickly".

952. In a discussion on the draft resolution, Mr Straw stated that the UK had never taken the position that draft text was "take it or leave it". He had no problem in principle with tough benchmarks and a very tight timeline; but if an initial 120 days was followed by another 120 days, "momentum would dribble away. Saddam Hussein only responded because of military pressure and that could not be sustained for ever.

953. Mr Straw proposed additional language for the draft resolution setting a deadline for a Security Council decision on whether Iraq had "clearly begun the process of full active disarmament as provided by [resolutions 1441 and 687]", together with a "private understanding about the targets Iraq had to reach". Mr Straw was reported to have said that he was "very allergic to timelines and public benchmarks" which "could lead to a tick in the box mentality by Saddam and good opportunities for further game playing".

954. In his subsequent discussion with Secretary Powell, Mr Straw said that he had told Mr Ivanov that he thought war could be avoided if Saddam went into exile and there was real evidence that Iraq was co-operating in its own disarmament.[294]

955. Later in the conversation, in response to a question about why Iraq was being targeted, Mr Straw had replied that "Iraq was President Bush's No.1 priority; the international community had no choice but to pay attention to Bush's priorities".

956. Mr Ivanov told Mr Blair that Russia was looking for concrete demands and a decision on how much time was needed to resolve the issues.

957. In his meeting with Mr Ivanov on 5 March, Mr Blair explained that the threat from terrorist groups and unstable states meant that Iraq must be dealt with firmly.[295] The issue was whether Iraq was co-operating to the extent required by resolution 1441. If the UN route did not work on this occasion, the US would not use it for a very long time. If Saddam Hussein made a genuine change, the inspectors could have as much time as they liked.

958. Mr Ivanov had made it clear that Russia was looking for concrete demands and a decision on how much time was needed to resolve all the issues; and that Russia would not be able to support any decision that ran counter to its principles.

959. The record described the meeting as "constructive", but that "everything that Ivanov said was consistent with his public threat of the use of a Russian veto of our current draft".

[295] Letter Rycroft to Sinclair, 5 March 2003, 'Iraq/Russia'.

960. Mr Straw agreed after the meeting with Mr Blair that Mr Ivanov could share Mr Straw's proposals with Mr de Villepin and Mr Fischer.[296]

961. France, Germany and Russia stated on 5 March that they would not let a resolution pass that authorised the use of force.

962. Mr de Villepin, Mr Ivanov and Mr Fischer met in Paris on 5 March.

963. In a press conference after the meeting the Foreign Ministers declared that they would "not allow a resolution to pass that authorises resorting to force".[297] Russia and France, "as Permanent Members of the Security Council, will assume all their responsibilities on this point".

964. Sir Christopher Hum, British Ambassador to China, advised on 4 March that if the resolution was put to a vote that day, China would abstain.

965. Mr William Ehrman, FCO Director General Defence and Intelligence and Mr Straw's Special Envoy, met the Chinese Vice Foreign Minister, Mr Wang Guangya, and a senior official from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA), on 4 March.[298]

966. The report of the meeting with Mr Wang records that, following a briefing on the UK's assessment of Iraq's non-co-operation and the need for a second resolution, China's view was that Iraq must bear the major responsibility for failing to co-operate fully, but believed inspections should be given more time. Although it might take longer to resolve the issue by peaceful means, the time taken would be worth it. There was a common desire amongst the international community to avoid war. Unanimity was important for upholding the authority of the UN. China was still studying the draft resolution. Pressing for a vote now would split the Council and harm its authority.

967. Mr Ehrman had referred to the points emphasised by Mr Blair in his speech to Parliament on 25 February. He told Mr Wang that Saddam Hussein's behaviour since the middle of 2002, when he had directed the implementation of a concealment policy, had been "instructive"; and Saddam's aim was to buy time. Mr Ehrman described key elements of the concealment policy and stated that much of the evidence in the UK's September 2002 dossier "had been supported or confirmed subsequently by UNMOVIC (for example the range of the Al Samoud 2 rockets)". Despite Iraq's efforts, the UN inspectors had found a number of undeclared items and "Iraq itself had 'found' four empty chemical warheads and one aerial bomb containing biological agent". Iraq was particularly concerned about interviews with scientists because "if carried out as mandated they would expose Iraq's WMD programme" and had obstructed the process. The UK "judged it unlikely that Saddam would leave" and "faced with military defeat, Saddam would be prepared to use CBW". Saddam "had not taken the final opportunity afforded to him by … 1441".

968. Mr Ehrman set out the UK difficulties with the tripartite French/German/Russian proposal and stated that the UK/US/Spanish resolution "would increase pressure on Iraq". There was still a chance for Iraq to take radical action to disarm and the resolution "was the only remaining route to peaceful disarmament".

969. In the separate meeting with a senior MFA official, Mr Ehrman had repeated the briefing and emphasised the importance of preserving international order and international law. The UK had made great efforts in persuading the US that it should use the UN route; that "should not now be lost".[299]

970. Mr Hum advised that China had "appreciated" the UK's willingness to share its assessments; but that "if a vote occurred today, I have little doubt they would abstain".

971. Baroness Amos advised on 4 March that Angola, Cameroon and Guinea were not yet ready to commit to a "yes vote" and had emphasised the need for P5 unity.

972. Following a visit for discussions with the Presidents of Angola, Cameroon and Guinea, Baroness Amos reported to Mr Straw that:

> "… our approach to the visits was right with a focus on our strong relationship with Africa … our desire to work with each of the countries in partnership and to share intelligence information available to us about the situation in Iraq …
> "All three listened carefully to our arguments, in particular the need to keep the UN in control of events, to keep the US engaged in multilateral fora and that the harassment and intimidation faced by the weapons inspectors made a nonsense of a longer inspection regime."[300]

973. Baroness Amos wrote: "I think we won the argument"; and that:

> "… it might be possible to secure the votes. But – as expected – none of the three were prepared to commit themselves explicitly to a yes vote … They would all much prefer to abstain than have to choose between us and the US on the one hand and France and Africa on the other. I was struck by the same argument from all three, the importance of unity amongst the P5 … and the need for a majority in the Security Council …"

974. Baroness Amos cautioned that the UK and US would need to stay in close touch to ensure that lobbying was complementary and to avoid being perceived to be harassing the African members of the Security Council. In addition, "some of what is appearing in the press about 'inducements' to secure votes only makes it harder for the Africans to come on board".

975. The report was sent to Sir Michael Jay, Sir Jeremy Greenstock and Sir Richard Dearlove. It was also widely circulated within No.10.

976. Mr Rycroft commented to Mr Blair: "An effective visit, but the three votes are not yet in the bag."

The UK position, 5 and 6 March 2003

977. Mr Blair was informed on the evening of 4 March that US military planners were looking at 12 March as the possible start date for the military campaign; and that Mr Hoon was concerned about the "apparent disconnect" with activity in the UN.

978. Mr Hoon's Private Secretary informed Sir David Manning on the evening of 4 March that Adm Boyce had reported indications of growing pressure from US military commanders, for force posture and other reasons, to take early military action: and that 12 March had emerged as a possible start date for the military campaign.[301]

979. Mr Hoon was "concerned by the apparent disconnect between US military planning and continuing diplomatic activity in the UN" and thought that Sir David "might wish to ensure that Condi Rice is alive to the continuing need to keep the diplomatic and military tracks aligned".

980. Sir Kevin Tebbit, the MOD Permanent Under Secretary, wrote to Sir Andrew Turnbull, the Cabinet Secretary, on 5 March about the need for an agreed legal basis for military action.[302] That is addressed in Section 5.

981. In Prime Minister's Questions on 5 March, Mr Blair expressed confidence in the prospects for securing a second resolution.

982. In response to a question from Ms Lynne Jones (Labour) asking whether nine affirmative votes would provide "clear" legal authority "for war", Mr Blair responded that the Government would "always act in accordance with international law" and that "we are confident of securing the votes for that resolution and we will carry on working for that end". He added:

> "… I know that we both agree the authority of the UN is important. If that authority is to be upheld, it is important that what we said last November is implemented. If it is not, the effect on the UN … would be disastrous."[303]

983. Asked by Mr Andrew Selous (Conservative) about the direct threat and risks to the UK, Mr Blair replied:

> "… I think that the threat of leaving Saddam Hussein armed with weapons of mass destruction is two fold. First, it is that he begins another conflict in his region, into which Britain … would inevitably be sucked … Alternatively – and I think this is a powerful and developing threat that the world must face – the risk is that states such as Iraq, which are proliferating these chemical and biological weapons of mass destruction, will combine in a way that is devastating for the world with terrorists who are desperate to get their hands on those weapons to wreak maximum destruction.
> "… If we do not stand firm over Iraq now, we will never be able to deal with the next threat that encompasses us."[304]

984. In the entry in his diary for 5 March, Mr Cook wrote that PMQs "was notable for the confidence" Mr Blair had "expressed about getting a second resolution".[305] He added:

> "I don't know whether this is calculated bravado to keep Saddam wary, or whether he is in a state of denial about the mounting evidence that they can't get a second resolution on the present terms."

985. Mr Cook told Mr Blair that he would be unable to carry public opinion if he sidelined the inspectors; if Dr Blix needed months, he should be given until the autumn.

986. In a meeting in the House of Commons shortly after PMQs, Mr Cook told Mr Blair that he had "gone out on a limb" and he should "stop climbing further".[306] The UK had "to be seen on the side" of Dr Blix. Mr Blair would "never carry British opinion" if the UK was "seen to be sidelining the work of the inspectors".

987. Mr Cook also wrote that when Mr Blair had told him that Britain might propose a new deadline on 7 March, he had said it had to be "seen logically to arise from what Blix said. If he needed months, we should be prepared to give him until the autumn." Mr Blair had replied that he could not deliver that, adding:

> "Left to himself, Bush would have gone to war in January. No, not January, September."

988. Mr Cook subsequently wrote that the conversation "was an honest exchange between two colleagues who were both open about the gulf widening between them": and that Mr Blair had "always [been] candid about his intention to be with Bush when the war began". Mr Cook had been "deeply troubled" by "two distinct elements" of that conversation. First, that "the timetable for war was plainly not driven by the progress of the UN weapons inspections". Mr Blair had "made no attempt to pretend" that what Dr Blix might report "would make any difference to the countdown to invasion". In his speech in Glasgow on 15 February, Mr Blair had said that he wanted to "solve the issue" through the UN: "Today he was telling me that the solution was not going to be disarmament through the UN, but regime change through war."

989. Secondly, Mr Blair "did not try to argue" Mr Cook out of the view that "Saddam did not have any real weapons of mass destruction that were designed for strategic use against city populations and capable of being delivered with reliability over long distances".

990. Mr Straw told Mr Blair that the Labour Party would not support action beginning the following week.

991. Mr Blair wrote in his memoir that Mr Straw had:

> "… come over after PMQs. He was genuinely alarmed and worried about the political fallout. 'If you go next Wednesday with Bush and without a second resolution, the only regime change that will be happening is in this room.' He said it as a friend and colleague, and he meant it."[307]

992. In his memoir, Mr Straw gave a similar account of that discussion, explaining that his warning "was not about what I would do. I'd support him. But I felt … we would not muster the numbers when it came to the vote in the Commons."[308]

993. Mr Blair and President Bush discussed developments on 5 March.

994. Mr Blair proposed amending the draft resolution by adding a deadline for a decision by the Security Council.

995. On 5 March, Sir David Manning agreed with Dr Rice that Mr Blair and President Bush should speak later that day to discuss possible amendments to the resolution, including the question of a deadline, and to review the lobbying campaign.[309] Sir David told Dr Rice that Chile and Mexico would need "something on timing, and meeting their need for some sort of benchmarking". His preference was to focus on the issue of interviews. Sir David suggested welcoming Dr Blix's "clusters" document on 7 March as "graphic proof" of Saddam Hussein's failure to disarm over the last 12 years.

996. Sir David also said that the UK was looking at ways of trying to discount Dr ElBaradei's decision to close the nuclear file by asking detailed questions.

997. Sir David advised Mr Blair that he should suggest a "package deal" to President Bush.[310] That should include a deadline in an amended resolution, which would "probably have to give us an extra week to ten days", and an "accompanying declaration (either written or oral)" to meet the Chilean and Mexican need for benchmarks and calling on Saddam Hussein to go into exile if he were unwilling to co-operate with the UN.

998. Sir David said he had told Dr Rice that Mr Blair might travel to Chile and Mexico to show we were taking account of their concerns. That might be followed by a "carefully orchestrated" meeting with President Bush to demonstrate his (President Bush's) willingness to listen to partners and allies and that he was still, "even at the eleventh hour", hoping that Saddam Hussein would disarm. Mr Blair and President Bush might then consult President Putin. Even if that did not persuade President Putin to support the resolution, it might ensure a Russian abstention rather than a veto, leaving President Chirac isolated.

999. Sir David said he had made it very clear to Dr Rice that the proposals were his idea and that they had not yet been agreed by Mr Blair.

1000. Mr Rycroft advised Mr Blair that the key points he should make to President Bush were:

- The second resolution was "absolutely vital".
- The UK needed "at least nine positive votes and no Russian veto".
- "If the French veto alone, it would be just about manageable."
- The UK thought Russia intended to veto, but "would be moved" by President Bush.
- Angola, Cameroon, Chile, Guinea, Mexico and Pakistan were "moving in the right direction"; but they were "not in the bag yet". Mexico and Chile were "interested in more time, a deadline, and benchmarks".
- Adding an ultimatum into the resolution the UK which identified a "set date (e.g. 17 or 21 March)" for Iraqi compliance.
- It was: "Important that it would take a positive decision by the Security Council to decide that Iraq had taken the required step – so we have the initiative and lock on the process."
- The need to "define some benchmarks to show what we mean by full co-operation".
- The "clusters" document provided "ample evidence on non-co-operation" and "must" be used to extract benchmarks on BW, CW and missiles.

[310] Minute Manning to Prime Minister, 5 March 2003, 'Iraq Strategy: Conversation with Condi Rice: 5 March'.

- We should "add our own benchmark on interviews … immediate access to a large number of key people". That was "where Saddam is really vulnerable" and "could change overnight".
- A "little more time" would be required and there could be a need for further meetings and discussions.
- It was: "Crucial to have [a] UN role post-conflict."
- The importance of progress on MEPP.[311]

1001. Mr Blair spoke to President Bush proposing a further amendment to the draft resolution.[312]

1002. Mr Blair said that an ultimatum should include a deadline of 10 days from the date of the resolution for the Security Council to decide that "Unless … Iraq is complying by [[313]], then Iraq is in material breach".

1003. Mr Blair stated that if there were nine votes but a French veto, he thought that "politically and legally" UK participation in military action would be acceptable. "But if we did not get nine votes, such participation might be legal", but he would face major obstacles. It would be "touch and go".

1004. Mr Blair and President Bush also briefly discussed the military plan.

1005. Mr Campbell wrote that he had only heard Mr Blair's side of the call "saying we had a real problem with world opinion, that these countries need a reason to come round, that he wanted to go to Chile and set out the outlines of an amended resolution with a deadline".[314] Mr Blair had also told President Bush that he "needed to work more on Putin".

1006. The record of the discussion broadly confirms Mr Campbell's account.[315]

1007. Mr Campbell also wrote that Dr Blix "was out again today, as much commentator as civil servant".[316] Mr Blair "felt the UNSC had to take control of this now, not Blix". Mr Powell had reported that the US and UK "seemed far apart" but Mr Blair "said it was not as bad as that" he had told President Bush "we would be with them come what may" but it was "other countries" who "needed help to come over". The US had "claimed they had already slowed down as a result of TB, that Bush had wanted to go as early as yesterday but TB made sure they didn't. It was a pretty grim scene, and no matter, how grim, TB was still saying constantly that it was the right thing to do."

1008. In their subsequent discussion, President Lagos agreed to consider Mr Blair's proposals and to discuss them with President Fox.

1009. Mr Blair spoke to President Lagos on 5 March about rallying international support and making public opinion understand why he thought Saddam Hussein was not co-operating.[317]

1010. Mr Blair wanted President Lagos' view on:

> "… setting a deadline for full co-operation, and saying that if the Iraqis did not co-operate … they would be in breach. In parallel, we would set out our criteria for co-operation. This would face Saddam with the decision: co-operate, leave the scene or face the use of force. It would make clear that force was our last resort."

1011. President Lagos agreed to consider the proposal and Mr Blair's suggestion of a meeting in Chile, to discuss it with President Fox and others, and to respond the following day.

1012. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair wanted to go to Moscow and the US as well as Chile: "We are in this and nobody must think we would ever wobble."[318] Mr Campbell's view was that the idea of a visit to Chile "was clearly not on as things stood" and Mr Blair would need a purpose for a meeting with President Bush.

1013. Mr Campbell added that Mr Blair described the purpose of a visit to the US as "to get them to do the right thing". Mr Campbell had responded that the US was "already very clear about their purpose, which was to go for it". He had also asked Mr Blair "Are you not sure that your frustration at the way others are dealing with it is just producing a kind of wanderlust?" Mr Blair had replied that there was no substitute for face-to-face meetings. Asked if he was sure the issue was really worth "sacrificing everything", Mr Blair had replied that it was:

> "… always worth doing what you think is the right thing … Iraq is a real problem, Saddam is a real problem, for us as much as anyone, and it's been ignored too long."

1014. The British Embassy Washington reported overnight on 5/6 March that the US was now "firmly on track for military action" and would deal firmly with any efforts in the UN to slow down the timetable.

1015. The only event which might significantly affect their timetable would be problems for the UK and the US was therefore pulling out all the stops at the UN.

1016. Mr Tony Brenton, Chargé d'Affaires at the British Embassy Washington, reported overnight on 5/6 March that "barring a highly improbable volte face by Saddam", the US was "now firmly on track for military action – with or without a second … resolution"; and that the "only event which might significantly affect their timetable would be problems for the UK".[319] That had been described as "huge – like trying to play football without the quarterback". The US was "therefore pulling out all the stops at the UN".

1017. Mr Brenton reported that the US fully understood the importance of the second resolution for the UK and he had explained the Parliamentary arithmetic. He also reported that the US had "gained the impression that we need the resolution for legal reasons" and that he had "explained the real situation".

1018. Mr Brenton advised that the US was "reasonably hopeful of getting the nine votes (although a little disturbed that the Mexicans have not yet come back to them on our suggested amendment)". The US was "sanguine" about Russia, and thought China would not veto "unless, at least, the French and Russians do". The US could not "call" France.

1019. The US would discuss tactics with Mr Straw in New York. The US intention remained "to go for a vote next week, perhaps with … a very short ultimatum tagged on". He had told one of his contacts that "it was not helpful for the US to refer to the possibility of not going for a vote".

1020. Mr Brenton concluded:

> "… the military clock is now audibly ticking and only a major shock to our (ie UK) plans is likely to jolt it substantially. The US can be expected to deal quite firmly with any efforts in the UN to slow things down."

1021. Sir Jeremy Greenstock advised that the US would not countenance the use of benchmarks. That would delay the military timetable.

1022. Reporting discussions in New York on 5 March, Sir Jeremy Greenstock wrote that the US would not countenance benchmarks; that "simply risked delaying the military timetable".[320]

1023. Sir Jeremy and Ambassador Negroponte had agreed on the need to avoid the risk that Dr Blix would say that Iraq was demonstrating "unconditional, active and full co-operation". Sir Jeremy had agreed with Ambassador Negroponte and Mr Arias that wording was needed "on Iraq demonstrating a genuine change of heart": "But this had to be something that could not be played back at us, e.g. in a statement by Saddam saying he had taken an 'unconditional and irreversible decision'." One key test was Iraq yielding its WMD.

1024. Discussions between experts on the tactics for the Security Council discussion on 7 March had agreed the need to pose questions to Dr Blix and that "more material drawing out key points from the clusters document" was needed:

> "We could and should use it to illustrate just how much the Iraq has not done with respect to inspections. We should also highlight the huge gaps in knowledge as an illustration that we could not benchmark, nor define key tasks, without Iraqi co-operation."

1025. Sir Jeremy provided two alternative formulations for the draft resolution in a separate telegram.[321]

1026. Mr Blair and Mr Straw agreed that, in the Security Council meeting on 7 March, the UK would:

- explore additions to the draft resolution;
- express outrage over the lack of Iraqi co-operation;
- pose tough questions to Dr Blix; and
- demand the publication of the UNMOVIC "clusters" document.

1027. In a meeting on the morning of 6 March, Mr Blair agreed that Mr Straw should explore additions to the draft resolution, including ultimatum language, exile and the UN role in post-conflict humanitarian assistance, with Secretary Powell and others in New York later that day.[322]

1028. Mr Rycroft recorded that:

- Subject to the views of Chile and Mexico, Mr Straw "should stick to our preference for a period of ten days between the passage of the resolution and the expiry of the ultimatum".
- Mr Straw should see Dr Blix to "insist that the clusters document is published on 7 March".
- The UK "should express outrage over the lack of Iraqi co-operation".
- Mr Straw would "put tough questions" to Dr Blix.
- Mr Straw would warn Mr Annan "of the consequences for the UN if our draft resolution is not passed".
- Mr Blair would speak to Presidents Lagos and Putin later that day; and to President Chirac after the Security Council debate.

1029. Mr Campbell wrote: "we needed to get out the idea that we wanted the clusters document out there, also the sense that Blix was just inhaling the politics in all this. We agreed we needed to publish a version of the clusters document which would help turn round the arguments." Mr Straw was to go to New York "with the message from TB that we needed to turn the clusters document to our advantage".[323]

CABINET, 6 MARCH 2003

1030. Mr Blair told Cabinet that the argument boiled down to the question of whether Saddam Hussein would ever voluntarily co-operate with the UN to disarm Iraq.

1031. Mr Blair concluded that it was for the Security Council to determine whether Iraq was co-operating fully.

1032. Mr Blair explained to Cabinet on 6 March that Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei would be reporting to the Security Council the following day.[324]

1033. Dr Blix was proposing to put forward a document which analysed the outstanding disarmament issues. It was important that the facts should be made public.

1034. The UK was discussing an amendment to the draft resolution – "to encourage support from those members who remained undecided" – with some Security Council members. The support of Mexico and Chile "could be critical to the vote". It was not clear what Russia and France would do. The "argument boiled down to whether" Saddam Hussein "would ever voluntarily co-operate with the United Nations to disarm Iraq. Members of the Security Council needed to be persuaded on this point."

1035. Mr Blair also said that he had agreed with President Bush on the need for the UN to be "heavily involved" in "the post-conflict situation, in the event that military action was necessary". They had also discussed the importance of moving the Middle East Peace Process forward on the basis of a "Road Map".

1036. The points made in discussion included:

- the amendment of the draft Security Council resolution should incorporate a deadline "since the public attached importance to the inspection work";
- the "integrity and dignity" of the UN process was being "diminished" by the "political arm-twisting" by some members;
- reconstruction of Iraq would require a UN mandate, not just their involvement; otherwise the right of Coalition forces to engage in reconstruction work would be limited by their status as an occupation force;
- the focus on Iraq's WMD should be maintained, not "diverted to discovery and destruction of ballistic missiles, albeit the latter could deliver toxic material in their warheads"; and [324] Cabinet Conclusions, 6 March 2003.

- the British media operating in Baghdad did not adequately acknowledge the restrictions under which they were working.

1037. Summing up the discussion, Mr Blair said it was "the responsibility of the Chief Inspectors to present the truth about Saddam Hussein's co-operation with the United Nations, so that the Security Council could discharge its responsibilities in making the necessary political decisions". The UK was "lobbying hard in favour of the draft Security Council resolution". It was the duty of Saddam Hussein to co-operate fully, "and it was for the Security Council to determine whether that had been the case".

1038. Mr Cook wrote that Mr Blair had been "surprisingly upbeat about the prospects of getting the six swing votes on the Security Council" and "even expressed a hope that Russia might abstain and France might not veto". That was "not just surprising, but manifestly unrealistic".[325]

1039. Ms Short wrote that her diary entry for that meeting recorded that she had said she regretted:

> "… we couldn't use our leverage to get publication of the Road Map. Arm twisting members of the Security Council looks bad and diminishes the UN. Can't we let the Blix process have integrity. Have to have UN mandate for reconstruction, otherwise occupied territory."[326]

1040. Ms Short added that, in a meeting before Cabinet, Mr Blair had said that he might need to go to see President Bush again which was the "only way he can get him [President Bush] to listen". Ms Short asked Mr Blair to see Mr Annan too.

1041. Mr Campbell described the meeting as "scratchy". Both Mr Cook and Ms Short had been "a bit bolder in setting out their concerns". Ms Short had said the "idea of horse trading and bullying was bad for the authority of the UN". Mr Blair had "hit back quite hard" saying "it was not just the US who were bullying and intimidating"; France was making threats too.[327]

1042. After Cabinet on 6 March, Mr Blair chaired a meeting on post-conflict issues with Mr Brown, Mr Hoon, Ms Short, Baroness Symons of Vernham Dean (the joint FCO/Department of Trade and Industry (DTI) Minister for Trade and Investment), Sir Michael Jay and "other officials".[328] That meeting is addressed in Section 6.5.

USING THE "CLUSTERS" DOCUMENT

1043. Since 3 March, No.10 and the FCO had been discussing how to use the UNMOVIC "clusters" document to the UK's advantage.

1044. Officials recognised that the document was largely historical and a list of things Iraq should have done; UNMOVIC was not due to present its analysis of "Key Disarmament Tasks" required by resolution 1284 to the Security Council until 27 March. The document was described as a "167 page-long catalogue of Iraqi intransigence".

1045. At No.10's request, the FCO analysis of the document was sent to all Cabinet Ministers on 6 March.

1046. Mr Rycroft advised Mr Blair on 4 March:

> "Our best guess is that … we have a reasonable chance of securing ten positive votes … But we are also faced with an increasingly likely French veto.
> "To increase the chances of securing nine or ten votes, we should take on board Chilean/Mexican concerns."[329]

1047. Mr Rycroft identified Chile and Mexico as the least likely of the 10 possible positive votes. He set out options identified by Sir Jeremy Greenstock, of which "the most promising" was "a combination of an ultimatum and benchmarks".

1048. Setting out a spectrum of options for the language of an ultimatum setting out actions Iraq would need to have taken "by [17 March]", Mr Rycroft wrote:

> "There are mixed signs as to whether the US would accept any of these approaches. But our instinct is to press on hard, and to try to persuade the Chileans/Mexicans themselves to table this amendment, after Blix's 7 March report."

1049. Mr Rycroft added:

> "In parallel … but outside the resolution, we should set out what we mean by full compliance by picking out benchmarks based on Blix's clusters document … [I]f we end up with ultimatum language at the soft end of the spectrum, we shall need to say what we mean [by the language of the resolution] …"

1050. Mr Rycroft advised:

> "There is no guarantee that these moves would help prevent a French veto. But they should help ensure a Russian abstention and increase France's isolation. We shall have to decide, at the last minute, whether the costs of a French veto outweigh the advantages of a vote showing majority Security Council support. At present, our view is that we must test the French veto threat to destruction and put our resolution to the vote … Certainly we should give no hint to the French of looking at options short of putting our text to a vote.

"It is possible that a find by the inspectors would be what it takes to move [President] Chirac away from a veto. If there were a find (see separate note), it would be well worth your talking to Chirac to see if it will do the trick."

1051. On the timing for a vote, the "preference, shared by the US," was to seek a vote "as soon after 7 March as we are confident that we have nine positive votes". With the planned ultimatum, there would then be "a week or so before the start of military action to work on public opinion, rather than attempting to do this before the vote".

1052. Mr Rycroft concluded:

"On 7 March, we need to turn Blix's 'clusters' document to our advantage. We need to stress that it is not exhaustive, yet it still offers a damning indictment of Iraq's failure to co-operate. It comprises sections on 29 different weapons/agents … for each of which Blix includes outstanding questions for Iraq to answer. (I am sending you the complete list …) At 167 pages, it shows not only what Iraq would have to do in the future to give full co-operation, but also what Iraq should have done over the last 12 years. This is further compelling evidence, if any were needed, of Iraq's failure to co-operate fully."

1053. Responding to a request from Mr Blair for further information on the UNMOVIC "clusters" document; a minute from Mr Nicholas Cannon, Mr Blair's Assistant Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, described it as "rather historical" and that most of the information was drawn from UNSCOM's work.[330] The UK had "urged" Dr Blix to "give appropriate weight to post-1998 unresolved issues". He had "promised to try", but argued that while it was "possible to establish material balances for the earlier period", it was "less clear what one could do with the flat Iraqi denial of any activity in the latter period"; and it was "unclear whether all gaps could be resolved".

1054. Mr Cannon reported that France, Germany and Russia had pressed for the "clusters" document and the UNMOVIC work programme, to be released to the Security Council. The UK thought that they intended:

"… to distil … a few benchmarks to assess Iraqi compliance. We doubt whether it would be possible to define 'key tests' that did not allow Iraq room to fudge compliance or Security Council members room for debate about whether Iraq was meeting the criteria or not. Saddam would be encouraged to continue to dribble out concessions piecemeal rather than offer a step change on co-operation. So far we have argued that without full co-operation from Iraq, specific disarmament tasks are at best irrelevant and at worst allow Saddam off the hook."

[330] Minute Cannon to Prime Minister, 4 March 2003, 'Iraq: "Clusters" Document'.

1055. Addressing two questions, Mr Cannon advised that the document:

- Exposed the "scale and range" of Iraq's WMD and the "long-term pattern of concealment and deceit". It flagged up "recent examples of Iraqi deception". It could be used as "evidence of Iraq's failure to co-operate" and its UN provenance "gave it more credibility than products of potential belligerents".
- Could be used after publication as a quarry for benchmarks, but it "tended to focus on hardware rather than interviews" and the "sheer number of outstanding questions" made it possible for the Iraqis reasonably to ask for more time. Boiling down the list might open the way to suggestions that Iraq had partially complied.

1056. Mr Cannon concluded:

> "But we can draw on the 'clusters' in drawing up our own 'benchmarks' … We need to ensure that on balance it is seen as a list of the things that Iraq should have done, not a list of things for Iraq to do in the future."

1057. FCO analysis of the draft "clusters" document sent to No.10 on 5 March explained that the document was "intended to form the basis for UNMOVIC's determination of the 'Key Disarmament Tasks'", which the terms of resolution 1284 (1999) stipulated were to be submitted to the Security Council for discussion by 27 March. A revised draft would be submitted to the Council on 7 March.[331]

1058. The FCO suggested that France, Germany and Russia would "try to use the document to draw up a 'leisurely' timetable for those issues to be addressed". The UK position had been that "without full and active Iraqi co-operation, it is not possible to draw up a comprehensive list of disarmament tasks"; and that: "In any case, the requirements of resolution 1441 take precedence."

1059. The FCO drew attention to a number of points in the draft document, including:

- Iraq had "admitted refurbishing some equipment previously destroyed by UNSCOM, in particular some chemical facilities".
- There had been "a modest expansion of biological industries … UNMOVIC also acknowledge that there have been a number of intelligence reports concerning bio-weapon production facilities."
- There had "been 'a surge of activity' in missile technology over the past four years".

1060. The FCO commented that the draft document was "not exhaustive" but did reveal "the enormous amount of Iraqi non-co-operation over the years; a 167 page-long catalogue of Iraqi intransigence".

---

[331] Fax Owen to Rycroft to, 5 March 2003, attaching Papers prepared by Patrick Davies (MED) for Peter Ricketts, 'Iraq: Key Papers'.

1061. The FCO identified a number of "key points", including:

- The report was "inevitably not comprehensive". It was: "Impossible to provide a comprehensive list of disarmament tasks without Iraqi co-operation and given the inspectors were out of Iraq for four years."
- A "huge number of questions remain unanswered". More than 100 specific actions had been identified which Iraq "must take". Those were "not difficult, mostly concerning the need to present documents, evidence and more coherent accounts of Iraq's work". Iraq "could have provided this at any time".
- Iraq could "give no credible account of the surge of activity in the missile technology field over the last four years".
- Destruction of the Al Samoud 2 missiles had begun by the UNMOVIC set deadline of 1 March and 28 had been destroyed by 5 March: "No end-date has been set for the process."
- There were "uncertainties about Iraq's use of mobile 'factories'".
- Iraq's failure to co-operate over private interviews raised "further suspicions that Iraq has something to hide".
- UNSCOM had a list of 3,500 names of those it might wish to interview.

1062. At No.10's request, the FCO analysis was sent to all Cabinet Ministers on 6 March.[332]

1063. A further analysis of the "clusters" document by Downing Street officials on 6 March picked out the areas which demonstrated Iraqi non-co-operation. As there was only limited material on ongoing production programmes (other than ballistic missiles), the two key sets of concerns related to leftover questions from UNSCOM on chemical and biological weapons, and evidence of a "systematic pattern of deceit and concealment".[333]

1064. In his discussions with President Lagos on 6 March, Mr Blair stated that the US would go ahead without the UN if asked to delay military action until April or May.

1065. In his discussion with President Lagos on 6 March, Mr Blair was reported to have stated that:

- Saddam Hussein would not make concessions unless he was under pressure.
- If the US was asked to delay action until April or May, "they would simply go ahead without the UN"; we could not expect President Bush to wait after the end of March.

[333] Minute Cannon to Prime Minister, 6 March 2003, 'Iraq: "Clusters" Document'.

- If "Saddam co-operated, war could even now be averted", but Mr Blair now "did not think" that Saddam Hussein would co-operate.
- He was "prepared to sign up to a statement that war was avoidable if Saddam co-operated … if Saddam really co-operated he could have more time to complete disarmament. But the Security Council had to be the judge of co-operation".
- He "needed to know whether he had Chilean and Mexican support".[334]

1066. Mr Rycroft reported that President Lagos was opposed to a short deadline and had decided to wait to see what happened at the Security Council the following day.

ASSESSMENT OF IRAQ'S INTENTIONS, 6 MARCH 2003

1067. An assessment of Iraq's intentions on 6 March concluded that the strategy was to play for time, and Iraq thought that strategy was working.

1068. The Assessments Staff was confident that Saddam Hussein's aim would be the eventual re-creation of his WMD capability.

1069. Mr Miller provided an assessment of 'Saddam's possible next moves' for Sir David Manning on 6 March.[335] The document was also sent to officials in the FCO, the MOD and the Cabinet Office.

1070. Mr Miller described Saddam Hussein's strategy as "to play for time, gradually releasing limited information on Iraq's terms or when there is no other option". Iraq thought its strategy was working. Mr Miller stated: "Even if he [Saddam Hussein] does opt for a declaration of WMD, we are confident that his aim would be the eventual re-creation of his capability."

1071. Mr Miller advised that the decision to destroy the Al Samoud 2 missiles was "indicative of Saddam's strategy: a drawn out debate with UNMOVIC over legality; an offer to form a 'technical committee' to review the weapon; compliance; and an attempt to portray compliance as a major concession". Mr Miller predicted that Iraq would "draw out the destruction process", which might take "as long as two months to complete".

1072. Other points made by Mr Miller included:

- Iraq was "likely to follow a pattern of a drip feed of information to UNMOVIC".
- Passing over documents only in Arabic might be a deliberate tactic to delay verification.
- It could take two to three weeks to validate any documentation to back up Iraq's claims to have destroyed VX.

---

[335] Minute Miller to Manning, 6 March 2003, Iraq: Potential Compliance with UNMOVIC'.

- Progress with interviews continued to be "unsatisfactory", although there had been "some improvement". Iraq was likely to continue attempts to monitor interviews and to resist interviews outside Iraq.
- Iraq was likely to support proposals – for more time for inspections or an agreed timetable or checklist – put forward by those in the UN reluctant to authorise a resolution permitting war.

1073. Mr Miller concluded:

> "In short, we have seen no indication that there will be a change in Iraq's strategy … Iraq will continue to put the onus on the inspectors to set out what they want rather than pro-actively provide information … Saddam will be prepared to offer further concessions – or at least to say he is ready to. But based on current behaviour any information will be incomplete, will be difficult to interpret and will not represent a full declaration of Iraq's capability. On overseas interviews and any proposal for a substantial UN military force, agreement is likely only in the face of imminent military action."

MR STRAW'S MEETINGS IN NEW YORK, 6 MARCH 2003

1074. In a meeting with Mr Annan, Mr Straw set out the thinking on revising the second resolution.[336]

1075. Mr Straw told Mr Annan that military considerations could not be allowed "to dictate policy", but the military build-up "could not be maintained for ever", and:

> "… the more he had looked into the Iraq dossier the more convinced he had become of the need for action. Reading the clusters document made his hair stand on end."

1076. Mr Straw set out the UK thinking on a deadline, stating this was "Iraq's last chance", but the objective was disarmament and, if Saddam Hussein did what was demanded, "he could stay". In those circumstances, a "permanent and toughened inspections regime" would be needed, possibly "picking up some earlier ideas for an all-Iraq NFZ [No-Fly Zone]".

1077. Other points in the discussion included:

- Mr Kieran Prendergast, UN Under Secretary-General for Political Affairs, pointed out that the UK was "reversing the veto: if there were no positive finding, then there would be war".
- Mr Ricketts stated that "it had to be this way round if there were to be a clear deadline".

[336] Telegram 366 UKMIS New York to FCO London, 7 March 2003, 'Iraq: Foreign Secretary's Meeting with UN Secretary-General, New York, 6 March'.

- It had been decided not to include a provision about exile, but "we were telling our Arab friends that we had got exile language".
- Mr Prendergast stated that giving Saddam Hussein impunity would cause a "big public problem: how could we ignore the ICC [International Criminal Court]".
- Mr Straw responded that "if the choice was between war or immunity", he had the sense that "people would breathe a sigh of relief".
- If there were to be a conflict, "the UN had a role in humanitarian aid and reconstruction, and only the UN could give legal authority for any post-Saddam government".
- Mr Annan was reported to be "disturbed" by the American position that everyone had to vote for the resolution "or else the UN would be irrelevant". The US knew it needed the UN on a range of issues. The UN was "bigger than Iraq".
- Mr Straw responded that "if we failed the cohesion of the Security Council would be weakened".

1078. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that Mr Annan had approved.

1079. In a meeting with Dr Blix on 6 March, Mr Straw had "acknowledged" that the draft resolution:

> "… missed out a necessary intermediate step. We now proposed to offer Saddam an opportunity to show full compliance accompanied by a slightly longer time frame …
> "… [the Government's] agenda was disarmament and not regime change. The Prime Minister had told Ivanov that if Saddam gave up his WMD he could stay. President Bush could not say this publicly, but he too would prefer peaceful voluntary disarmament to war. If Dr Blix, as the most important witness in the whole process, reported to the Security Council that Iraq was co-operating then the bunting would go up in London."[337]

1080. Mr Straw had also "stressed that the underlying intelligence picture which was agreed by a number of services from several countries was clear – Saddam was not complying and was misleading the inspectors".

1081. Dr Blix told Mr Straw that he would report that the Iraqis had made "some progress but they still had a long way to go". Dr Blix "did not personally doubt that the Iraqis were self sufficient in precursors and had the capability to jump start production of a range of agents. But the inspectors had found little … although the Iraqis had been 'hyperactive' of late in handing over documents and making other gestures, overall they were not co-operating fully." Dr Blix had agreed with Mr Straw that "while difficult to define we would all soon realise what constituted compliance when the Iraqis started co-operating fully".

[337] Telegram 373 UKMIS New York to FCO London, 7 March 2003, 'Iraq: Your Meeting with Blix: 6 March'.

1082. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that Mr Fischer had told Mr Straw that: the problem was the US agenda of regime change and the timelines created by the military build-up.[338] He could not accept a resolution with language setting an ultimatum plus a trigger because it would lead directly to war.

AGREEMENT ON A REVISED DRAFT RESOLUTION

1083. The UK, US and Spain agreed a revised resolution to be tabled in the Security Council on 7 March.

1084. Following a telephone call between Mr Straw and Secretary Powell, Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that the US was "relaxed about the exact language in the second resolution; they will agree to what works for us".[339]

1085. The key elements of the draft are set out in the Box below.[340]

UK/US/Spanish draft resolution, 7 March 2003

The draft resolution recalled the provisions of previous Security Council resolutions on Iraq and noted that:

- the Council had "repeatedly warned Iraq that it will face serious consequences as a result of its continued violations of its obligations"; and
- Iraq had "submitted a declaration … containing false statements and omissions and has failed to comply with, and co-operate fully in the implementation of, that resolution".

The draft stated that the Council:

"Mindful of its primary responsibility under the Charter … for the maintenance of international peace and stability;

"Recognising the threat Iraq's non-compliance with Council resolutions and proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and long-range missiles poses to international peace and security;

"Determined to secure full compliance with its decisions and to restore international peace and security in the area;

"Acting under Chapter VII …;

"Reaffirms the need for full implementation of resolution 1441 (2002);

"Calls on Iraq immediately to take the decisions necessary in the interests of its people and the region;

DR BLIX'S REPORT TO THE SECURITY COUNCIL, 7 MARCH 2003

1086. In his report to the Security Council on 7 March, Dr Blix stated that there had been an acceleration of initiatives from Iraq since the end of January, but they could not be said to constitute immediate co-operation. Nor did they necessarily cover all areas of relevance; but they were nevertheless welcome.

1087. As required by resolution 1284 (1999) UNMOVIC was drawing up a work programme of key disarmament tasks for approval by the Security Council which would be ready later that month.

1088. It would take "months" to complete the task.

1089. Introducing UNMOVIC's 12th quarterly report of activity to 28 February 2003, as required by resolution 1284 (1999), which had already been circulated to the Security Council, Dr Blix stated that, when the report had been finalised, there had still been "relatively little tangible progress to note" and the report had been "cautious". By 7 March, there had been a number of relevant events on which he would bring the Council up to date.[341]

1090. The key points from Dr Blix's report are set out in the Box below.

Dr Blix's report, 7 March 2003

Inspections process

Inspections had begun on 27 November 2002, and "faced relatively few difficulties". Initial difficulties about helicopters and aerial surveillance had "been overcome". While there were "frictions", "at this juncture", UNMOVIC was "able to perform professional no-notice inspections all over Iraq and to increase aerial surveillance" and its capabilities were being increased.

Documents and interviews

Iraq, "with a highly developed administrative system", should have been "able to provide more documentary evidence".

It was "a disappointment" that Iraq's declaration of 7 December 2002 "did not bring new documentary evidence". Dr Blix hoped that "efforts … including the appointment of a governmental commission" would "give significant results":

> "When proscribed items are deemed unaccounted for, it is, above all, credible accounts that are needed – or the proscribed items, if they exist."

Where "authentic documents" did not become available, interviews "may be another way of obtaining evidence". Iraq's provision of "many names" had prompted two reflections:

> "… with such detailed information existing regarding those who took part in the unilateral destruction, surely there must also remain records regarding quantities and other data concerning the various items destroyed.
> "… with relevant witnesses available it becomes even more important to be able to conduct interviews in modes and locations, which will allow us to be confident that the testimony is given without outside influence."

Iraq seemed "to have encouraged interviewees not to request the presence of Iraq officials … or the taping of interviews" but "conditions ensuring the absence of undue influence were difficult to attain inside Iraq. Interviews outside Iraq might provide such assurance. It is our intention to request such interviews shortly."

Thirty-eight individuals had been asked for interviews and 10 had accepted UNMOVIC's terms, seven during the last week.

Inspections

Iraq had denied the existence of mobile production units for biological weapons and that proscribed activities were being conducted underground. Inspections had taken place at declared and undeclared sites but no evidence of proscribed activities had "so far been found". Iraq was "expected to assist in the development of credible ways to conduct random checks of ground transportation".

Inspectors were examining Iraq's programmes for remotely piloted vehicles and data was being collected to assess the range and other capabilities of the models found.

In relation to "reports of proscribed activity conducted underground", which Iraq had denied, Dr Blix stated that "no facilities for chemical or biological production or storage have been found so far". Iraq should provide information on any underground facilities that were suitable for the production or storage of weapons of mass destruction.

Dr Blix stated that UNMOVIC would need some more staff to monitor ground transportation and to inspect underground facilities, but he:

> "… would rather have twice the amount of high quality information about sites to inspect than twice the number of expert inspectors to send."

Recent developments

Dr Blix stressed the importance of Iraq's acceptance of the destruction of Al Samoud 2 missiles and associated items, which constituted a "substantial measure of disarmament … the first since the middle 1990s".

Other points covered by Dr Blix included:

- UNMOVIC was reviewing the legality of the Al Fatah missile.
- Papers on anthrax, VX and missiles had recently been provided. Many re-stated what Iraq had already declared, but some required further study and discussion.
- There was "a significant Iraqi effort under way to clarify a major source of uncertainty" about the "quantities of biological and chemical weapons" that had been "unilaterally destroyed in 1991", by excavating a site that was formerly "deemed too dangerous". Eight intact bombs had been unearthed, two of which had a "liquid fill". That "should be followed by a serious and credible effort to determine" how many R-400 bombs had been produced.
- Iraq had informed UNMOVIC that there would be further legislation on prohibiting work on weapons of mass destruction.

Dr Blix stated that, in relation to Iraq's recent initiatives:

> "One can hardly avoid the impression that, after a period of somewhat reluctant co-operation, there has been an acceleration of initiatives from the Iraqi side since the end of January. This is welcome, but the value of these measures must be soberly judged by how many question marks they actually succeed in straightening out. This is not yet clear."

Dr Blix stated that the question which was being asked was "whether Iraq has co-operated 'immediately, unconditionally and actively' with UNMOVIC, as required" by resolution 1441.

Dr Blix stated: "The answers can be seen from the factual descriptions I have provided." He added that, "if more direct answers are desired":

- Iraq had not "persisted" in attaching conditions on the exercise of the inspectors rights.
- The recent Iraqi initiatives to address long-standing issues could be "seen as active or even proactive". But "three to four months into the new resolution" they could not be said "to constitute 'immediate' co-operation. Nor do they necessarily cover all areas of relevance. They are nevertheless welcome, and UNMOVIC is responding to them in the hope of solving presently unresolved disarmament issues."

Key disarmament tasks

Dr Blix stated that UNMOVIC was working under several resolutions and that resolution 1284 (1999) instructed "UNMOVIC to 'address unresolved disarmament issues' and to identify 'key remaining disarmament tasks' … to be submitted for approval by the Council in the context of a work programme". UNMOVIC was required to submit only the work programme to the Council, and the draft would be ready "this month as required".

Dr Blix added that, as he understood "several Council members are interested in the working document with the complete clusters of disarmament issues, we have declassified it and are ready to make it available to members of the Council on request". It provided "a more up-to-date review of the outstanding issues"; and each cluster ended "with a number of points indicating what Iraq could do to solve the issue. Hence, Iraq's co-operation could be measured against the successful resolution of issues."

1091. Dr Blix concluded that "co-operation can and is to be immediate", but "disarmament and … verification … cannot be instant". "Even with a pro-active Iraqi attitude" it would still take "months" to "verify sites and items, analyse documents, interview relevant persons and draw conclusions".

DR ELBARADEI'S REPORT, 7 MARCH 2003

1092. Dr ElBaradei reported that there were no indications that Iraq had resumed nuclear activities since the inspectors left in December 1998 and the recently increased level of Iraqi co-operation should allow the IAEA to provide the Security Council with an assessment of Iraq's nuclear capabilities in the near future.

1093. Dr ElBaradei reported that the IAEA was focused on the "central question" of "whether Iraq has revived, or attempted to revive, its defunct nuclear weapons programme over the last four years".[342] Dr ElBaradei noted that:

> "… in the past three weeks, possibly as a result of ever-increasing pressure by the international community, Iraq has been forthcoming in its co-operation, particularly with regard to the conduct of private interviews and in making available evidence that could contribute to the resolution of matters of IAEA concern."

1094. That "should enable" the IAEA "in the very near future to provide the Security Council with an objective and thorough assessment of Iraq's nuclear-related capabilities".

1095. The key points made by Dr ElBaradei are set out in the Box below.

Dr ElBaradei's report, 7 March 2003

Iraq's industrial capacity had deteriorated sharply, including through the departure of foreign support present in the 1980s and large numbers of skilled Iraqi personnel in the preceding decade.

Interviews were continuing, including two "private interviews in the last 10 days". Interviews outside Iraq might be the best way to ensure that interviews were "free", and the IAEA intended to request such interviews "shortly".

[342] UN Security Council, '4714th Meeting Friday 7 March 2003' (S/PV.4714).

The primary technical focus of the IAEA in the field had been on the possible resumption of Iraq's efforts to enrich uranium. In relation to the three key issues, the IAEA had:

- Failed to uncover any evidence that Iraq's attempts to purchase high strength aluminium tubes was for "any project other than … rockets". The documents provided and interviews had allowed the IAEA "to develop a coherent picture of attempted purchases and intended usage".
- Verified that none of the magnets Iraq had declared could be used directly for the magnetic bearings in centrifuges. It was likely that Iraq possessed the expertise to manufacture such magnets and the IAEA would continue to monitor and inspect equipment and materials.
- Stated that documents relating to the reports of possible acquisition of uranium from Niger were not authentic, but it would continue to follow up any additional evidence.

Dr ElBaradei concluded that there was no indication:

- "of resumed nuclear activities" in buildings identified as new or reconstructed since 1998";
- "of nuclear-related prohibited activities at any inspected sites";
- "that Iraq has attempted to import uranium since 1990";
- "that Iraq has attempted to import aluminium tubes for use in centrifuge enrichment";
- "to date that Iraq imported magnets to use in a centrifuge enrichment programme".

Dr ElBaradei stated that Iraq's procurement efforts, including those in relation to magnets and aluminium tubes, had been conducted "in contravention of the sanctions controls" imposed by the Security Council. The IAEA would continue to scrutinise and investigate those issues and hoped "to continue to receive from States actionable information relevant to our mandate".

SECURITY COUNCIL DISCUSSIONS, 7 MARCH 2003

1096. In the discussion, there was unanimity in calls for Iraq to increase its co-operation.

1097. But there was a clear division between the US, UK, Spain and Bulgaria who spoke in favour of a further resolution, and China, France, Germany and Russia and most other Member States who spoke in favour of continuing to pursue disarmament through strengthened inspections.

1098. The UK, US and Spain circulated a draft resolution deciding that Iraq would have failed to take the final opportunity offered by resolution 1441 (2002) unless the Security Council concluded, on or before 17 March 2003, that Iraq had demonstrated full, unconditional, immediate and active co-operation in accordance with its disarmament obligations and was yielding possession of all weapons and proscribed material to UNMOVIC and the IAEA.

1099. Mr Fischer stated that the international community was united in its condemnation of the Iraqi regime but had different views about how to achieve that "common goal".[343] He added that the briefings from Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei made clear that Iraq's co-operation did "not yet fully meet" the UN's demands. Iraq "could have taken many of its recent steps earlier and more willingly", but co-operation had "notably improved". That was "a positive development" which made it "all the less comprehensible why that development should now be abandoned".

1101. Mr Fischer added that the disarmament of Iraq had to be "pursued energetically and systematically" and the Iraqi Government had to co-operate fully with the inspectors. But there was "no need for a second resolution" and the use of force: peaceful means were "very far from having been exhausted". Progress in recent days showed that there were "efficient alternatives to war". Taking that path would "strengthen the relevance of the United Nations and the Security Council".

1102. Mr Farouk al-Sharaa, the Syrian Deputy Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs, reminded the Council of calls by the Non-Aligned Movement, the Arab Summit and others for the inspectors to be given time to complete their work. Syria was "confident" that the United Nations, which represented the "will of the international community", would opt for peace.

1103. Mr Derbez expressed concern about the "lack of active, immediate and effective co-operation" from the Iraqi regime. But Mexico was "greatly distressed" by the erosion of relationships and common values caused by different visions of how to disarm Iraq and "worried by the distance" between members of the Council. Mr Derbez called on members to "avoid taking up inflexible positions".

1104. Mr Derbez stated that Mexico:

- called on the Iraqi Government "radically [to] change its attitude" to "carry out immediately clear and unequivocal actions" to demonstrate it had chosen the path of disarmament;
- was "convinced that we have to explore all options and take advantage of all opportunities to resolve this issue in a peaceful manner";

[343] UN Security Council, '4714th Meeting Friday 7 March 2003' (S/PV.4714).

- insisted “on the importance of working towards a consensus position” on future action with respect to Iraq; and
- urged members of the Security Council “to work with greater creativity” on the issue.

1105. Secretary Powell stated that the Security Council had “one very, very important question” of intent to address: “Has the Iraqi regime made the fundamental strategic and political decision to comply with United Nations Security Council resolutions and to rid itself of all of its weapons of mass destruction and the infrastructure for the development of weapons of mass destruction?” It was not a question of “clusters of unanswered questions” or benchmarks, but of whether Iraq had made the choice actively to co-operate. In his view, the presentations by Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei had been “a catalogue of non-co-operation”. Iraq’s “initiatives” were only small steps, which had been “taken only grudgingly; rarely unconditionally; and primarily under the threat of force”.

1106. Secretary Powell argued that the inspectors should not need more resources to look for prohibited facilities. That showed Iraq was not co-operating. The Council “must not allow Iraq to shift the burden of proof onto the inspectors”. Nor could the Council “return to the failed bargain of resolution 1284 (1999), which offered partial relief for partial disclosure”. Iraq had to be held to the terms of resolution 1441, which required “full and immediate compliance”.

1107. Secretary Powell stated that progress was “often more apparent than real”. Missiles were being destroyed but Iraq had the infrastructure to make more, which had not yet been identified and destroyed.

1108. In the light of events in 1991, when the IAEA had mistakenly been about to determine Iraq did not have a nuclear programme, Secretary Powell urged caution in relation to Dr ElBaradei’s report, citing further information calling into question the conclusion that the aluminium tubes were for unguided rockets.

1109. Secretary Powell welcomed UNMOVIC’s “compilation of outstanding issues” which added up to “a damning record of 12 years of lies, deception and failure to come clean on the part of Iraq”. Iraq had lied to previous inspectors and planted false evidence. The US view was that those activities were “still ongoing”. In 1998, when faced with the threat of military action, Iraq had made promises, but had not delivered. In Secretary Powell’s view, that position had not changed and the UNMOVIC document revealed:

> “… a strategic decision to delay, to deceive, to try to throw us off the trail … to hope that the will of the international community will be fractured …”

1110. Secretary Powell stated that the Iraqi regime had not taken the decision to disarm. The Security Council “must not walk away”. If it failed to meet its responsibilities, “the credibility of the Council and its ability to deal with all the critical challenges we face will suffer". It was time for the Council to send a "clear message" to Saddam Hussein about the political will of the Council and its willingness to use force, if necessary, to achieve the disarmament of Iraq.

1111. Secretary Powell concluded that the draft resolution for action by the Council was appropriate, and that it should be put to a vote "in the very near future". He added: "The clock continues to tick and the consequences of Saddam Hussein's continued refusal to disarm will be very, very real."

1112. Mr Ivanov stated that the Council's "united, energetic efforts" and the pressure on Iraq "from all sides, including the build up of a military presence" had produced progress in implementing resolution 1441. There was "a real disarmament process in Iraq for the first time in many years".

1113. Mr Ivanov said that he "agreed in principle" with Dr Blix that if the latest steps taken by Baghdad had been taken earlier, "the results could be more convincing". But they opened the way to resolving outstanding problems. In those circumstances, Mr Ivanov questioned whether it was "now reasonable to halt inspections" and resort to force. Russia was "firmly in favour of continuing and strengthening inspection activities and making them more focused". The UNMOVIC work programme should include a list of key disarmament tasks which should be "formulated with utmost clarity" and be realisable: "That would allow us to evaluate objectively Iraq's level of co-operation and, most importantly, to provide an exhaustive answer to all the remaining open questions regarding banned Iraqi military programmes."

1114. Mr Ivanov concluded with a plea that the differences in the Security Council should not produce a rift, and that:

> "Only by acting in solidarity will we effectively face up to new global threats and challenges. We are certain that the Security Council has to emerge united and strong from the Iraq crisis, not weakened and divided. Russia will continue to work towards that goal."

1115. Mr de Villepin stated that the inspectors had revealed that Iraq had been actively co-operating for a month. He asked why, in those circumstances, the Security Council should engage in a war with Iraq and "smash instruments that have just proved their effectiveness". It was "clear to all that in Iraq, we are resolutely moving towards the complete elimination of weapons of mass destruction programmes".

1116. Mr de Villepin argued that the Council should proceed "with information, verification, destruction"; and Iraq had to provide "further information in a timely fashion". Iraq was less of a danger than in 1991. Diplomatic action was bearing fruit and the American and British presence in the region lent support to the international community's collective resolve.

1117. Mr de Villepin proposed that the pace of inspections should be stepped up on the basis of:

- a hierarchy of key disarmament tasks drawn from UNMOVIC's work programme;
- a progress report from the inspectors every three weeks to maintain the pressure on the Iraqi authorities; and
- a schedule for assessing implementation: France was willing to shorten the time-frame of 120 days set out in resolution 1284 if the inspectors thought that was feasible.

1118. Mr de Villepin stated that the "military agenda must not dictate the calendar of inspections". France could not "accept an ultimatum as long as the inspectors are reporting progress". He asked whether "by imposing a deadline of a few days", that would be "merely seeking a pretext for war". Some countries might believe that problems could be solved by force, but not France. It believed that the use of force could "give rise to resentment and to hatred, and fuel a clash of identities and civilisations – something that our generation has a prime responsibility to avert".

1119. Mr de Villepin stated:

> "To those who believe that war would be the quickest way to disarm Iraq, I can reply that it would create divisions and cause wounds that would be long in the healing …
> "… force is certainly not the best way of bringing about democracy. In this case and in others, it would encourage a dangerous instability.
> "… War would only increase it [terrorism], and we could then be faced with a new wave of violence. Let us beware of playing into the hands of those who want a clash of civilisations or a clash of religions."

1120. Mr de Villepin stated that France understood the "profound sense of insecurity with which the American people had been living since the tragedy of 11 September 2001", but there was nothing to indicate a link between the Iraq regime and Al Qaida and the world would not be a safer place after a military intervention in Iraq.

1121. Mr de Villepin argued for priority to be given to addressing the crisis in the Middle East, which represented "our greatest challenge in terms of security and justice".

1122. Mr de Villepin concluded that the Council would face a choice of disarming Iraq through war or peace, and that to make that choice heads of State and Government should meet.

1123. Mr Tang stated that resolution 1441 had been "widely welcomed and supported" because it manifested the determination of the Council to destroy Iraq's WMD and "truly reflected the desire of the international community for a political settlement". There had been "much progress" on inspections. It was "true" that there were "problems and difficulties", but that was "exactly why" it was "necessary to continue the inspections".

1124. China believed that a political settlement could still attain the goal of destroying Iraq's WMD. That would "need resolve and determination and, more importantly, patience and wisdom". China was "not in favour of a new resolution, particularly one authorising the use of force". The power of the Security Council was derived from all UN member states and it had "no reason to remain indifferent" to the calls for "peace not war" from the peoples of many countries. The Chinese Government strongly appealed "to the Council to shoulder its responsibility and to do all it can to avoid war and to maintain its efforts to achieve a political settlement".

1125. Mrs Alvear stated that the reports by Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei allowed Chile "to infer" that Iraq's co-operation was "inadequate" and the signs of progress in specific areas did not detract from that conclusion. Chile reaffirmed the need for the "immediate, full and effective disarmament of Iraq" and reiterated its "urgent appeal to Iraq" to co-operate. Chile supported "a solution in keeping with international law and with the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter", which was the only source of legitimacy for the Council's decisions.

1126. Chile appealed to the five Permanent Members of the Council to find a point of convergence and "advocated the continuation of rigorous inspections subject to a time limit". The use of force under Chapter VII of the Charter could be invoked "only when all peaceful means of disarming Iraq have been exhausted". Chile believed a solution was possible through a "strengthening of inspections … with clear deadlines and concrete demands".

1127. Ms Palacio stated that the Council had "been marking time for 12 years" and that the Council found itself in the "same situation as in 1991". Saddam Hussein's strategy remained to deceive. She questioned how much time was necessary to take the strategic decision to collaborate. Saddam Hussein had managed to divide the international community and to reverse the burden of proof. Only maximum pressure and the credible threat of force could make an impression on the Iraqi regime. Why should the international community believe Saddam Hussein's claims that he had destroyed all his weapons without being able to detect a "genuine will to disarm".

1128. Ms Palacio stated that the Security Council should send clear messages to Iraq about its determination to achieve complete disarmament and that the Council should assume its responsibilities to respond. A strategy of more inspectors or more time was "merely the strategy of impotence". It was possible to envisage results with respect to nuclear material and missiles without Iraq's pro-active collaboration, but that was "not true for chemical or bacteriological weapons". Spain wanted a peace that was "safe and that ensures that those weapons will not be used by Iraq and that they will not fall into the hands of terrorist groups".

1129. In his speech to the Security Council, Mr Straw stated that everyone agreed Iraq must be fully disarmed and that "Iraq's failure to co-operate immediately, unconditionally and actively with the inspectors" had to be "dealt with".[344] The first question for the Council was, "has Iraq taken this final opportunity"? His answer was that, as no-one had said Iraq was "now fully, actively and immediately in compliance", it had "not so far taken this final opportunity".

1130. Dr Blix's "clusters" document to the Council was a "chilling" account of Iraq's non-compliance over 12 years and there had "not been active co-operation in the areas which matter". The examples cited by Mr Straw included:

- Iraq had "dragged its feet on as many elements of procedural and substantive co-operation as possible".
- Iraq was still refusing to pass a law prohibiting State authorities from engaging on work relating to weapons of mass destruction.
- Iraq had "done everything possible to prevent unrestricted, unrecorded interviews". Of the 3,500 people on UNSCOM's lists, "just twelve private interviews had been allowed", and "all of those … were threatened and intimidated beforehand". He understood that "the scientists most likely to have the most incriminating evidence have been locked away". There had been no interviews outside Iraq. Mr Straw stated: "The restrictions placed on [these] interviews is itself the most incriminating evidence that Saddam has something to hide."
- Under-reporting of the import of Al Samoud 2 missile engines and the missile's range were examples of Iraq's "calculation that it can satisfy the Council with a partial response".

1131. Addressing the memorandum produced by France, Germany and Russia, Mr Straw stated that "it defies experience to believe that continuing inspections with no firm end date" would achieve complete disarmament "if Iraq's full and active co-operation" was not "immediately forthcoming". The memorandum was "not even a formula for containment, given Iraq's proven ability to develop weapons of mass destruction".

1132. Mr Straw welcomed the progress the inspectors had reported. His "earnest wish", and that of the UK Government, was to achieve Iraq's disarmament, "if possible by peaceful means". But it was necessary to recognise that "the progress that has been reported represents only the tip of a very large iceberg of huge unfinished business required of Iraq". He also welcomed the diplomatic pressure on Iraq but suggested it was the presence of US and UK troops in the region which had influenced the recent increase in Iraq's co-operation.

1133. Addressing Mr de Villepin's statement that "the choice before us was disarmament by peace or disarmament by war", Mr Straw pointed out that that was

"a false choice". The paradox was that diplomacy had to be backed by a credible threat of force to achieve Iraq's disarmament by peaceful means. He wished:

> "… we lived in a different world where this was not necessary, but … the choice is not ours as to how this disarmament takes place – the choice is Saddam Hussein's … he can act with astonishing speed when he chooses to … It may take time to fabricate falsehoods but the truth takes only seconds to tell."

1134. In response to Mr de Villepin's concerns about automaticity, Mr Straw added that the threat of force or its use had:

> "… always been conditional. It would be utterly irresponsible and in defiance of our solemn duties to the Council for us to walk into a situation where force was used automatically …"

1135. In conclusion, Mr Straw stated that the UK remained "committed to exploring every reasonable option for a peaceful outcome and every prospect of a Council consensus". He asked, on behalf of the UK, US and Spain as co-sponsors, for a revised draft of the second resolution to be circulated.

1136. In his memoir, Mr Straw wrote that he had deliberately picked up Mr de Villepin's words and "There was not a word in my speech about the intelligence. It was the indisputable facts of Saddam's behaviour that convinced me we had to act."[345]

1137. Mr Georges Chikoti, the Angolan Deputy Minister for Foreign Affairs, stated that the reports from Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei showed that Iraq's co-operation was "relatively insufficient" and called on Iraq to take a more energetic and pro-active role.[346] He suggested that the progress made was associated with specific benchmarks and dates. That might be a model for strengthening the scope and intrusiveness of inspections.

1138. Mr Chikoti noted that international community, regional and sub-regional organisations and international public opinion had been calling for the peaceful disarmament. Those were "valid and legitimate concerns" but they could not be "interpreted or transformed into an unwillingness to act". The responsibilities of the Council included "exhausting all diplomatic and peaceful means to achieve such disarmament".

1139. Mr Belinga-Eboutou stated that Cameroon was pleased to note the momentum of inspections was "well established". UNMOVIC's report from the inspectors showed real progress but also made clear that the results had "been very limited so far". Cameroon did not believe that Iraq had "yet taken the final opportunity afforded by … resolution 1441". It was in favour of inspections but they should not go on "indefinitely". The Council should "together seek, in good faith, a credible alternative to war and to endless inspections".

1140. Mr Belinga-Eboutou identified the "major and central problem" was to "induce the Iraqi authorities to co-operate actively, fully and unconditionally". The "gravity of the situation and the need for effectiveness" required the Council to "harmonise viewpoints through mutual concessions" to find a solution based on consensus. Council members should build a common position to make it clear to Iraq that if it wanted peaceful disarmament it had "no alternative but to abide by the decisions of the international community".

1141. Mr Tafrov stated that Dr Blix's report was nuanced. Results to date had been "modest". Co-operation was "insufficient" and Bulgaria's view was that Iraq was still in material breach of resolution 1441.

1142. Mr Tafrov thought that the tripartite memorandum and the draft resolution submitted by Spain, the US and the UK were "not incompatible". Bulgaria agreed with France, Germany and Russia that the pressure on Iraq must be increased and the draft resolution was an effective means to do so. Its adoption would be "a logical continuation of the efforts of the Security Council to make Iraq understand that patience has its limits". Bulgaria called for unity of the Council to preserve the credibility of the United Nations and a means to achieve Iraq's disarmament, and for an additional effort for peaceful disarmament.

1143. Mr Akram stated that, if war was to be avoided, the Council must impress on Iraq that it must comply "fully and faithfully". It was "unfortunate" that "divergent approaches" had emerged within the Council. Pakistan believed that "an agreed approach can and must be evolved". He stated: "Once we establish the ways to credibly achieve the disarmament of Iraq … we can also agree on a relatively short time frame." That proposition "would be better than propositions that could result in the early use of force". Pakistan did not believe there was an "imminent threat to international peace and security" and the "cost of delay" would be "much less than the cost of war". War would "have grave consequences for the Iraqi people, for peace and stability in our fragile region, for international security and for a world order based on the principles of the United Nations Charter and the rule of law".

1144. Mr François Lounceny Fall, the President of the Council and the Guinean Foreign Minister, stated that Guinea "remained convinced" that "while the opportunity for a peaceful solution still exists", it could "be seized only if the Iraqi authorities co-operate sincerely". Guinea was "in favour of continued inspections" but believed they could not "go on indefinitely". A more unified approach from the Council was the "only course" that could give the Council's actions "the necessary authority and legitimacy".

1145. Mr Aldouri underlined Iraq's "pledge to continue pro-active co-operation" with UNMOVIC and the IAEA. He drew attention to the position of France, Germany, Russia and China who had demanded that the work of the inspectors should continue and that they should "be given enough time to complete their tasks by peaceful means".

1146. Responding to Secretary Powell's statement that there was a lack of a strategic political decision by Iraq to demonstrate its commitment to comply with the UN resolutions, Mr Aldouri stated that Iraq had taken "the strategic decision to rid itself of weapons of mass destruction" in 1991. He added that:

> "All weapons that have been proscribed fall into one of two categories: they have been either declared or unilaterally destroyed by Iraq. All the declarations that Iraq has been repeatedly asked to present concerned the details and verification of that unilateral destruction and nothing … else. It is for the accusers to prove otherwise, if they possess any evidence."

1147. Mr Aldouri stated that Iraq had no VX programme.

1148. Mr Aldouri stated that the issues of concern identified by the US and UK were "an attempt to confuse the issue" and mask their real agenda to take over Iraq's oil and the political and economic domination of the region. Iraq continued to hope for justice from the Security Council and called on the Council to thwart aggression and prevent "a crime whose impact would far surpass that of any crime of the past century". He concluded:

> "… war against Iraq will wreak destruction, but it will not unearth any weapons of mass destruction, for one very simple reason: there are no such weapons, except in the imagination of some …"

1149. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that questions had been raised about what would demonstrate that Iraq had taken the strategic decision to disarm. There was no visible indication of additional votes.

1150. A "side statement" including benchmarks could be needed to bring Chile and Mexico on board.

1151. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that, during the lunch for Foreign Ministers hosted by Mr Annan:

- Mr Annan had appealed for Council unity and for UN responsibility post-conflict on humanitarian relief and administrative matters.
- Mr Straw had "defended the ultimatum idea and focused it on Iraqi co-operation, which needed no time at all to signal convincingly".
- Secretary Powell had said the "US would not have come to the UN unless it believed in collective action" and that the US "would want the UN in Iraq as soon as circumstances allowed".
- Dr Blix had said that the "months he needed were for verification with a compliant Iraq … if Saddam could turn out 13,000 pages in a month, he could manage one and a half pages of a convincing commitment to compliance in a very short time".[347]

---

[347] Telegram 389 UKMIS New York to FCO London, 8 March 2003, 'Iraq: 7 March Open Debate and Lunch'.

1152. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that "no votes were visibly harvested". The "body language" of African members "much improved" over the two days Mr Straw had been in New York; but:

> "We have not yet avoided the benchmarks problem … what would demonstrate that Iraq had taken the strategic decision to disarm… We could well need a side statement to bring the Latins on board."

1153. The Council was followed by "a long session of informal consultations".[348]

1154. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that discussion had centred on three questions raised by Mr Zinser:

- "What did the Security Council have to do to avoid the use of force?"
- "What did Saddam Hussein have to do?"
- "How long did the Council have to address these issues?"

1155. The points made by Sir Jeremy included:

- The core issue was making "best use of the limited time left".
- The Security Council "could not, in the light of existing resolutions … set itself the aim of 'avoiding war' … The real question was how the Council could ensure full implementation of the relevant resolutions (ie complete disarmament without resort to force."
- The Council "should unite in exerting the heaviest pressure on Iraq so that Saddam Hussein embarked on the road to peace before the road to war was authorised".
- "Indefinite delay was an abdication of the Council's responsibilities. Time would be needed to reach 'full and verified disarmament'; but the alternative was not an open-ended invitation to conduct investigations".
- Saddam Hussein "had to convince the co-sponsors and the Council that he and his regime had indeed changed their attitude and taken a strategic decision to disarm voluntarily".
- There was "no real evidence of non-compliance on the nuclear weapons file".
- The "key question" was whether Iraq had WMD: "The UK was sure they did. But the WMD could not be located because Iraq had hidden them, and they would not be found without unconditional and immediate Iraqi co-operation."
- The US and UK "had invested time and money in finding out the truth. So we knew that WMD were being moved every 12 hours; that mobile weapons facilities existed; and that documents and materials were being moved around."

[348] Telegram 388 UKMIS New York to FCO London, 8 March 2003, 'Iraq: 7 March 2003: Informal Consultations'.

- The Council "had not made the best use of its time since adoption of [resolution] 1441. In an understandable wish to avoid war, colleagues had perhaps not really believed the UK/US warnings: but we had taken a decision to put our need for long term security over our wish to avoid war."

1156. Sir Jeremy reported that he had asked Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei a series of questions:

- "How could they be sure the interviewees were not being bugged or threatened?"
- "What real chance was there of UNMOVIC resolving the mobile biological facilities issues without Iraqi co-operation?"
- "Was there any evidence of Iraqi procurement and sites associated with this programme?"
- What was UNMOVIC's "assessment of Iraq's declaration in relation to UAVs"?

1157. Ambassador Cunningham stated that the French and German proposals assumed Iraqi co-operation, but "it was hard, reading the UNMOVIC cluster document, to conclude that verifiable disarmament could happen in the near future or was ever feasible". Iraq was "behaving now as it had always done". Subsequently, he stated that if the Council "spent the next 10 days dreaming about benchmarks it would miss its final opportunity to secure a peaceful outcome". The Council "could assist by bringing maximum pressure to bear"; but since 20 January, "Baghdad had felt under no pressure".

1158. Mr de La Sablière was reported to be "troubled that the Council's timetable was being fixed by the US military agenda, and by having to discuss the choice between war and peace when inspections still offered a real chance of peaceful disarmament". The "clusters" document gave the Council an objective basis to address the state of Iraqi disarmament and: "Only a few questions were left to be addressed: Iraq was 'largely disarmed' …" The inspectors "should list the priority issues to be addressed and the key remaining disarmament tasks".

1159. Sir Jeremy reported that:

- Spain questioned Mr de La Sablière's comments and whether the Council was "really being asked to believe that Saddam Hussein had complied fully with resolution 1441".
- Russia said it was clear that, to avoid war the Council had to continue inspections. It also asked whether any of the intelligence received had helped the inspectors to find anything.
- China said the inspections were working and producing results; they should continue. The draft resolution would "strangle the 1441 system in its infancy".

- Germany stated that it made no sense to break off inspections, especially when the process was delivering results. The only way forward was for UNMOVIC and the IAEA to produce objective criteria.
- Cameroon stated that the threat of force had been a key element in the progress so far and military forces could not be left in place indefinitely, but 17 March might be too soon.
- Bulgaria had been ready to support the previous draft and "was studying the latest proposal positively".
- Syria said there had to be a peaceful resolution of the issue and the inspectors should produce a specific work programme.
- Chile agreed that the Council should work for a consensus; the inspection process must be allowed to mature; and Iraq must comply immediately. But he questioned how Saddam Hussein was to be judged. The real question was "whether the threat posed by Iraq was such that there had to be an end now to inspections".
- The US responded to Chile that the Council should judge Iraq on the basis of its experience. Iraqi co-operation over the years was grudging at best.
- For the UK, Sir Jeremy Greenstock said that, if Saddam Hussein admitted he had lied about Iraq's WMD over the years, "that would go a long way to convincing us that he had had a real change of heart. If he came forward with the truth; that would be respected. If he lied, he would be dealt with."

1160. In response to the points raised, Dr Blix stated that UNMOVIC worked under resolutions 1284 (1999) and 1441 (2002). The former asked for "a work programme and key disarmament tasks". UNMOVIC "did not yet know which of the many issues … were the key remaining tasks"; it "aimed to submit a list to the Council in the week beginning 19 [sic] March". The Council had asked UNMOVIC to "complete" the "remaining" disarmament tasks. Resolution 1441:

> "… imposed a greater sense of urgency on the inspection and disarmament process, but he did not think the Council's resolutions necessarily led to the conclusion that UNMOVIC's activities should cease as soon as next week. The resolutions did not demand 'immediate disarmament' but 'immediate co-operation' …"

1161. Dr Blix was also reported to have stated:

- Iraqi co-operation "sometimes seemed grudging", but "only if UNMOVIC found that Iraq was concealing things could one say that there was a real lack of co-operation".
- With the Al Samoud missiles and UAVs, Iraq was "trying to push to the boundaries of what was permissible". On the former, Iraq had arguably "trespassed over the border"; the resolution did not prohibit UAVs, but they were "on the border of what was allowed". UNMOVIC was "still investigating".

- Iraq "seemed to be trying to find ways of assisting UNMOVIC" on mobile BW facilities.
- Walls "might contain eavesdropping devices, but even taking witnesses to Cyprus might not necessarily guarantee truthful evidence".
- UNMOVIC "could be expected to deal with the key remaining disarmament tasks in a matter of months". The timetable proposed in the draft resolution "could not conceivably allow completion".
- Iraq was "frantic" but "selective" in its co-operation.
- A "strategic decision" by Iraq to co-operate would be easily recognised.
- "Various intelligence agencies were sure Iraq had retained 'a jumpstart' capacity, but UNMOVIC had seen no hard evidence."
- Not all the evidence the inspectors had been given "was convincing, and some of it was not even trustworthy".

1162. Dr ElBaradei stated that the IAEA had nearly reached a satisfactory outcome and two to three more months would lead to a conclusion. The test applied to Iraq had to be "an objective results oriented one".

1163. Sir Jeremy reported that initial reactions to the revised draft resolution had focused on "the short time offered to Iraq to comply and on the ultimatum".

1164. Following a meeting between Mr Straw and Mr Tang, Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that China did not want a second resolution "now"; was concerned about the economic, political and humanitarian consequences of a conflict; and the consequences for the UN of a public split amongst the P5.[349]

1165. Dr Blix recorded that the US and UK had made pre-emptive use of the "clusters" document before it was formally circulated after the Security Council meeting on 7 March.

1166. Dr Blix wrote that although the members of the Security Council knew of the existence of the draft, they were not aware of its contents before finalised copies of the text were presented on 7 March.[350] The German and Russian Foreign Ministers had been:

> "… keen that it should become public to show that precise requirements could be placed on Iraq, rather than nebulous demands for a 'strategic decision' or a 'change of heart' … neither the US nor the UK was opposed to a declassification of what was still an internal document. As it turned out, both the US and the UK Foreign Ministers got copies of the not yet declassified draft, presumably through the American and British members of our College [of Commissioners].

"The German and French foreign ministers, who had been eager to make use of the document but did not have such a channel of quick provision … could not make use of it to show what concrete benchmarks might look like. Their US and UK colleagues, by contrast, were therefore able to make extensive and preemptive use of the draft to show how unreliable Iraqi declarations and conduct had been in the past."

1167. Dr Blix added that Mr John Wolf, the US Commissioner, had been critical of the relevance of the draft "clusters" document, which provided "only a readable historical account testifying to Iraq's deception" and had only a few pages on what had happened after 1998. The US was interested in whether Iraq had taken "a strategic decision", and that "was all that mattered". The US "did not afford the smallest window to the benchmark approach that Washington saw London working on". The US "disdain" had "shocked and surprised the other members of the College".

1168. President Putin told Mr Blair on 7 March that Russia would oppose military action.

1169. Following the discussions with Mr Ivanov on 4 and 5 March and the observation in Mr Brenton's telegram of 6 March, that the Americans were sanguine about avoiding a Russian veto, Sir Roderic Lyne wrote to Mr Ricketts on 6 March with advice, including for Mr Blair's planned telephone conversation with President Putin.[351] The letter was copied to Sir David Manning.

1170. Sir Roderic wrote that he was "less sanguine" about avoiding a Russian veto unless the French position changed. Mr Ivanov's aim was to help deny nine positive votes for the resolution and thereby avoid the need to take a definitive decision. He would have reported to President Putin that the UK was not totally confident of success and was looking at concessions over language.

1171. Sir Roderic suggested that when Mr Blair spoke to President Putin, he should repeat and reinforce the message that he had given to Mr Ivanov, and argue that the issue was about two fundamental questions of principle:

- The need to deal with the problem of proliferation. That was: "big … and … getting worse … The international community had let this drift … We have to work together on this. We can't go around attacking everyone; but if Iraq gets away with it, it's open house for everyone … we've got to send the message that the Iraqi threat is over. Dealing with it … will help us stabilise the Middle East (it's what moderate Arabs privately want). And, with this behind us, we can get together to bring the full range of diplomatic pressures to bear on those who proliferate or support terrorism."

[351] Letter Lyne to Ricketts, 6 March 2003, 'Iraq/Russia: Ivanov's Visit, the End Game, and the Prime Minister's Call to Putin this Evening'.

- A multilateral approach to the problem was "hanging in the balance". Mr Blair had "persuaded" President Bush to go through the UN because he wanted to "preserve the Security Council" and wanted "the UN – and all of us, Russia included – to have a say in what happens thereafter in and around Iraq". That was "as much in Russia's interest as the UK's".

1172. The conversation with President Putin lasted over an hour. Mr Blair emphasised the importance of working with Russia as a partner and the need to stand firm in dealing with the threat of terrorism and WMD.[352] The record stated that Mr Blair had told President Putin that resolution 1441 had given Saddam Hussein a final opportunity:

> "He had made some concessions with troops on his doorstep, but he was not co-operating fully and had no intention of disarming. We must carry out what we had said we would do to uphold UN authority and avoid unilateral action. So we would put the second resolution to a vote, with terms to be discussed. We would have nine or ten votes."

1173. During the conversation – and in response to a suggestion that Iraq was currently co-operating, presented no threat to its close neighbours or to the US or UK, had nothing to do with fundamentalist terrorists, and that inspections should continue on the basis of the disarmament tasks based on resolution 1284 (1999) – Mr Blair argued that the time required was that needed to make a judgement about whether there was full Iraqi co-operation; and that Dr Blix's "clusters" document would set out the outstanding items. In his view:

> "In the absence of full co-operation, Iraq was in breach … we must explore every possibility to resolve the issue peacefully, including through forcing Saddam into exile. Saddam would only do so if he thought the alternative was force."

1174. Mr Rycroft recorded that President Putin thought military action would be a mistake which Russia would oppose. He commented that President Putin had been:

> "… unyielding, but at pains to spell out his reasoning in great detail … On the face of it, a clear intention to veto. But there may have been just a hint that if negotiations begin in New York, and engage Moscow, that he will at least be ready to listen."

Lord Goldsmith's advice, 7 March 2003

1175. Lord Goldsmith wrote to Mr Blair on 7 March, recording that he had been asked for advice on the legality of military action against Iraq without another resolution of the Security Council.[353]

1176. That is addressed in Section 5.

Mr Blair's conversation with President Bush, 7 March 2003

1177. When Mr Blair spoke to President Bush at 1800 on 7 March, he emphasised the importance of securing nine positive votes in the Security Council for Parliamentary approval for UK military action.

1178. Mr Blair argued that while the 17 March deadline in the draft resolution was not sufficient for Iraq to disarm fully, it was sufficient to make a judgement on whether Saddam Hussein had had a change of heart. If Iraq started to co-operate, the inspectors could have as much time as they liked.

1179. Sir David Manning discussed the response to French and Russian tactics to try to prevent a vote on the draft resolution with Dr Rice on 7 March.[354] Sir David told Dr Rice that the UK "had to have" a vote: that it "had to have one that was understood to be an ultimatum"; and that it "had to have nine votes". The UK "could probably manage the political fall-out if there were a veto, or perhaps even two vetoes", but the UK "could not take part in military campaign if they did not reach the nine vote threshold. We would not be able to get the necessary Parliamentary support."

1180. Sir David Manning subsequently told Dr Rice that President Putin was opposed to the resolution and would reject it. There was also a further discussion of the political position in the UK: Sir David "repeated at length" the point he had made that morning and said that "we had to do whatever it took to secure nine votes". That "might mean adjusting the wording of the second resolution; it might mean time; or it might mean some sort of benchmarking".

1181. Sir David reported that Dr Rice had assured him that President Bush was determined to deliver nine votes. Sir David also commented: "But although the Administration is clearly pulling out all the stops, there is still no sign of willingness to accept that this may mean extending the time lines."

1182. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries:

> "Condi [Rice] had told David [Manning] overnight that Putin had been clear with Bush that they would veto a second resolution. Also we still didn't have a clue as to whether Chile and Mexico would come over. The mood was gloomier than ever.

> TB was keen to get up the clusters document and also move towards the sense of an ultimatum. He and David were both now expressing their irritation at the US. David was even of the view that we should be pushing the US to a version of the Franco-German idea of inspections with force, a blue beret [UN] force involved on disarmament."[355]

1183. When Mr Blair spoke to President Bush, they discussed progress and further lobbying.[356]

1184. Mr Blair emphasised again the importance of securing nine positive votes for Parliamentary approval for military action.

1185. Mr Blair stated:

> "… there remained a confusion in many minds … about time. If Saddam had decided to co-operate fully, the inspectors could have as much time as they wanted. But he had not – no-one believed he was co-operating unconditionally and fully. Ten days was of course not enough for him to disarm fully, but it was enough to make a judgement on whether there was a change of heart. In 1441 we had all agreed to full, immediate and unconditional co-operation, not concessions dribbled out under the threat of force."

1186. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair had:

> "… wanted to give him [President Bush] a clear message about the political realities, namely that we couldn't do this without a Commons vote and it was not going to be easy without a second resolution, or with a resolution that was vetoed. The Russian veto was a new element … Putin's position had clearly hardened. During their call Putin was very clear that he felt taken for granted by the Americans …"[357]

1187. Mr Campbell also wrote that President Bush:

- was agreeing to a slightly later deadline, 17 March;
- had told Mr Blair that he would "certainly go for a vote on the second resolution", although he was "still making clear he didn't feel he needed a UNSCR";
- "was at least conscious of the difficulties they gave us"; and
- had said to Mr Blair, "don't worry, I'll be more subtle than you fear …"

1188. Mr Blair had a meeting with Mr Powell, Baroness Morgan, Mr Campbell and Mr Pat McFadden, Mr Blair's Deputy Chief of Staff, to discuss the "what-ifs", including if he lost the vote in the House of Commons.[358] Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair "still felt we were doing the right thing. He said even though we were all rightly irritated by the Americans, it was the French we should be really angry with."

1189. Mr Campbell added:

> "We were all outraged at the Blix report. TB said it was political and dishonest … Scarlett said he was wrong in saying the Iraqis were trying to co-operate more … TB was very philosophic about it all. As I sat listening to him on the phone, I lost count of how many times he said: 1. we are right on the issue; 2. we have to see it through; 3, I'm philosophical about what it means for me and whether I survive or not. TB was keen to push the idea that the only reason the concessions were coming was because of the pressure we were applying. But there were very real divisions and dangers and the UN was on dangerous terrain. There was a very clear picture, clearer than ever, of the US in one place, us in another, the French in another, the Russians in another, and the UN as an organisation really worried about where it was heading."

1190. Mr Campbell wrote that on 8 March: "Blix didn't come out as badly as it might have done. In a sense he was almost irrelevant now."[359] He had agreed with Mr Blair "the lines to push for the Sundays [Sunday newspapers] – namely there are two routes by which he can avoid conflict: 1. he disarms, or 2. he goes." The key was winning the necessary votes at the UN. Mr Blair "was clear we just had to keep our nerve and keep striving to get their votes".

1191. Mr Cook wrote that Dr Blix's report was "carefully balanced" and "painfully honest", which was not what the US and UK needed: "No.10 desperately wanted Blix to lay into Saddam and to report no progress, in order that they could mobilise the Security Council for war."[360]

1192. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Mr Blair drew attention to the passage in Dr Blix's report which stated:

> "It is obvious that while the numerous initiatives which are now taken by the Iraqi side with a view to resolving some longstanding, open disarmament issues can be seen as active or even proactive. These initiatives three or four months into the new resolution, cannot be said to constitute immediate co-operation. Nor do they necessarily cover all areas of relevance. They are nonetheless welcome."[361]

1193. In his memoir, Mr Blair subsequently wrote:

> "Having stated that it [co-operation] was increasing, which as he [Dr Blix] put it in somewhat of an understatement, 'may well be due to outside pressure', he then addressed the matter of interviews and documents:
> 'It is obvious that, while the numerous initiatives, which are now taken by the Iraqi side with a view to resolving some long-standing open disarmament issues, can be seen as 'active' or even 'pro-active', these initiatives some 3-4 months into the new resolution cannot be said to constitute 'immediate co-operation.'
> "Most of all, on the crucial matter of interviews, Blix was never going to get co-operation. That only came after March 2003 with the ISG [Iraq Survey Group, see Section 4.4] …"[362]

1194. The development of UK strategy and options from 8 March is addressed in Section 3.8.

Introduction

1. This Section addresses the final attempts to secure support for the UK, US and Spanish draft resolution tabled in the Security Council on 7 March 2003 and, when that failed, the UK Government's decision to take military action without the support of the majority of the Security Council.

2. Other key developments during that time are addressed elsewhere in the Report, including:

- provision of advice by Lord Goldsmith, the Attorney General, on the legal basis for military action to secure Iraq's compliance with its disarmament obligations, which is addressed in Section 5;
- planning for military operations in southern Iraq, which is addressed in Section 6.2;
- UK planning and preparations for a post-Saddam Hussein Iraq, which are addressed in Section 6.5; and
- assessments and advice on Iraq's chemical, biological, nuclear and ballistic missile capabilities, its intention to conceal them from inspections and its intentions for their use in response to a military attack, which are addressed in Section 4.3. That Section also addresses the withdrawal after the conflict of three streams of intelligence reporting which had influenced judgements about Iraq's capabilities and intentions.

3. The Inquiry's conclusions in relation to the development of the UK Government's strategy and options on Iraq before the invasion began, including the way in which the policy was developed and decisions were taken, are contained in Section 7.

The end of the UN route

4. In an attempt to secure support in the Security Council for the second resolution, Mr Blair decided on 8 March to propose delaying a decision and identifying specific tests as the basis to determine whether Saddam Hussein intended to co-operate.

5. Mr Blair began by consulting Mr Ricardo Lagos, the Chilean President, who agreed the proposal was worth exploring, although he thought more time would be needed.

6. The UK's attempts, during February and early March 2003, to reach agreement with the US on the text of a draft resolution stating that Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity to comply with its obligations and to secure international support for that position, and the opposition of France, Russia and others, are set out in Section 3.7.

7. The text of the UK, US and Spanish draft resolution tabled in the Security Council on 7 March called on Iraq "to take the decisions necessary in the interests of its people and the region", which was characterised as a strategic decision by Iraq to disarm.

8. The draft resolution also set a deadline of 17 March for Iraq to demonstrate its "full, unconditional, immediate and active co-operation" in accordance with its obligations and to yield possession of all prohibited items to the UN Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC) or the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA).

9. In the discussions in New York on 7 March, questions were raised about how the judgement would be made that Iraq had taken a strategic decision to disarm.[1] Sir Jeremy Greenstock, UK Permanent Representative to the UN in New York, also advised that benchmarks for Iraqi compliance would need to be agreed to secure the support of Chile and Mexico for the UK's proposals.

10. In his conversation with President Bush on 7 March, Mr Blair emphasised the importance of securing nine positive votes in the Security Council for Parliamentary approval for UK military action.[2] While the 17 March deadline in the draft resolution was not sufficient for Iraq to disarm fully, it was sufficient to make a judgement on whether Saddam Hussein had had a change of heart. Mr Blair argued that if Iraq started to co-operate, the inspectors could have as much time as they liked.

11. Following up their conversations in the previous week, Mr Blair spoke to President Lagos on 8 March.[3]

12. The draft speaking note produced by Mr Matthew Rycroft, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, suggested that Mr Blair could tell President Lagos that, after the report to the Security Council on 7 March by Dr Hans Blix, the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC:

> "… no one believes that Saddam has given immediate, unconditional or full co-operation and intelligence shows that he has no intention of doing so, but that he will continue to dribble out concessions under pressure from our military build-up in order to fool some people and divide international opinion.
> "We must not allow ourselves to be fooled. Equally we need to be fair, so that Saddam genuinely does have a chance for a change of heart to avert military action. So I have taken on board your point that you need some concrete tests to judge Saddam by."

[3] Minute Rycroft to Prime Minister, 8 March 2003, 'Iraq: Chile'.

13. The points in the speaking note also included:

- A description of "five key areas and one key test in each area, for Saddam to meet by 17 March", which had been "picked out" from the draft "clusters" document produced by UNMOVIC.[4]
- If Saddam Hussein "had any intention of complying, he would be able to do these. If he were to do all of them, it would show that he has had a change of heart, though even then it would not add up to full disarmament."
- The tests were designed to be "as straightforward and concrete as possible".
- The "onus" was "on Saddam to prove his innocence, not on us to prove his guilt".

14. It was clear in Mr Blair's discussion with President Lagos on 8 March that Chile did not support the approach in the draft resolution.[5]

15. Mr Blair stated that he had worked out five specific tests. He would send them to President Lagos, who agreed to discuss the proposals with Mr Vicente Fox, the Mexican President.

16. Mr Blair told President Lagos that China would not veto the resolution but France would; and that he had not given up on persuading Russia to abstain. A "further reason to want a second resolution, with a gap before the start of military action, was to give the Arabs a chance to press Saddam to go into exile".

17. Sir David Manning, Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser and Head of the Cabinet Office Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec), subsequently wrote to President Lagos setting out five tests.[6]

18. The first test would be to insist on interviews outside Iraq as specified in resolution 1441. The remaining four tests were "based on" the UNMOVIC "clusters" document and would require Saddam Hussein "to provide either the material that is unaccounted for, or to produce full documentation proving its destruction" in respect of:

- chemical weapons – "specifically VX";
- biological weapons – "specifically anthrax";
- missiles – "specifically SCUDS"; and
- remotely piloted vehicles (RPVs) – "specifically their possible adaptation to deliver CW [chemical weapons]".

19. Sir David stated that Mr Blair believed:

> "… that if Saddam Hussein intends to disarm voluntarily, and comply with successive UN resolutions, he should be ready to co-operate fully in each of these categories. The Prime Minister also believes that public opinion would see these five demands as clear and fair tests of Saddam Hussein's intentions, and ones that can quickly be met."

20. In a further conversation late on 9 March, President Lagos and Mr Blair discussed the proposed tests.[7]

21. Mr Blair agreed that they should check that Dr Blix "did not think the tests were unreasonable". If the tests showed that Saddam Hussein was serious about co-operation, the tests could be followed by a timetable leading to disarmament. The proposal was "halfway between setting out a detailed time schedule now, which the US would not agree, and the current situation with its lack of definition of full co-operation".

22. Mr Blair also raised the possibility of pushing back the deadline to 24 March, "though he had not raised this with the US".

23. Mr Blair told President Lagos that:

> "… he thought we had eight votes. If Mexico and Chile could support the resolution on the basis of these proposals there would be enormous pressure on Saddam, and it would be possible that France/Russia would not veto."

24. President Lagos agreed the approach was worth exploring, but he would want to see changes to the wording of the draft ultimatum and an additional week.

25. On 9 March, Ms Clare Short, the International Development Secretary, declared she would resign if the UK took military action against Iraq without UN authority.

26. In an interview for BBC Radio 4's Westminster Hour broadcast on 9 March, Ms Clare Short said she would resign from the Government if the UK took military action against Iraq without UN authority.[8]

27. Asked whether she thought Mr Blair had acted "recklessly", Ms Short described the situation as "extraordinarily reckless".

28. In response to further questions Ms Short said:

- "… what worries me is that we've got the old spin back and we have detailed discussions either personally or in the Cabinet and then the spin the next day is: 'we're ready for war'."

- "If it takes another month or so, that is fine …"
- "… I think you could get a world where we see the UN in authority … proper care for the people of Iraq, because at the moment the preparations to care for the humanitarian aftermath of any military conflict are not properly in place."
- "And there's another major legal point – if there isn't a UN mandate for the reconstruction of Iraq … It will in international law be an occupying army and won't have the authority to make changes in the administrative arrangements in Iraq."

29. Ms Short informed Mr Alastair Campbell, Mr Blair's Director of Communications and Strategy, and Mr Suma Chakrabarti, the Department for International Development (DFID) Permanent Secretary, of her action as soon as the interview had been recorded.[9]

30. Ms Short wrote in her memoir that she:

> "… had decided war was unstoppable. I had experienced enough wars to know that it was too late to criticise when our troops were on the ground …"[10]

31. Ms Short also wrote that her diary entry for 9 March read:

> "TB [Mr Blair] rang, furious. Said I am undermining his delicate negotiations …
> "… I said sorry to upset but doing what I think right, no good resigning after war started. He said 7 days yet, can't leave that man there."

32. Mr Robin Cook, who in March 2003 was Leader of the House of Commons, wrote that on 10 March he had agreed with Ms Hilary Armstrong, the Chief Whip, that, on 13 March, he would announce a debate on Iraq for the following week.[11]

33. No.10 officials emphasised to their counterparts in the White House the crucial importance of securing nine votes in support of a resolution in the Security Council.

34. The UK thought that more time, possibly until the end of March, could be needed to build support.

35. Sir David Manning told Dr Condoleezza Rice, the US National Security Advisor, that he thought they were "still short of nine votes" for the draft resolution.[12] Chile and Mexico "would probably abstain" and China "might veto in French and Russian company". There was "an increasingly difficult domestic political background", which "re-emphasised how crucial it was to secure nine votes". Time would be a factor in that.

36. Sir David argued that the US and UK "should be ready to oblige if what they wanted was another ten days, or the end of the month". That would be:

> "… a small price to pay for securing the nine votes that were needed if UK forces were to participate in military action, and if we were to be sure that the Prime Minister could survive a vote in the House of Commons. Obviously these were our priorities … It did not make sense to give the military timetable precedence over the political realities … I could not believe that the military planning could not be massaged to allow more time if there was a chance that this would make the difference."

37. Sir David commented that he had:

> "… laid it on the line this evening. I left Condi [Dr Rice] in no doubt about our political difficulties; and … that the Administration should be ready to make concessions on test/benchmarks and on timing if that was what it took to get nine votes …"

38. The timing of the vote on a second a resolution and for a Parliamentary debate in the UK, and the potential difficulties of securing nine votes in the Security Council and a majority in Parliament, were discussed in a subsequent conference call between Mr Jonathan Powell, Mr Blair's Chief of Staff, Mr Campbell and Sir David Manning and the White House.[13]

39. In his diaries, Mr Campbell wrote that the White House had said that:

> "… if we got a majority with vetoes, Bush wanted to go straight in, within days, even short of the March 17 deadline, would say the UN had failed to act, and get going, on the basis of 1441. We made the point that we needed a second resolution. Without it we had real problems in Parliament. They said continually that they wanted to help us but of course what they really wanted was the use of our forces.
> "Jonathan and I continually emphasised we needed the second resolution. We had seven definite votes still, but Condi was less confident re Chile and Mexico … They [the US] basically wanted by Tuesday/Wednesday to say we had exhausted every effort and now the diplomatic window had closed. We said that if we got the majority for a second resolution, even with vetoes we would have to go through with it, including the timetable. Andy Card [President Bush's Chief of Staff] said he feared the President's response would be 'Here we go, another final opportunity, a final final opportunity and this time we really mean it.' I said TB's job was on the line and we did not want to lose him. 'No, nor do we', said Condi. I think our concern was probably deeper."[14]

40. Mr Blair left President Bush in no doubt that he needed a second resolution to secure Parliamentary support for UK involvement in military action and sought support for his initiative of setting out tests in a side statement, including that the vote in the Security Council might have to be delayed "by a couple of days".

41. Offered the opportunity not to take military action, Mr Blair assured President Bush the UK would be with the US "if he possibly could be".

42. President Bush was evidently unwilling to countenance delay and was reported to have told Mr Blair that, if the second resolution failed, he would find another way to involve the UK.

43. Mr Blair and President Bush discussed the position late on 9 March, including the positions of Mexico and Chile.[15]

44. Mr Blair told President Bush that he was working with President Lagos on identifying tests for compliance in five specific areas and suggested that they (the US and the UK) should consider delaying the vote by a couple of days.

45. Mr Blair told President Bush that "he [Mr Blair] would be with the US if he possibly could be".

46. Mr Rycroft recorded that President Bush responded that if the second resolution failed, he would find another way to involve the UK. He would "rather go alone militarily than have the British Government fall".

47. President Bush wrote in his memoir that he told Mr Blair he would "rather have him drop out of the Coalition and keep his government than try to stay in and lose it"; and that Mr Blair said, "I'm with you … I absolutely believe in this. I will take it up to the very last".[16]

48. Mr Campbell wrote:

> "TB started by saying he was 'fighting on all fronts'. 'Attaboy' came the reply, a bit too patronisingly for my tastes. TB said one of his Ministers was threatening to resign, also that Chirac [Mr Jacques Chirac, the French President] told Lagos that the Africans were 'in the bag' … TB had spoken to four of the leaders who made up the 8 plus 1. Musharraf [Mr Pervez Musharraf, the Pakistani President] was with us but it was difficult for him. Cameroon said absolutely. Guinea's Foreign Minister coming tomorrow. Dos Santos [Mr José Eduardo Dos Santos, the Angolan President] solid.

would also come with us. But Bush said he was already putting enormous pressure on Mexico. He said he had also been twisting Lagos' arm …

"Bush not happy. Bush said Saddam was very adept at exploiting weakness and Blix was weak. These countries need to see that we want to do this peacefully. He wants the vote to go through but not on an unreasonable basis.

"TB said the public opinion problem stemmed from people feeling the US wanted a war. We have to put up the genuine tests of disarmament, show the determination to try to do this peacefully.

"Bush said he had never come across a situation where the dividing line between success and failure was so narrow. He said he wanted it done peacefully, or any other way. His tone was very different to TB's. Bush was talking the diplomatic talk while clearly very irritated by the whole thing. His worry was that we were negotiating with ourselves, that we got a resolution with a timeframe, everything we want, and we get nothing for it. He said he couldn't believe Chirac said he had the Africans in the bag. 'I can', said TB. 'I have a lot of experience of them.'

"He [Bush] was clearly aware of how tough things were getting for TB. He said if the swing countries didn't vote with us 'my last choice is for your Government to go down. That is the absolute last thing I want to have happen. I would rather go it alone than have your Government fall.' 'I appreciate that', said TB. 'I really mean that' said Bush. TB said it was also important that he understood that he really believed in what they were trying to do. Bush – 'I know that but I am not going to see your Government fall on this.'

"TB said 'I've got our troops there too. If I can't get this through Parliament, we fall, and that's not exactly the regime change I want. We have to work out what Chile and Mexico need.'

"They agreed to speak again to Lagos and to Fox. TB said we were in high-risk, high-reward territory. Bush said he was being eroded domestically by inactivity. He also said he felt the hardest part would be after Saddam. Then Bush did a number on the changes in the Arab world that could follow.

"TB said the biggest concern in not going with the UN was the lack of support if things went wrong. Tommy Franks [General Franks, Commander in Chief US Central Command (CENTCOM)] had said ninety per cent of precision bombs are precise. That leaves ten per cent.

"But Bush was left in no doubt TB would be with him when the time came.

"Bush said 'I'm not going to let you down. Hang on in there buddy. You are doing great.'

> "What had been interesting was that Bush listened far more intently to TB. TB did not make too much of his own problems, and was stressing he thought we were doing the right thing."[17]

49. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that Dr Blix was prepared to work with the UK on identifying tests "as long as the bar was not out of reach of a complying Iraq".

50. Dr Blix had reminded Sir Jeremy that UNMOVIC still lacked clear evidence that Iraq possessed any weapons of mass destruction (WMD).

51. Sir Jeremy Greenstock met Dr Blix late on 9 March to explore whether the various ideas for an ultimatum combined with specific tests for Iraq could be made part of a new UN resolution.[18]

52. Sir Jeremy told Dr Blix that the "risk of failure on our current draft was high enough for another way forward to be contemplated". The UK might now be prepared "to set Saddam a series of tests, with dates set for him to meet specific requirements. If he failed at any stage, the final opportunity would be lost". It would be important to devise tests that set the bar high, and not to lower them "in the face of Iraqi bluster". The UK needed a professional judgement from Dr Blix on which areas should be set as tests.

53. Sir Jeremy reported that Dr Blix was prepared to work with the UK on a series of tests over timed periods "as long as the bar was not out of reach of a complying Iraq"; and that he had assured Dr Blix that that was not the UK's objective. The US still had to be persuaded, "but that was our job".

54. Dr Blix had also reminded Sir Jeremy "that UNMOVIC still lacked clear evidence that Iraq possessed any WMD at all".

55. Following discussion of the details, Sir Jeremy commented that:

> "… subject to further thoughts from UNMOVIC … a convincing test by, say 21 March would comprise:
> - Interviews [outside Iraq], accepting UNMOVIC's lower number, with a venue of either Larnaca or Bahrain, and adding a warning about intimidation.
> - RPVs and spray tanks [for possible delivery of chemical or biological agent]: full documentation and explanations.
> - Completion of the Al Samoud destruction (since they are obviously keeping some for a conflict).
> - A convincing public statement by Saddam."

56. The FCO suggested some changes to the tests identified by No.10.

57. Mr Tim Dowse, Head of the FCO Non-Proliferation Department, wrote to Mr Peter Ricketts, FCO Political Director, on 10 March, commenting that the No.10 benchmarks "more or less" overlapped with a version he had produced, but cautioning against setting a figure on the number of scientists to be interviewed outside Iraq.[19] In Mr Dowse's view there was "no magic in 150"; UNMOVIC could not handle that number.

58. Mr Dowse also commented that:

- The tests on biological programmes might include growth media as well as anthrax. Iraq had admitted possessing material "as recently as 1999" and it was "simply not credible that all documentation has disappeared in such a short space of time".
- He had "included the mobile bio-labs mainly because they've had so much publicity", and there was "fairly firm intelligence about them"; but if Iraq refused to admit their existence, the UK was "in a bind, because we are unlikely to be able to prove they do exist. So perhaps we should drop them."
- He had included bombs and shells because they were "concrete things, more easily visualised than VX", and there was "less room for argument over whether they have been destroyed or not" in the light of the "scope for Iraqi obfuscation over destruction of VX".
- The problem with "almost any benchmark relating to SCUD-type missiles" was that Iraq had claimed they were destroyed and "we can't prove the contrary". Demands for the 50 SCUD warheads which were "unaccounted-for" faced the same problem.
- He thought accelerated destruction of the Al Samoud 2 missiles and the associated production equipment, including "the test stand [at al-Rafah] if Blix agrees", would be a better test.
- The No.10 benchmark on Unmanned Aerial Vehicles (UAVs) was "a poor one" referring to a programme in the 1990s. It would be better "to use the 'drone with a wingspan of 7.45 metres' which UNMOVIC have just discovered" which had not been declared by Iraq and which the US was "pretty confident" was an illegal system which they thought they had tracked "flying over 500km".
- His preference was to pitch the test more widely for the destruction of "all UAVs with CBW applications".

59. Mr Ricketts sent the comments to Mr Rycroft, observing that there were some good comments and Mr Dowse was available to be used for further drafting.[20]

60. In his discussion with Mr Blair, Dr Blix appears to have been ambivalent about the specifics of the UK's proposed tests.

61. In preparation for a telephone call to Dr Blix on 10 March, Mr Rycroft advised Mr Blair that he could not allow the proposals for tests to be watered down and that initial tests would show whether there was a change of heart to allow full co-operation.[21] Mr Blair might need to remind Dr Blix that his 7 March report had noted that Iraq should be able to provide more documentary evidence; and that where documents were not available, interviews could be another way to obtain evidence.

62. Mr Blair told Dr Blix that "the only way to avoid immediate conflict and allow more time for inspections was to lay down a set of tests … If these were met, we could establish a future work programme."[22] He did not know if the US would agree the approach and could try to "extend the 17 March deadline a bit".

63. In the discussion of the possible tests, Dr Blix noted that it would not be possible for Iraq to "yield up" all its WMD by 17 March, as proposed in the draft resolution. The proposed test on anthrax would also be difficult. He suggested the addition of the complete destruction of Al Samoud missiles.

64. Dr Blix wrote that he had been invited to the UK Permanent Mission to the UN in New York to take a call from Mr Blair at 1.30pm London time.[23] Mr Blair had said "they needed five or six items on which the Iraqis would demonstrate their compliance with UNMOVIC's work programme". The items the UK had been considering "included accounting for anthrax, the chemical agents VX and mustard, SCUD missiles and remotely piloted vehicles: and promising genuine co-operation with UNMOVIC's plans to take scientists (along with their families) for interviews outside Iraq".

65. Dr Blix wrote that: "The process could not go on until April/May but perhaps it could extend a few days beyond March 17."

66. Dr Blix added that he had told Mr Blair that all the "items" he had mentioned would fall within the list of unresolved disarmament issues, but: "Whether they would all be among the key issues we would select, I could not yet say with certainty."

67. Dr Blix commented that he had "sensed" that Mr Blair had "found it hard to persuade the US to go along".

Mr Straw's statement, 10 March 2003

68. Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary, told the House of Commons on 10 March that the choice lay between standing firm and giving Saddam Hussein a deadline for compliance or a return to the "failed policy" of containment.

69. Mr Straw made an oral statement to the House of Commons on 10 March in which he described the reports to the Security Council on 7 March by Dr Blix and

Dr Mohamed ElBaradei, the Director General of the IAEA, and the provisions of the revised draft resolution, tabled by the UK, US and Spain on 7 March, giving the Iraqi regime a deadline by which it was required to demonstrate that it was prepared to disarm peacefully.[24]

70. Mr Straw emphasised that resolution 1441, giving "Iraq a 'final opportunity' to comply with a series of disarmament obligations" had been adopted four months previously; and that, during the debate in the Security Council:

> "… not a single speaker claimed that Iraq was in compliance with those obligations; neither did a single speaker deny that Iraq has been in flagrant breach of international law for the past 12 years."

71. Mr Straw welcomed Dr ElBaradei's report that "the IAEA had found no evidence or plausible indication of the revival of a nuclear weapons programme in Iraq".

72. Dr Blix, "on the other hand", had "reported movement in some limited areas: for example the partial destruction of prohibited Al Samoud missiles". But that was "only the tip of the iceberg of Iraq's illegal weapons programme", and the "full extent of the iceberg was revealed" in an UNMOVIC document, Unresolved Disarmament Issues: Iraq's Proscribed weapons Programmes, which had now been made public.[25] Mr Straw described the document as setting out, in "173 pages of painstaking detail, the terrible nature of the weapons Saddam has sought with such determination to develop".
It was "a catalogue of evasion, deceit and feigning co-operation while in reality pursuing concealment". The "sheer scale of Iraq's efforts to develop and hide" its weapons could "be grasped only by reading the whole document".

73. Citing the potential impact of "tiny amounts" of anthrax, Mr Straw stated that: "Contrary to Iraqi assertions", the inspectors found evidence of anthrax where Iraq had declared there was none. There was "a strong presumption that some 10,000 litres of anthrax" had not been destroyed and "may still exist", and Iraq possessed "the technology and materials to allow it to return swiftly to the pre-1991 production levels".

74. Addressing the suggestions that inspections should be given more time, and specifically the memorandum produced by France, Germany and Russia on 5 March, Mr Straw said that Saddam Hussein was "a master at playing for time" and that continuing inspections "with no firm end date" would "not achieve the disarmament required by the Security Council".

75. Challenging Iraq's claim that it had no weapons of mass destruction, Mr Straw said it was:

> "… the same old refrain that we have heard … for the past 12 years. Yet whenever the inspectors have caught the regime out, it has first protested, then conceded that narrow point, but then mendaciously claimed that there are no more."

76. Characterising the choice to be made as whether to "stand firm" in pursuing the objective of disarmament or settling for a policy which would "in truth" allow Saddam Hussein to:

> "… rebuild his arsenal under cover of just enough co-operation to keep the inspectors tied down for years to come. We should not deceive ourselves. The alternative proposals before the Security Council amount to a return to the failed policy of so-called containment. But the truth is that containment can never bring disarmament, nor is it the policy of the United Nations as expressed in resolution 1441 and in all the preceding resolutions going back to 1991."

77. Stating that the reality was that Saddam Hussein only responded to pressure, and therefore that that pressure should be increased, Mr Straw said that Saddam Hussein had to be put to the test. The initiative to produce the revised resolution tabled in the Security Council on 7 March stemmed from the Government's "desire to secure a peaceful outcome". Negotiations on the detail were continuing and the UK was "examining whether a list of defined tests for Iraqi compliance would be useful in helping the Security Council to come to a judgement".

78. Mr Straw said that he profoundly hoped that the Iraqi regime would "even at this late stage, seize the chance to disarm peacefully". He added: "The only other peaceful alternative would be for Saddam Hussein to heed the calls of a number of other Arab leaders for him to go into exile and to hand over to a new leadership prepared to conform with the Council's demands." If Saddam Hussein refused to co-operate, the Security Council "had to face up to its clear responsibilities" under the UN Charter.

79. Addressing the potential consequences of military action, Mr Straw stated that the international community would have "a duty to build a secure, prosperous future for the Iraqi people". In his meeting with Mr Kofi Annan, the UN Secretary-General, on 6 March, he had proposed "that the UN should take the lead role in co-ordinating international efforts to rebuild Iraq, and that they should be underpinned by a clear UN mandate".

80. Mr Straw acknowledged the fear that action on Iraq might "exacerbate tensions elsewhere in the region", and emphasised the need for progress in restoring a meaningful peace process between Israel and the Palestinian Authority. He concluded:

> "A lasting settlement in the Middle East will remove one great threat to security … In confronting the danger from Iraq's weapons, the UN can remove another great threat. We must not let Saddam turn his 'final opportunity' to disarm … into endless > opportunities to delay. The future not only of the region but of UN authority is at stake."

81. Mr Michael Ancram (Conservative), described the Iraq situation as outlined by Mr Straw as "grim" and encouraged the Government, in response to the serious questions and doubts about whether the case for action had been made, to "ensure that the case for action continues to be made and strongly", and to produce more of the information it had for the British people to absorb.

82. Asked by Mr Ancram what the Government's position would be in the event that three Permanent Members of the Security Council vetoed a second resolution, Mr Straw replied:

> "We have made it clear throughout that we want a second resolution for political reasons, because a consensus is required, if we can achieve it, for any military action. On the legal basis for that, it should be pointed out that resolution 1441 does not require a second resolution …"

83. Mr Michael Moore (Liberal Democrat) asked Mr Straw to accept that there were "still diplomatic and political options open to the international community and that the military agenda must not dictate the calendar for inspections"; and if he believed that "war should be the last resort". Threatening to ignore the United Nations undermined the principles of international law.

84. Mr Straw responded that war was and "should always be a last resort". The UK was not ignoring the UN. Mr Blair had "moved heaven and earth to ensure that the whole issue of Iraq" was "dealt with through the United Nations".

85. Asked by Mr Simon Thomas (Plaid Cymru) to remind the House "exactly … which part of resolution 1441 authorises war", Mr Straw said:

> "I am delighted to do so. We start with paragraph 1, which says that the Security Council 'Decides that Iraq has been and remains in material breach of its obligations under relevant resolutions, including resolution 687 … in particular through Iraq's failure to co-operate with United Nations inspectors and the IAEA, and to complete the actions required under paragraph 8 to 13 of resolution 687'.
> "We then go to paragraph 4, in which the Security Council 'Decides that false statements or omissions in the declarations submitted by Iraq pursuant to this resolution and failure by Iraq at any time to comply with, and co-operate fully in the implementation of, this resolution shall constitute a further material breach of Iraq's obligations' – obligations of which it is now in breach. We turn to operative paragraph 13, in which the Security Council 'Recalls, in that context, that the Council has repeatedly warned Iraq that it will face serious consequences as a result of its continued violations of its obligations'."

INFORMAL CONSULTATIONS IN NEW YORK

86. Reporting informal consultations in New York on 10 March, Sir Jeremy Greenstock said that he had drawn the attention of the Security Council to Mr Straw's statement and the reference to work on a list of defined tests.[26] That had "caused a fair bit of interest".

87. Sir Jeremy also reported that, in response to questions, the points made by Dr Blix included:

- 40 interviews had been requested and 15 had been conducted "to UNMOVIC's modalities".
- The RPV UNMOVIC had discovered was important and should have been declared. UNMOVIC was examining whether it was proscribed.
- 52 Al Samoud 2 missiles had been destroyed.
- It was difficult for him to assess the regional threat posed by WMD. There were no confirmed cases of its existence and UNMOVIC had never maintained Iraq had them. But the clusters document recorded Iraqi deceit; repeated Full, Final and Complete Disclosures (FFCDs); hide and seek and cheating in the past. There were a lot of accounting problems.
- UNMOVIC was not expressing any low regard for intelligence agencies but no WMD had been found as a result of tips on location. Part of the reason might be that intelligence was gathered at levels which did not deal with actual storage.
- Experience showed that it was possible that Iraq could have mobile biological facilities.

88. Mr Blair failed to secure unqualified support from President Lagos for his approach.

89. Mr Blair spoke twice to President Lagos on 10 March in an attempt to find a path both President Lagos and President Fox could support.

90. In the first telephone call, before a conversation with Dr Blix, Mr Blair reported Dr Blix's response to Sir Jeremy Greenstock on the draft tests.[27]

91. In the second conversation, Mr Blair reported progress on the three areas President Lagos had raised:

- Sir Jeremy Greenstock had worked up an agreed text with UNMOVIC identifying a set of concrete tests on which to judge Iraqi compliance.
- Mr Blair thought it "would be possible to find different wording" on the ultimatum to Iraq.

[27] Letter Rycroft to Owen, 10 March 2003, 'Iraq: Chile, 10 March'.

- Timing “would be difficult, but he would try to get some flexibility” if the first two issues “fell into place”.[28]

92. If Mr Blair knew he had Chilean and Mexican support, the UK would share the ideas with France and Russia.

93. President Lagos’ response was positive although he did not agree to support the resolution. Mr Blair offered to visit Chile if that would be helpful.

94. Mr Campbell wrote that President Lagos had said he was “eighty per cent there but worried about France and Russia”.[29]

95. By 10 March, President Bush’s position was hardening. He was very reluctant to delay action.

96. Reporting a conversation at 9.30pm on 10 March, Mr Straw told Sir David Manning that Mr Colin Powell, the US Secretary of State, thought that there were seven solid votes, and uncertainty about Mexico, Chile and Pakistan.[30] If there were fewer than nine, the second resolution should not be put to the vote.

97. Mr Straw had responded that “he was increasingly coming to the view that we should not push the matter to a vote if we were going to be vetoed”; but that had not yet been agreed by Mr Blair.

98. When Mr Blair spoke to President Bush, they discussed the “seven solid votes” for the resolution.[31] Mr Blair planned to speak to President Musharraf the following day. Mr Blair outlined the tests and his efforts to secure support from Chile and Mexico. They would not support a Spanish proposal simply to affirm resolution 1441.

99. In his account of the conversation, Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair had done most of the talking.[32] President Bush thought that there were “seven votes solid ‘locked up’, but Pakistan and the Latins were difficult”; and that President Chirac was “trying to get us to the stage where we would not put [the resolution] to a vote because we would be so worried about losing”. Mr Campbell added that he “could sense in his voice and the manner of the discussion that [President] Bush was less emollient than yesterday”.

100. In answer to a question from President Bush about the timeframe for his proposal, Mr Blair had “said they [Chile and Mexico] would want to kick us back a few days as a way of showing they got something out of this”. Mr Blair had argued that if Chile and Mexico could be shifted, that would "change the weather". If France and Russia then vetoed the resolution but the "numbers were right on the UN", Mr Blair thought that he would "have a fighting chance of getting it through the Commons". Subsequently, Mr Blair had suggested that a change in Chile and Mexico's position might be used to influence Mr Vladimir Putin, the Russian President.

101. President Bush was "worried about rolling in more time" but Mr Blair had "held his ground", arguing that Chile and Mexico would "need to be able to point to something that they won last minute that explains why they finally supported us". President Bush "said 'Let me be frank. The second resolution is for the benefit of Great Britain. We would want it so we can go ahead together.'" President Bush's position was that the US and the UK "must not retreat from 1441 and we cannot keep giving them more time"; it was "time to do this" and there should be "no more deals".

102. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair concluded the conversation by saying "he was sure we were doing the right thing and we had to see it through, but it was going to be tough". President Bush had replied: "Hang on in there friend."

103. Mr Campbell wrote that he "felt a bit sick" about "the extent to which our problems were US-created, and our politics now so dominated by their approach".

104. Sir David Manning sent the UK's proposals for a revised deadline and a side statement identifying six tests on which Saddam Hussein's intentions would be judged to Dr Rice and to President Lagos.

105. Reflecting some of the comments from Dr Blix and Mr Dowse, Sir David Manning wrote to Dr Rice setting out six proposed tests, with additional details in a "draft side statement", which Mr Blair had "briefly described" to President Bush:

- a public statement in Arabic by Saddam Hussein announcing that:
  - Iraq had in the past sought to conceal its WMD and other proscribed activities but had taken a strategic decision not to produce or retain them;
  - Iraq would immediately yield all prohibited and proscribed material to the weapons inspectors;
  - Iraq would co-operate fully with UNMOVIC and the IAEA in immediately addressing and resolving all outstanding questions; and
  - all government personnel and citizens would cease any proscribed activity and provide items, documentation and information to the inspectors;
- undertakings to:
  - make at least 30 Iraqi scientists available for interview outside Iraq;
  - surrender all remaining anthrax and anthrax production capability (including growth media) and provide credible evidence to account for outstanding questions on production and destruction;
  - surrender all mobile bio-production laboratories for destruction;

- destroy all Al Samoud 2 missiles and components; and
- account for the purpose of all UAV and RPV programmes.[33]

106. The draft side statement was also sent to President Lagos.

107. Sir David informed Dr Rice that Mr Blair was willing to consider a redraft of operative paragraph (OP) 3 of the draft resolution (tabled by the UK, US and Spain on 7 March), which "might read":

> "decides that Iraq will have failed to take the final opportunity unless by X date it shows that it has demonstrated that it is co-operating fully, unconditionally and immediately with its disarmament obligations under UNSCR 1441."

108. The decision on Iraq's co-operation would be taken on the basis of Iraq's response to the six tests.

109. Mr Blair wrote in his memoir that President Bush and his military were concerned about delay:

> "It [the proposal for tests/more time] was indeed a hard sell to George. His system was completely against it. His military were, not unreasonably, fearing that delay gave the enemy time – and time could mean a tougher struggle and more lives lost. This was also troubling my military. We had all sorts of contingency plans in place for what Saddam might do. He might set the oilfields on fire, release chemical, or worse, biological material, or attack Israel. His past record gave us no confidence in his trustworthiness or his humanity. There was both UK and US intelligence warning us of the risk.
> "Nonetheless I thought it was worth a try …
> "I set out my case for delay in a Note to George. We then had a call. It was tricky but I laid it on the line and reluctantly he agreed. We got the document prepared with the Blix people. It had five crucial tests in it. It would, especially on the interview, have flushed out the regime thoroughly on what they were hiding and on whether they had any good faith.
> "Chile and Mexico were prepared to go along, but only up to a point. Ricardo made it clear that if there was heavy opposition from France, it would be tough for them to participate in what would then be a token vote, incapable of being passed because of a veto – and what's more, a veto not by Russia, but by France.
> "Unfortunately, the French position had, if anything, got harder not softer. They were starting to say they would not support military action in any circumstances, irrespective of what the inspectors found …"[34]

110. In a press conference on 10 March, Mr Annan reiterated the Security Council's determination to disarm Iraq, but said that every avenue for a peaceful resolution of the crisis had to be exhausted before force should be used.

111. Mr Annan also warned that if the Security Council failed to agree on a common position, and action was taken without the authority of the Council, the legitimacy and support for any such action would be seriously impaired.

112. During a press conference in The Hague on 10 March, Mr Annan made a short statement on the position on Iraq.[35]

113. Mr Annan warned that the "atmosphere of crisis and great anxiety" was "affecting the whole world", and that:

> "The question of Iraq's disarmament has brought the international community to a dangerous point of division and discord …
> "… the threat of weapons of mass destruction. It is an issue of the utmost gravity – by no means confined to Iraq. The whole international community needs to act together to curb the proliferation of these terrible weapons, wherever it is happening.
> "The determination of the Security Council to disarm Iraq of such weapons is the most urgent issue – because Iraq has actually used such weapons in the past, and because it has twice committed aggression against its neighbours … On this critical question, there are no divisions, no grounds for doubt, dispute or delay.
> "… people want to see this crisis resolved peacefully. There is widespread concern about the long term consequences of war in Iraq for the fight against terrorism; for the Middle East Peace Process [MEPP]; and for the world's ability to address common concerns in the future if deep divisions are sowed today between nations and between people of different religions.
> "Indeed, one must have no illusions about what war means. In certain circumstances the use of force may be necessary to secure a lasting peace. But the reality is that it would cause great human suffering, whether it is long or short; that it may lead to regional instability and economic crises; and it can … lead to unintended consequences producing new threats and new dangers.
> "War must always be a last resort – arrived at only if and when every reasonable avenue of achieving Iraq's disarmament by peaceful means has been exhausted. The United Nations … has a duty to search till the very end for the peaceful resolution of conflicts."

114. Mr Annan added:

> "The members of the Security Council now face a great choice. If they fail to agree on a common position, and action is taken without the authority of the Security Council, the legitimacy and support for any such action will be seriously impaired. If, on the other hand, they can … address this threat in a united manner and ensure compliance with their previous resolutions, then the Security Council's authority will be enhanced, and the world will be a safer place.
> "… Iraq does not exist in a vacuum. What happens there will have profound implications … for other issues of great importance … The broader the consensus on Iraq, the better the chance that we can come together again and deal effectively with other burning conflicts, starting with the one between Israelis and Palestinians. Only a just resolution of that conflict can bring peace and stability in the region.
> "… the success or failure of the international community in dealing with Iraq will crucially affect its ability to deal with … conflicts …"

115. Mr Annan concluded:

> "However this conflict is resolved, the United Nations will remain as important as it is today.
> "We have seen in recent months what an immense significance States and people around the world attach to the legitimacy provided by the … Security Council, and the United Nations, as the common framework for securing the peace. As they approach their grave decision, I must solemnly urge all members of the … Council to keep this in mind, and to be worthy of the trust in them that the world's peoples have shown."

116. Asked whether an attack on Iraq without a second resolution would be a breach of the UN Charter, Mr Annan responded:

> "… the Charter is very clear on circumstances under which force can be used. I think the discussion … is to ensure that the … Council, which is the master of its own deliberations, is able to pronounce itself on what happens. If the US and others were to go outside the Council and take military action it would not be in conformity with the Charter."

President Chirac's interview, 10 March 2003

117. Sir John Holmes, the British Ambassador to France, reported on 10 March that, after the debate in the Security Council on 7 March, France believed it had the momentum.[36] The press and public were firmly behind President Chirac. France was [36] Telegram 123 Paris to FCO London, 10 March 2003, 'Iraq: French Reaction to 7 March Debate'.

"impervious" to the UK's arguments, although that "could still change if it looks as if we might secure the nine votes and avoid Russian and Chinese vetoes".

118. Sir John reported that France's strategy remained:

> "(a) to persuade us not to go for a vote, (b) if this did not work, to stop us from securing nine votes, and (c) if there are nine votes, to ensure that they have Russian and Chinese company in vetoing."

119. France was "on the diplomatic offensive". Mr Dominique de Villepin, the French Foreign Minister, was visiting Angola, Cameroon and Guinea and President Chirac was "canvassing support" for a Security Council meeting at Head of State level for a vote on Iraq.

120. Sir John commented:

> "Although the French have still so far steered clear of saying in so many words that they will veto, it is hard to interpret their comments and approach in any other way … It is getting increasingly difficult for the French to backtrack now, having built up so many expectations domestically and internationally. Whilst we are both fully engaged in our respective lobbying campaigns there is little we can say to them likely to have much impact …
> "I doubt that benchmarks and a little more time will do the trick … That said, the dynamics may yet change this week … In any case, going to a vote without at least some Prime Ministerial contact with Chirac would … be odd. If it looks as though we have the nine votes and might persuade Russia and China not to vote, a serious phone call would be well worth a try – if only to ease the way for co-operation in the aftermath."

121. In a television interview on the evening of 10 March, President Chirac made clear that France did not consider that the UN inspections had reached a "dead end" and warned of the adverse consequences of unilateral US military action.

122. Addressing the "most probable" scenario that evening, President Chirac said that the revised resolution tabled by the UK, US and Spain on 7 March would not secure the support of nine members of the Council. If, however, there was a majority, France would "vote no".

123. Asked about his position, President Chirac replied that "regardless of the circumstances", France would vote "no" because "this evening" there were no grounds for waging war to disarm Iraq.

124. President Chirac also stated that if the inspectors reported that they were not in a position to guarantee Iraq's disarmament, war would become inevitable.

125. In a television interview on the evening of 10 March, President Chirac argued that a country with Iraq's past and political structure was always dangerous, but it was “genuinely dangerous only if it has the capabilities to commit aggression, if it has the capabilities to attack”.[37] The “problem was to make sure it no longer had those capabilities or … that those capabilities could be controlled and destroyed”. The inspections regime between 1991 and 1998 had destroyed more weapons than the Gulf Conflict in 1991, and “resulted in the complete, almost complete eradication in all likelihood … of Iraq’s nuclear programmes”. Iraq’s (Al Samoud 2) missiles with a longer than permitted range were “being destroyed”.

126. President Chirac acknowledged that there were “probably other weapons” but Dr Blix had told the Security Council that if Iraq stepped up co-operation, which was “never sufficient but which has improved”, weapons of mass destruction could be eliminated. It was for the inspectors to advise whether they could complete their task. If they reported that they were not in a position to guarantee Iraq’s disarmament, it would be:

> “… for the Security Council alone to decide the right thing to do. But in that case … regrettably, the war would become inevitable. It isn’t today.”

127. President Chirac stated that other regimes, such as North Korea, had nuclear weapons which were “not hypothetical”, but definitely existed.

128. President Chirac stated that the international community had unanimously chosen the path of disarming Iraq; it had not decided the objective was to change the Iraqi regime; and that:

> “Today nothing tells us that this path is a dead end and, consequently, it must be pursued since war is always a final resort, always an acknowledgement of failure, always the worse solution … And we don’t consider we are at that point. That is why we are refusing to embark on a path automatically leading to war so long as the inspectors haven’t told us: ‘we can’t do any more’ … they are telling us the opposite.”

129. President Chirac argued that the “new resolution setting an ultimatum” represented a move from a course of action involving the pursuit of inspections in order to disarm Iraq to “a different one consisting of saying: ‘in so many days, we go to war’”. France would not accept “that solution”.

130. In response to a series of questions, President Chirac stated:

- “So the first scenario which is today, this evening, the most probable, is that this resolution won’t get a majority of nine members …”
- “There will be nations who will vote ‘no’, including France … But … there won’t be a majority. So there won’t be a veto problem.”

- "… the second scenario … the views of a number of people change … there may indeed be a majority … in favour of the new resolution … If that happens, France will vote 'no' … when one of the five Permanent Members … votes 'no', and even if there is a majority in favour … the resolution isn't adopted. That's what's called exercising a veto."

131. Asked: "And, this evening, this is your position in principle?", President Chirac responded:

> "My position is that, regardless of the circumstances, France will vote 'no' because she considers this evening that there are no grounds for waging war in order to achieve the goal we have set ourselves, ie to disarm Iraq."

132. Asked whether France would use its veto regardless of the position of China and Russia, President Chirac replied that if there was a resolution authorising war, they would adopt the same attitude as France.

133. President Chirac stated that it was possible to have a difference of view with the US. Principles and values should not be sacrificed because there was a crisis. France had warned the US that it could not:

> "… be a standard bearer for democracy and dialogue and not use every possible method to avoid a war … [I]f the international community didn't give its approval, a dangerous precedent would be set if the United States bypassed the UN."

134. President Chirac added that he had told President Bush that the US had "already won". It was "highly probable" that "Iraq wouldn't have provided the more active co-operation the inspectors demanded", if the US and the UK had not deployed such significant forces.

135. President Chirac made clear that although France disagreed with military action, it would remain an ally of the US. It would not stop US overflights. But he warned that the consequences of war would be unpredictable. Reconstruction would be required which could only be done through the UN. The responsibility of restoring a viable situation in Iraq and the region could not be taken on by one country alone. France would have a part to play.

136. In response to a question about whether war would lead to a resurgence of terrorism and clashes between the different communities in France, President Chirac replied:

> "It's certain that, if there's war, the first victors will probably be those seeking confrontation, the clash of civilisations, cultures and religions. In my opinion, a war of this nature can lead only to increased terrorism."

137. President Chirac stated:

> "… it seems to me that war is something which will break up the world coalition against terrorism … we mustn't forget that a very great majority of the world's countries and peoples are against this war … France isn't isolated … So if there is a war there is indeed a risk of a new upsurge in terrorism."

138. The headline in Le Monde the following day was "Quelles que soient les circonstances, la France votera non".[38]

139. Commenting on the interview the following day, Sir John Holmes wrote that, "Even if only in response to a question", President Chirac had gone "out of his way to make his position categoric".[39] He added:

> "The French calculation is presumably that this makes it as hard as possible for the Russians and Chinese not to follow, and as easy as possible for the swing six to abstain, as an obvious middle course between the two opposing blocs. The only glimmer of encouragement that I can see for us is that he may have played this card too soon, apparently ruling out any flexibility even if the text of a resolution is amended … We may be able to use this against the French in arguing with others. I suppose it is possible in theory that … Chirac could change to an abstention. But this is clutching at straws, such is the limb he has deliberately put himself on."

140. Sir John Holmes told the Inquiry that President Chirac had prepared his remarks and had decided at that stage that he was "fully in opposition to … the invasion of Iraq".[40]

141. Sir John thought President Chirac had been saying: "The text, as we have it at this moment, is not one we can support and we will vote against it."[41]

142. Sir John stated, "There was genuine ambiguity" about what President Chirac had meant: "There was scope for interpretation."[42]

143. Sir Jeremy Greenstock also told the Inquiry:

> "The fact was that, although the words didn't surprise us, the fact that Chirac said it at that time, in that way, was politically aggressive by the French. That was the point."[43]

Events of 11 March 2003

144. In a press conference, Mr Blair stated that he hoped that France and Russia would not talk about vetoes but try to find common ground.

145. In a press conference following a meeting with Mr José Manuel Durao Barroso, the Portuguese Prime Minister, Mr Blair set out that there had been an attempt to unify people around a common position based on resolution 1441 to try to disarm Iraq peacefully, but if that became impossible, the international community had to be "prepared to take action".[44] He also said that divisions between Europe and the US would be "very damaging" and that he was:

> "… prepared to try and find common ground, but we need others to be equally willing to do so."

146. In response to a question about what more could be given to find common ground with France and Russia, Mr Blair replied:

> "… if France or any other country is simply going to say we will veto, no matter what, that is obviously a very difficult position … [E]verybody, including France and Russia, accepts there is not full co-operation … So I hope we won't talk about vetoes in any set of circumstances or in all sets of circumstances, but rather we will try and find the common ground that allows us a way through here … And what we are trying to do in the Security Council now is to offer very, very clear ideas as to what Iraq has to do in order to demonstrate it is prepared to disarm voluntarily.
> "But let us not be under any illusion, there is no way that Iraq will make any concession or co-operate in any way without the threat of force being there … [M]y concern is that if countries talk about using a veto in all sets of circumstances, the message that sends to Saddam is you are off the hook …"

MR STRAW'S MINUTE TO MR BLAIR

147. Mr Straw advised Mr Blair that the UK and the US should not push the second resolution to a vote if they could not secure nine votes and be certain of avoiding any vetoes.

148. Mr Straw suggested that the UK should adopt a strategy based on the argument that Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity offered by resolution 1441, and that the last three meetings of the Security Council "more than fulfil the requirement" for Security Council consideration of reports of non-compliance.

149. Mr Straw also identified the need for a "Plan B" in the event that the Government failed to secure a majority in the Parliamentary Labour Party for military action.

[44] The National Archives, 11 March 2003, Press Conference: PM Blair and Portuguese PM Barroso.

150. Mr Straw wrote to Mr Blair on 11 March setting out his conclusion that:

> "If we cannot gain nine votes and be sure of no veto, we should not push our second resolution to a vote. The political and diplomatic consequences for the UK would be significantly worse to have our … resolution defeated (even by just a French veto alone) than if we camp on 1441. Kofi Annan's comments last evening have strengthened my already strong view on this. Getting Parliamentary approval for UK military action will be difficult if there is no second resolution: but in my view marginally easier by the strategy I propose.
> "We also need to start working up a Plan B for our armed forces if we cannot be sure of Commons' approval for their inclusion in the initial invasion of Iraq."[45]

151. Mr Straw set out his reasoning in some detail, making clear that it was predicated on a veto only by France. That was "in practice less likely than two or even three vetoes". The points made included:

- The "upsides of defying a veto" had been "well aired", including that it would "show at least we had the 'moral majority' with us".
- In public comments, he and Mr Blair had kept their "options open on what we should do in the event that the resolution does not carry within the terms of the [UN] Charter". That had "been the correct thing to do". "In private" they had "speculated on what to do if we are likely to get nine votes, but be vetoed" by one or more of the five Permanent Members (P5).
- Although in earlier discussion he had "warmed to the idea" that it was worth pushing the issue to a vote "if we had nine votes and faced only a French veto"; the more he "thought about this, the worse an idea it becomes".
- The intensive debate over Iraq in the past five months had shown "how much faith" people had in the UN as an institution; and that "far from having the 'moral majority' with us … we will lose the moral high ground if we are seen to defy the very rules and Charter of the UN on which we have lectured others and from which the UK has disproportionately benefitted".
- The "best, least risky way to gain a moral majority" was "by the 'Kosovo route' – essentially what I am recommending. The key to our moral legitimacy then was the matter never went to a vote – but everyone knew the reason for this was that Russia would have vetoed. (Then, we had no resolution to fall back on, just customary international law on humanitarianism; here we can fall back on 1441.)"
- The veto had been included in the UN Charter "for a purpose – to achieve a consensus". The UK could not "sustain an argument (politically, leave aside legally) that a distinction can be made between a 'reasonable' and an 'unreasonable' veto". That was "a completely subjective matter".

[45] Minute Straw to Prime Minister, 11 March 2003, 'Iraq: What if We Cannot Win the Second Resolution?'

- The "three recent meetings of the Council more than fulfil the requirement for immediate consideration of reports of non-compliance. So we can say convincingly that the process set out in 1441 is complete. If we push a second resolution to a veto, then the last word on the Security Council record is a formal rejection of a proposal that Iraq has failed to take its final opportunity."

152. Mr Straw advised that it would be "more compelling in Parliament and with public opinion to take our stand on the basis of [resolution] 1441, and the overwhelming evidence that Iraq has not used the four months since then to co-operate 'immediately, unconditionally and actively'". The UNMOVIC "clusters" document would be "a material help in making that case".

153. Mr Straw advised Mr Blair that he interpreted Mr Annan's "important" statement on 10 March:

> "… essentially as a gypsies' warning not to try and then fail with a second resolution. If the last current act of the Security Council on Iraq is 1441, we can genuinely claim that we have met Kofi's call for unity and for acting within (our interpretation of) the authority of the Security Council."

154. There was no reference in Mr Straw's minute to President Chirac's remarks the previous evening.

155. Mr Straw advised Mr Blair that it would not be possible to decide what the Parliamentary Labour Party and the House of Commons would agree until deliberations in the Security Council had concluded. If a second resolution was agreed, it would be "fine", but that was "unlikely". He added:

> "I sensed yesterday that sentiment might be shifting our way; but we would need to be very clear of the result before putting down a resolution approving military action. We could not possibly countenance the risk of a defeat …
> "But it need not be a disaster for you, the Government, and even more important for our troops, if we cannot take an active part in the initial invasion, provided we get on the front foot with our strategy.
> "I am aware of all the difficulties of the UK standing aside from invasion operations, not least given the level of integration of our forces with those of the US. But I understand that the US could if necessary adjust their plan rapidly to cope without us … [W]e could nevertheless offer them a major UK contribution to the overall campaign. In addition to staunch political support, this would include:
> - intelligence co-operation;
> - use of Diego Garcia, Fairford and Cyprus, subject to the usual consultation on targeting; and

- as soon as combat operations are over, full UK participation in the military and civilian tasks, including taking responsibility for a sector and for humanitarian and reconstruction work. We could also take the lead in the UN on securing the … resolution to authorise the reconstruction effort and the UN role in it which the US now agree is necessary."

156. Mr Straw concluded:

> "We will obviously need to discuss all this, but I thought it best to put it in your mind as event[s] could move fast. And what I propose is a great deal better than the alternatives. When Bush graciously accepted your offer to be with him all the way, he wanted you alive not dead!"

157. Mr Straw's minute was not sent to Lord Goldsmith or to Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary.

158. Mr Straw's Private Office replied separately on 11 March to a request from Sir David Manning for advice on the implications of the argument that a French veto would be unreasonable.[46]

159. The FCO advised that there was "no recognised concept of an 'unreasonable veto'"; and warned that: "In describing a French veto as 'unreasonable' we would therefore be inviting others to describe any future vetoes as 'unreasonable' too." That could have implications in other areas "such as the Middle East". In addition, "describing the veto as unreasonable would make no difference to the legal position". There was "no implied condition" in the UN Charter that a veto was valid "only" if it was reasonable. There was "already pressure at the UN to abolish veto rights". And pressure could be expected to increase "if the argument that certain vetoes were 'unreasonable' – and could therefore be ignored – gained ground".

160. The UK was "on record as saying that the veto should only be used with restraint and in a manner consistent with the principles of the Charter".

MINISTERIAL MEETING TO DISCUSS LEGAL ISSUES AND THE MILITARY PLAN

161. Ministers discussed legal issues, including holding the response to a US request for the use of UK bases for a few days, on 11 March.

162. They also discussed the viability of the military plan.

163. Mr Blair held a meeting to discuss the military plan and legal issues with Mr John Prescott (Deputy Prime Minister), Mr Hoon, Lord Goldsmith and Admiral Sir Michael Boyce (Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS)).[47] Mr Straw attended part of the meeting.

Sir Andrew Turnbull (Cabinet Secretary), Mr Powell, Mr Campbell, Baroness Morgan (Mr Blair's Director of Political and Government Relations), Sir David Manning and Mr Rycroft were also present.

164. Mr Blair had already had a bilateral discussion with Lord Goldsmith on 11 March on the legal basis for the use of military force early. That is addressed in Section 5.

165. Mr Straw's Private Office wrote to No.10 on 11 March, reporting that the US was pressing for a response "as soon as possible" to the letter delivered by the US Ambassador to London to Mr Straw on 5 March.[48] That had formally requested the British Government's agreement to the use of RAF Fairford, Diego Garcia and, possibly, other British bases for military operations against Iraq.

166. The FCO advised that "under international law, the UK would be responsible for any US action in breach of international law in which the UK knowingly assisted". The draft response was "premised on a decision that UNSCR [UN Security Council resolution] 1441 and other relevant resolutions" provided "the authority for action".

167. A minute from Mr Desmond Bowen, the Deputy Head of OD Sec, advised Sir David Manning that the request was to be discussed at Mr Blair's meeting with Lord Goldsmith, Mr Straw and Mr Hoon on 11 March.[49] He understood that Mr Straw and Mr Hoon had copies of Lord Goldsmith's advice of 7 March.

168. The briefing note for Mr Blair described confirmation of the viability of the overall military plan as the "main purpose of the meeting".[50]

169. The record of the meeting on 11 March stated that Mr Blair had started by addressing the legal base for military action.[51] He stated that Lord Goldsmith's "advice made it clear that a reasonable case could be made" that resolution 1441 was "capable of reviving" the authorisation of resolution 678, "although of course a second resolution would be preferable".

170. Other points recorded by Mr Rycroft included:

- Adm Boyce said he "would need to put a short paragraph [on the legal basis] in his directive to members of the Armed Forces".
- That "should be cleared with the Attorney General".
- The UK would send the US a positive reply on its request to use Diego Garcia and RAF Fairford "in a day or two, with the usual conditions attached".
- Mr Hoon and Adm Boyce advised that "once we had given our approval, the US might give very little notice before the start of the campaign".

[51] Letter Rycroft to McDonald, 11 March 2003, 'Iraq: Legal and Military Aspects'.

- Sir Andrew Turnbull asked whether a legal basis for military action was required for civil servants, as well as for members of the Armed Forces.
- Mr Hoon asked whether the Attorney General's legal advice was ever disclosed.
- Mr Blair asked for a quick study into the precedents for that.
- Adm Boyce told the meeting that he was "confident that the battle plan would work".
- Mr Blair stated that "we must concentrate on averting unintended consequences of military action. On targeting, we must minimise the risks to civilians."

171. In his diaries, Mr Campbell wrote that:

- Mr Hoon had "said he would be happier with a clearer green light from the AG [Attorney General]".
- Mr Blair had been "really irritated" when Sir Andrew Turnbull had "said he would need something to put round the Civil Service that what they were engaged in was legal". Mr Blair was "clear we would do nothing that wasn't legal".
- Lord Goldsmith had provided "a version of the arguments he had put to TB, on the one hand, on the other, reasonable case".
- Mr Hoon had advised that the response to the "US request for the use of Diego Garcia and [RAF] Fairford" should be that it was "not … automatic but had to go round the system". Mr Blair had said he "did not want to send a signal that we would not do it".
- Mr Hoon and Mr Straw were telling Mr Blair that the US could act as early as that weekend, and "some of our forces would have to be in before".[52]

172. Following the meeting, Mr Peter Watkins, Mr Hoon's Principal Private Secretary, provided an outline of the military plan for Iraq and the need for decisions on the development of the UK's role to Sir David Manning.[53] That is addressed in Section 6.2.

173. Ms Short recorded that she had spoken to Mr Blair on the evening of 11 March about the fact that DFID had not been invited to attend the meeting "on the legality of military action", which she understood was about "the use of UK bases by the US in war, but the fundamental question on whether there was legal authority for military action was presumably the same".[54] Mr Blair had said she would "see all" and that it had been decided to defer the decision on basing. He was: "Hopeful on a second resolution." Lord Goldsmith had "said 1441 enough. A bit later, 1441 enough if detail available to show SH [Saddam Hussein] had not complied."

Secretary Rumsfeld's remarks, 11 March 2003

In a telephone call to Mr Donald Rumsfeld, the US Secretary of Defense, on 11 March about the timing of military action, Mr Hoon emphasised the importance of a few extra days to win over Chile and Mexico and the domestic politics in the UK.[55]

The MOD reported that Secretary Rumsfeld had said Gen Franks was looking at how to "work around" a position in which the UK could not participate in military action which assumed that the UK would be available for post-conflict activities. Mr Hoon had responded that the UK would not want to be in that position and reiterated the case for waiting a few more days.

In a subsequent press briefing, Secretary Rumsfeld said that it was unclear what the UK role would be in the event that a decision was made to use force:

> "… until we know what the resolution is, we won't know the answer to what their role will be …"[56]

Secretary Rumsfeld subsequently clarified his comments, saying he had "no doubt of the full support of the United Kingdom for the international community's efforts to disarm Iraq".[57] Obtaining a second resolution was important to the UK, and the US was "working to achieve that". He added:

> "In the event that a decision to use force is made, we have every reason to believe that there will be a significant military contribution from the United Kingdom."

In his memoir Mr Blair wrote that Secretary Rumsfeld had been "trying to be helpful", but it had not helped and "by then the military were absolutely determined, rightly, that they would be part of the action from the outset, and took amiss any sense that we might be in the second rank".[58]

In the entry for 11 March in the edition of his diaries published in 2012, Mr Campbell wrote that the incident was "indicative of the difficulties" of working with the US.[59] Secretary Rumsfeld's clarification was the result of a further telephone call from Mr Hoon "making it clear that we were with them".

TELEPHONE DIPLOMACY, 11 MARCH 2003

174. Mr Blair and Mr Straw met early on 11 March to take stock and agree a plan to make telephone calls lobbying contacts for support for the UK approach.[60]

175. President Putin told Mr Blair that there were grounds for believing that Saddam Hussein understood the need for disarmament and had opted for maximum co-operation with the inspectors. Russia could not accept a proposition giving a green light to war.

176. President Putin also warned of the risks of military action.

177. Following Mr Blair's discussion with President Putin on 7 March (see Section 3.7), Sir Roderic Lyne, British Ambassador to Russia, had advised Mr Ricketts on 10 March that he had been considering whether there was "anything to be done at the 11th hour to turn the Russians on our current text".[61] He had concluded that Russia would "only move if":

- the French moved;
- and/or major amendments were made to the resolution;
- or if the Americans had brokered a bilateral deal so heavily weighted towards Russian interests that it outweighed the downside of splitting from the French position."

178. Sir Roderic added that "the Americans have now left it too late". President Putin did not "want a breach with the Americans, for well known reasons; and this explains the repeated Russian encouragement … to just go ahead and do it in a way which does not involve Russia in approving war".

179. Stating that he was "deliberately over-simplifying", Sir Roderic advised that President Putin was not now going to "put himself out" or "take risks", because:

- The Americans had "not picked up Russian hints from mid-2001 onwards that there is a price tag attached".
- The Americans "… did not cut the Russians in on the discussion. They proclaimed the 'axis of evil', which worries the Russians mightily; they deployed their forces; they then demanded acceptance of their resolution within a tight time-frame and without a smoking gun or trigger. If the Russians buy into this, what else are they buying into? War on N. Korea or Iran? (It's not impossible that the Russians could be brought to subscribe to a tougher approach to proliferation, but they would need to be carried along stage by stage.) So the Russians are very susceptible to the French line of argument that the Americans are trying to drag us down a very dangerous road … and the time to make a stand is now."
- Russia had "not been given its due reward for supporting the Americans on various issues, or for not opposing them on others".
- Russia wanted freedom to act on Chechnya.
- Russian domestic opinion thought France and Germany were right to stand firm against the US.

180. In Sir Roderic's view, the "only way we are now likely to get them [the Russians] on board would be to drop the authorisation for war". The Russians were "convinced that the Americans are going to attack, come what may".

181. Sir David Manning put the email to Mr Blair on 11 March, commenting: "Good Rod Lyne analysis on Putin/Iraq."[62]

182. Mr Blair spoke to President Putin who was ready to look for a way forward but made it clear that Russia could not accept any proposition which looked like a "green light for war".[63]

183. President Putin told Mr Blair that, following the visit to Baghdad by the Speaker of the Russian Parliament, there were grounds to believe that Saddam Hussein understood the necessity for disarmament, and had opted for the maximum co-operation with the UN inspectors.

184. President Putin also said that the Iraqis had been robust and confident and were prepared to resist the Coalition; and that an initial military action might be over quickly but Iraq was a big country and guerrilla warfare could continue for some time.

185. Mr José Maria Aznar, the Spanish Prime Minister, told Mr Blair that he would not favour putting the resolution to a vote without a guarantee of success.

186. In a conversation with Mr Aznar, Mr Blair argued that the Spanish proposal for a simple resolution needed to be combined with tests for Saddam Hussein.[64]

187. Mr Aznar identified a number of concerns about the risks with the approach, but he agreed to try. He was also reported to have said that without a guaranteed win, he would not favour putting the resolution to a vote.

188. Mr Blair also spoke to:

- President Musharraf,[65]
- Mr Silvio Berlusconi, the Italian Prime Minister,[66] and
- Mr Göran Persson, the Swedish Prime Minister,[67]

to seek support for his approach.

189. Mr Blair warned Mr Annan that the US timeframe was "days not weeks" and it was in "no mood to negotiate further".

190. Mr Blair sought Mr Annan's support for the proposals he was discussing with Chile, and through them Mexico, to construct "clear and specific tests that would allow us to assess whether Saddam was going to come fully into compliance and had genuinely changed his mind".[68]

191. Mr Blair stated that the tests would be tough but achievable and the timeframe could be short: "The US were only prepared to accept a timeframe of days not weeks. If Saddam did demonstrate his seriousness by complying with the tests then a full work programme would ensue."

192. Mr Blair added that President Chirac's comments "that he would veto a second resolution in any circumstances would cause a real difficulty if they were proved true. If the UN could not reach an agreement and military action took place the UN would be seriously weakened." It would be hard to achieve a compromise and the US "were in no mood to negotiate further".

193. Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that, if Iraq delivered, the UK and US "might have to take 'yes' for an answer", and that he was reviewing whether to push for a vote if it would be unsuccessful.

194. Secretary Powell expressed concern about the perceived shift in the UK's position given Mr Blair's assurances that the UK would proceed if there were nine votes for a resolution but a French veto.

195. In the first of six conversations with Secretary Powell on 11 March, Mr Straw said that he had sent him the latest version of the UK's six tests, and that Mr Blair thought there was a chance it would secure votes.[69] He and Mr Blair would be making a series of phone calls making the point that: "We've moved twice and won't move again."

196. Secretary Powell was reported to have said that Ms Ana Palacio, the Spanish Foreign Minister, "was concerned that the Iraqis could do something with the tests: they could, for example, produce 30 scientists". Mr Straw responded that if Iraq delivered "we might have to take 'yes' for an answer". Secretary Powell said that "was easier for … [Mr Straw] to say than for him to accept".

197. Mr Straw said Mr Blair's plan was to get President Lagos "in the bag then get him to sell the latest draft to Fox".

198. Raising the question of pushing for a vote "if we knew that would not get a result", Mr Straw warned Secretary Powell that he was "increasingly of the view that … would not be in the interests of international solidarity and respect for the UN".

[69] Letter McDonald to Manning, 11 March 2003, 'Foreign Secretary's Conversation with US Secretary of State, 11 March'.

199. Secretary Powell responded that that would be "a brand new element": Mr Blair had "always said that if we had nine votes but a French veto he could work with it".

200. Mr Straw reminded Secretary Powell of their conversation the previous day, adding that "he was not at all sure that here would be only one veto: two vetoes would be heavy; it was better not to vote". Mr Blair had not yet made up his mind, but his "concern was which course of action would be easier to get through the House of Commons: no resolution because of a veto, or no resolution because of an expected veto".

201. President Lagos told Mr Blair he needed more time to think about the proposals.

202. In the first of three conversations on 11 March, President Lagos confirmed that Mr Blair's proposed approach could work but he wanted more time and was still thinking about the precise terms.[70] Mr Blair emphasised US concerns about delay and the risk of an unworkable compromise. They agreed to talk again later that day.

203. Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that Mr Blair had made clear that the proposal was the UK's "bottom line", and there was little flexibility in timing.

204. Ms Palacio expressed scepticism about any French suggestion that with more time it could be supportive.

205. In a conference call with Secretary Powell and Ms Palacio, Mr Straw reported that Mr Blair thought President Lagos had "bought the language on tests" in the proposed "Side statement", but "might try to share the language with President Chirac".[71] Mr Blair had made clear that the proposal "was our bottom line and also that there was no flexibility on timing of the deadline (beyond 24 hours or so)". Neither Mr Blair nor Mr Straw expected any Chilean approach to France "to bring acceptable results". Secretary Powell and Ms Palacio had agreed.

206. Ms Palacio was reported to have said that France had been working on the assumption that nine votes would not be achieved. If that looked closer, the French would "change tack and instead play for time they knew the UK, US and Spain didn't have". Chile was convinced it "could bridge the gap" and was "likely to come back … with a French offer". France would probably try to persuade Chile (and Mexico) that it "might be able to sign up to our approach, providing" there was "a little more time". But France had "absolutely no intention of signing up to anything we produced". Any French "offer" to Lagos was "highly unlikely to be anything useful". Mr Straw and Secretary Powell had agreed.

207. Secretary Powell told Mr Straw that the US message to President Fox would be that it was "not interested in another series of negotiations".

208. In a subsequent bilateral conversation, Secretary Powell and Mr Straw discussed the position of Mexico and Chile.[72]

209. Secretary Powell told Mr Straw that President Lagos had not yet spoken to President Chirac. President Bush would tell President Fox that Mr Blair's "offer was all he was going to get". The US was "not interested in another series of negotiations. Any modifications would have to be made tomorrow for a vote on Thursday."

210. Reporting that Dr Rice was "showing some interest in ditching OP3" (the provision that Iraq had to demonstrate it was co-operating by a defined date), Secretary Powell stated that he had pointed out that President Chirac would "veto anything, explaining that the simplest language was being used as a pretext for war".

211. The FCO asked Ambassadors in Arab countries to make clear that little time was left to persuade Saddam Hussein to stand down.

212. In a telegram on the afternoon of 11 March, the FCO stated:

> "If the Arabs are still serious about pressing Saddam to stand aside, they need to get going now without waiting for a second UN SCR. If they delay there may not be time for Arab diplomacy."[73]

213. The FCO added:

> "We are now approaching the end game on Iraq. A vote on the current draft Security Council resolution is now likely this week. If this includes, as at present, a deadline for Iraqi action, our assumption is that that is the end point for Arab efforts. If the resolution does not pass, the window for Arab action may be very short, and might not be explicit."

214. Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that they should not put the draft resolution to a vote if there would be a French veto. He was considering whether the UK strategy needed to be adapted, but had not yet agreed that with Mr Blair.

215. Secretary Powell suggested that Mr Blair should make plain to President Bush the UK's problems if the second resolution failed.

216. Mr Straw and Secretary Powell spoke again at 6.45pm to discuss the difficulties with securing nine votes in the Security Council and the timing of military action.[74]

217. Discussing whether it would be wise to go ahead with a vote without the support of Mexico and Chile, and the different views within the US Administration, Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that:

> "… he was clear that if we did not have nine votes we should go nowhere near the Security Council. Even if we did have nine votes we should not go if we knew the French would veto. Annan had signalled yesterday his unhappiness with the possibility of the last act of the Security Council showing it divided and fractured … [H]e knew that some people in the [US] Administration did not give a fig for the UN, but the US and President Bush needed the UN across a range of subjects. The President could make a better speech about the negotiating history of 1441 and French failure to insert a provision for a second resolution than about why we were ignoring a Security Council veto."

218. Secretary Powell asked that Mr Blair should make plain to President Bush the UK's problems with a failed second resolution.

219. Mr Straw said that in his opinion we would "need to adapt our strategy" and that the "Kosovo model might be useful. In some ways our position was now stronger: in Kosovo we had relied on customary international law, whereas here we had a string of resolutions culminating in 1441". Mr Straw stressed that was his opinion and had not yet been agreed with Mr Blair.

220. In a conversation with Mr Blair that evening, President Lagos confirmed he was still working on a draft resolution.

221. When Mr Blair and President Lagos spoke for a second time, President Lagos confirmed that he was still working on a draft Mexican/Chilean resolution.[75]

222. In response to a warning from Mr Blair that President Bush would not agree a deadline "beyond 24 March", President Lagos was reported to have commented that he would put his preferred deadline in the draft and there could then be a negotiation.

223. In the absence of nine votes for the resolution, Mr Straw and Secretary Powell discussed not putting the resolution to a vote. They agreed the decision to pull out of a vote could be explained by blaming France.

224. Mr Straw stated that in four successive meetings of the UN, no-one had said Iraq had fully complied. "Iraq was therefore in material breach."

225. When Mr Straw and Secretary Powell spoke again at 9pm, Secretary Powell stated that the US and UK had "just about convinced President Lagos and President Fox; their objections were fading away.[76] Mr Straw said that President Lagos "seemed to be biting".

226. Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that Mr Blair was "coming round to the view that if the nine votes weren't there, then we should not push it to a vote". Secretary Powell responded that President Bush was on the same wave-length.

227. Mr Straw added that "the situation was less clear if we had nine votes but faced a veto". Secretary Powell suggested that his answer to the question of how to explain pulling out of a vote in that situation would be to "blame Paris and leave".

228. Mr Straw agreed, stating they could:

> "… point to France signing [resolution] 1441. That resolution had demanded 'immediate' co-operation, but here we were four months later. The resolution had demanded 'active' co-operation, but Blix could not confirm that. And, in four successive meetings at the UN, not one of the 15 … members had said that Iraq had fully complied. Iraq was therefore in material breach."

229. Secretary Powell added that the US and UK "had worked hard to obtain a second resolution, but Chirac had clearly said on 10 March that he would veto a resolution in any circumstances". Mr Straw said they could also point to Mr Annan's statement.

230. In a subsequent conversation at 10.45pm, Mr Straw and Secretary Powell discussed the indications that Chile and Mexico were thinking about a timeline of 45 days and the remarks made earlier that day by Secretary Rumsfeld.[77]

231. When Mr Blair and President Bush discussed the position late on 11 March, it was clear that President Bush was determined not to postpone the start of military action.

232. Mr Blair stated that President Chirac's remarks gave "some cover" for ending the UN route.

233. Mr Blair spoke to President Bush late on 11 March.[78]

234. They discussed Secretary Rumsfeld's comments about the UK, the continuing problems in securing support for the resolution and the impact of President Chirac's "veto threats". Mr Blair considered that President Chirac's remarks "gave some cover" for ending the UN route.

235. President Bush wrote in his memoir that, at Mr Blair's request, he "had made one last effort to persuade Mexico and Chile … to support the second resolution".[79] President Fox did not give him an answer. President Lagos had "talked about giving Saddam an additional two to three weeks". President Bush "told him a few more weeks would make no difference. Saddam had already had years to comply." Asked "one last time how he planned to vote", President Lagos had "said no".

236. Mr Campbell wrote that President Bush had apologised for Secretary Rumsfeld's comments, describing them as "one of those attempts to be helpful that wasn't very helpful".[80]

237. Mr Campbell added that President Bush had described his latest telephone calls with President Fox and President Lagos as "difficult"; that they "had to give us their votes"; and that "we had to get this over with". President Bush was "determined we could not let the date slip".

238. The record of the conversation confirms Mr Campbell's account.[81]

239. Mr Campbell also wrote:

- When Mr Blair had "said we needed to hold their feet to the fire", President Bush had responded that he was "waiting your instructions. If it falls apart I'm going to make a speech to the American people saying I tried, and now Saddam has forty-eight hours to leave the country."
- Mr Blair "still felt Chile would come round and not walk away".
- President Bush "felt seven days was too big a stretch to give them … Congress was getting restless and all the polls were showing criticism of the UN for inaction. 'We just got to go.'"
- Mr Blair had "said we had to do something to change the diplomatic weather and get on the front foot but if we can't get anything, we're in real trouble and there is no point in pushing the UN beyond what it will take".
- President Bush said "We know he's not going to disarm. We already had benchmarks." He had told President Lagos "it was time to stand up and be counted. I want your vote. He said no."
- Mr Blair said he would speak to President Lagos again, and that "a week's delay was the top end for us". If we were "on the front foot" it would be possible to gain altitude again.
- President Bush "said these guys [Presidents Fox and Lagos] were just playing for time. He felt maybe we stand up on Thursday [13 March] and say there could be no new UNSCR, that it had failed in its mission …"

- Mr Blair felt that there had been "a bit more give" from President Putin in their last call; and that "the problem was that the Chiles and Mexicos were not used to making decisions as big as these …"[82]

240. Mr Campbell commented that President Bush "did not feel the need to buy more time" and that he was "more impatient than ever". He was "not really listening".

241. Mr Tony Brenton, Chargé d'Affaires at the British Embassy Washington, reported that Mr Richard Armitage, the US Deputy Secretary of State, told him on 11 March, before Mr Blair's conversation with President Bush, that he was "unsure whether Chile and Mexico were moving in the right direction".[83] President Bush had spoken to President Fox, who had "bid for a 45-day deadline". When President Bush had "said no way", President Fox "had retreated, saying he would study the papers further". President Bush "was still trying to speak" to President Lagos.

242. In response to a question from Mr Armitage about whether if it looked as though there would be nine positive votes but "one or two vetoes" the UK would want to go for a Security Council vote "or pull the resolution", Mr Brenton had said that "would depend crucially on calculations of how it would play in Parliament". Mr Armitage "thought that President Bush's instinct would be to go for a vote, though the impact on the UK would weigh heavily with him".

243. Mr Stephen Hadley, the US Deputy National Security Advisor, had been "more direct". President Bush's "instinct would be to go for a vote on 12 March, or 13 March at the latest, whatever the situation".

244. Mr Kurt Volker, the US National Security Council (NSC) Director for NATO and West Europe, had separately told UK officials that President Bush had rejected a suggestion from Mr Aznar that the resolution might be pulled; he wanted, and had promised the American people, a vote. Mr Aznar had also proposed that those supporting the resolution might be asked to co-sponsor it "to act as a disincentive to France and Russia to veto". Mr Brenton and Mr Volker "agreed co-sponsorship seemed a bridge too far right now".

245. Mr Brenton reported that he had also been asked by both Mr Armitage and Mr Hadley whether Mr Hoon's comments to Secretary Rumsfeld meant that the UK's "determination to go in alongside the US was diminishing". He had said "not"; the UK "remained confident that we would go alongside the US" and he "assumed" that Mr Hoon "had simply been setting out the Parliamentary realities" to Secretary Rumsfeld.

246. Following three conversations with Mr Blair, President Lagos remained adamant that more time was needed and that nobody would view a deadline of 24 March as serious.

247. After his conversation with President Bush, Mr Blair spoke again to President Lagos to say that one last effort was needed to get Saddam Hussein to comply: "Ten days was adequate for him [Saddam Hussein] to make the right statements, get the interviews going and produce the hidden anthrax."[84]

248. President Lagos was not convinced; in his view, even 24 March looked too short a deadline, and that nobody would believe it was serious. He wanted to talk to other Security Council members.

CONSULTATIONS IN NEW YORK

249. After consultations on 11 March, Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that the draft resolution tabled by the UK, US and Spain on 7 March had "no chance of adoption" and that avoiding providing the US "with a new basis for the use of force" was "a major criterion for most members of the Council". The UK now faced "a choice between a number of hard options".

250. Dr Blix had questioned whether it was right to describe failure to co-operate, and in particular to take part in interviews, as "a very serious crime".

251. Sir Jeremy Greenstock was given authority to circulate the UK's "language" to Security Council colleagues.[85] A decision on whether to speak to the French would be subject to consultation with Sir Jeremy and a conversation should take place "only at the end of the New York day".

252. Reporting discussions in New York on 11 March on the draft resolution and details of a possible "side statement", Sir Jeremy Greenstock advised that he had discussed the proposed tests with Dr Blix and Dr Dimitri Perricos, the UNMOVIC Director of Planning and Operations.[86]

253. They had raised a number of questions about the tests, the timelines for assessing Iraqi actions and who would judge compliance. Dr Blix was:

- "concerned" about the statement that Iraq should yield proscribed items "immediately" for destruction, "without delay" would be "more realistic". In addition "he wondered whether it was right to refer to a failure to co-operate with UNMOVIC/IAEA, and in particular to take part in interviews, as a 'very serious' crime"; and

- "nervous about the concept of requiring interviewees and their families to leave Iraq, but equally recognised the dangers – in terms of undue pressure – of letting families remain in Iraq. He seemed to realise there was little way round this, and said he would say in the Council only that this was a dilemma."

254. Dr Perricos:

- "was not keen on London's suggestion of asking for the list of all personnel currently and formerly associated with Iraq's WMD programmes … Iraq had provided names and had said they were willing to provide more in particular areas on request". While it would be "possible to get the interviewees out of Iraq in the timescale we envisaged, it would be difficult to interview them as well";
- "did not expect anything new to arise" from the test on anthrax;
- "was nervous" that the inclusion of mobile laboratories "made the whole package a bit too heavy for the envisaged 7-10 day timetable" and "thought little would come of it – i.e. Iraq would present legitimate facilities". He thought that if the test was kept, "it should also refer to chemical facilities and to the sites that could support such mobile facilities";
- "preferred to stick with the language" in Dr Blix's letter to Dr Amir al-Sa'adi, the Scientific Adviser to the Iraqi Presidency, on missile destruction, which he "thought would cover all Volga engines" and "agreed our inclusion of the destruction of equipment designed for the production and testing of the Al Samoud 2";
- "wondered whether the benchmarks would lead to a strategic shift in Iraq's behaviour though they would certainly 'burn' Iraq";
- "underlined that while action in the time period proposed was possible, there would need to be some time afterwards to assess the action taken"; and
- "asked a number of pertinent questions" including: "Who would judge compliance? Would we want to specify whether the information should go to UNMOVIC and/or the Council? What would we do if Iraq gave straight denials?"

255. Sir Jeremy had discussed the draft with Mr Inocencio Arias, the Spanish Permanent Representative to the UN, who made "few comments", and Ambassador John Negroponte, US Permanent Representative to the UN, who was "very concerned that the statement should not be part of the resolution". Another US official had commented that Washington was "intensively discussing the benchmarks ideas, but he had heard no one in State or the NSC who favoured them", thought that "it would be relatively easy for the Iraqis to satisfy the tests", and they "would not lead to the US feeling any safer".

256. Sir Jeremy had also briefed Ambassador Negroponte "in general terms" on possible fallback options. Ambassador Negroponte thought the side statement "would not go anywhere. Mexico and Chile were asking for a lot more then we had in mind, including on time." He subsequently told Sir Jeremy that President Lagos had told President Bush that "he wanted 45 days and a second Council decision".

257. Sir Jeremy concluded that the draft resolution tabled by the UK, US and Spain on 7 March had "no chance … of adoption". The UK now faced "a choice between a number of hard options":

- A "light" resolution without the deadline for a decision on whether Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity and no benchmarks. That would "allow each Council member to interpret the text as they see fit" but had "considerable legal risks … as well as appearing too obviously as cover for US military action".
- A "light" resolution accompanied by "Blix-cleared benchmarks" while saying "we were going the last mile for peace". But Dr Blix and Dr Perricos "did not think the benchmarks would necessarily be strong enough to amount to a 'strategic change' by Iraq". There would be a "difficult choice of what to do if the benchmarks were met … especially if we believed … that Iraq was still not serious about complete disarmament".
- A "light" resolution accompanied by "stronger benchmarks". Sir Jeremy thought that Dr Blix might regard the UK list as "unreasonable for completion in the timescale that we envisage". He was inclined to chose a "Blix-approved version if (if) we can bring the US along".
- No resolution with or without national benchmarks.

258. Sir Jeremy commented that the FCO would:

> "… wish to consider the legal implications of each of these options. If we won an adopted resolution under [the second or third] options … we would have to live with the (improbable?) consequences of Saddam meeting the requirements, even if the US was not in the same position."

259. Sir Jeremy added:

> "If we do not look like winning adoption, it might be easier to make our legal case if no resolution is put to the vote … we could presumably still argue that 1441 had found Iraq to be in material breach and offered it a final opportunity; that it was now objectively clear on the basis of the Blix reports and other emerging evidence, that Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity; and that therefore the authorisation in 678 [1990] was revived.
> "To the objection that we should have tested the Council we would reply (a) that a Council decision was not needed under 1441 … and (b) that putting the text to the vote would have been futile in the circumstances, in particular because of publicly stated French intransigence.
> "If a resolution was put to the vote and defeated, or adopted with a majority of antagonistic EOVs [Explanations of Vote], it would seem harder (than it already is) to assert plausibly that our intended action carried, in any sense, the implicit authorisation of the UN on the basis of the revival doctrine."

260. Sir Jeremy suggested that "it was difficult to gauge, with all the fluid dynamic of current telephone calls, where anyone might be on a new proposal". The "middle ground [countries]" were "constantly cross-checking with each other". His "best judgement" was that it would be worth trying the second and third options during informal discussions the following afternoon. Avoiding providing the US "with a new basis for the use of force" was a "major criterion for most members of the Council, and he would need to make clear that the options proposed did not do that. If that revealed opposition which could not be overcome, that would leave the fourth option "leaving our benchmarks out there if this has better political resonance".

261. The open debate on Iraq in the Security Council on 11 and 12 March is addressed later in this Section.

262. By the end of 11 March, it was clear that Mr Blair's efforts to persuade President Bush to extend the deadline for military action, while he tried to secure support from other members of the Security Council for a second resolution determining that Iraq had failed to take the final opportunity offered by resolution 1441, had almost reached the end of the road.

263. There were also concerns that if a majority in the Council supported the resolution, France, Russia and China might all exercise their veto.

264. Mr Campbell wrote that on 11 March there was a "Growing sense of crisis", and that:

> "We desperately need some change in the diplomatic weather. The best thing may in the end be to go in without a vote because of the timings, and that once troops are in there the mood changes. But short of that, which was risky enough, it was hard to see how the dynamic changed."[87]

265. Mr Cook wrote that on 11 March he had asked Mr Powell to press on Mr Blair his view that, without a second resolution, Mr Blair could not have military action.[88] If Mr Blair went "to the House with no UN resolution he may well be defeated if he persists in going to war".

266. Mr Cook also wrote that Mr Straw had been "genuinely worried" when they had discussed possible dates for the debate on Iraq. When asked if Mr Blair understood that he could not go for military action without a second resolution, Mr Straw had replied:

> "Tony is just focused on getting a second resolution. He is not thinking about what we do if it fails."

267. Mr Campbell also recorded that Mr Blair had taken a telephone call on 11 March from Mr Rupert Murdoch "who was pressing on timings, saying how News International would support us, etc".[89] Mr Campbell and Mr Powell "felt it was prompted by Washington, and another example of their over-crude diplomacy. Murdoch was pushing all the Republican buttons, how the longer we waited, the harder it got."

268. The Government has been unable to find any records in the No.10 files of conversations between Mr Blair and Mr Rupert Murdoch, Chairman and CEO of News Corporation, Mr James Murdoch, Director/CEO BSkyB, or Lord Black of Crossharbour (Chairman of The Daily Telegraph) in early 2003.[90]

Events of 12 March 2003

MR STRAW'S MEETING WITH MR BLAIR

269. When he discussed the options with Mr Straw early on 12 March, Mr Blair decided that the UK would continue to support the US.

270. Mr Straw agreed.

271. In response to a question about consideration of alternative options on the eve of conflict, Mr Straw initially told the Inquiry that he had:

> "… submitted formal minutes to him [Mr Blair]. This was far too serious to make suggestions to him. So I thought about this a very great deal. I talked to my officials and advisers in the Foreign Office and the agencies about this. I prepared a paper for Mr Blair. I talked to him about it."[91]

272. The Inquiry was told by a witness it agreed not to identify that, in a meeting on 12 March, with officials from No.10 present, Mr Straw had advised Mr Blair that he had "the final opportunity to decide on a different track".[92] Mr Straw had suggested to Mr Blair that he had a "way out and why don't you take it". The witness had been "struck" by "the speed" and the "absolute insistence" of Mr Blair's response: "he had got his arguments all marshalled and all laid out". The witness did not think there was a risk of Mr Straw resigning.

273. Officials in No.10 "decided, after careful consideration, that the meeting should not be recorded because it didn't change anything … it was a very personal meeting and a very personal discussion and that in operational terms … the track … was unchanged".[93]

274. Asked specifically in the light of that evidence if he had discussed whether Mr Blair should go ahead with committing British troops to military action when the second resolution failed, Mr Straw told the Inquiry that his minute of 11 March "set out for Mr Blair the different routes open to him in the event of us not getting the second UNSCR and my judgements on those various courses of action".[94] In the meeting on 12 March, he had "made clear" to Mr Blair that he "had options other than committing to the invasion, and that these were still open to him, should he want to take them".

275. The Inquiry asked Mr Blair if Mr Straw or any of his Cabinet colleagues had tried to dissuade Mr Blair from taking military action in Iraq, and, if so, when.[95]

276. In his statement Mr Blair wrote:

> "It was clear following 1441 that if Saddam did not comply fully and unconditionally, military action was likely. No-one tried to persuade me not to take this course, other than those who publicly and openly declared themselves, like Robin Cook and certain ministers, who later resigned over the absence of a second resolution.
> "It is correct that Jack, shortly before we were due to go in, warned me of the political perils of doing so. I was well aware of them. But for me the issue was straightforward: we had got the US to go down the UN route and give Saddam a final chance; he had not taken it; such co-operation as there was, was under the duress of military action; if we backed away now, it would have disastrous consequences for a tough stance on WMD and its proliferation; and for our strategic relationship with the US, our key ally."[96]

277. Asked whether his position was one of advocating to Mr Blair that he should not commit British troops to military action, Mr Straw told the Inquiry that was "probably putting it too strongly".[97]

278. Mr Straw added that he:

- had "never wanted to give the false impression that when it came to it over the weekend [of 15 to 16 March] and then the decision on 17 [March] my position was anything [other] than thoroughly to endorse the decision we did come to, which was in favour of military action";

- was certainly aware by 12 March that there was a "clear prospect" [of military action] and he did not "think anybody was keen on military action";
- was "anxious that we should explore all possible alternatives"; and
- "owed" Mr Blair the "best and most robust advice I could give him".

279. Mr Straw confirmed that the anonymous witness had given "a fair summary" of both his and Mr Blair's positions.

280. Mr Straw also stated:

> "The interesting thing … was that from an early stage it was the Chief of the Defence Staff who had argued very strongly that if we were going to get involved in the military action, the Army had to be there, because they would be unhappy and cross if they weren't. I don't trivialise the way it was put across … So we could have provided facilitation and then go[ne] in afterwards … which would not have meant standing down the troops we had in theatre and it was essentially what the Spanish and the Italians did."[98]

281. Section 6.1 concludes that none of the key decision-takers regarded the question of whether the Army would be unhappy if it did not participate in combat operations as a decisive factor in the decision on 31 October 2002 to offer ground forces to the US for planning purposes.

282. Describing the circumstances in which he had sent the minute of 11 March, Mr Straw wrote in his memoir, that, after his speech in the Security Council on 7 March, he had been:

> "… convinced that unless there was a last-minute change of attitude by Saddam, for which I hoped and prayed, war was inevitable. Whether the UK would be part of the invasion was still unclear though … it was still far from certain that we could win a vote on war in the Commons."[99]

283. Mr Campbell recorded the concerns about the US approach which were discussed in the meeting.

284. Describing the discussion with Mr Straw in the edition of his diaries published in 2012, Mr Campbell wrote that he and Mr Powell had concluded that Mr Rumsfeld's comments and the telephone call from Mr Murdoch on 11 March had "effectively been a pincer movement". The former had "forced" the UK "to come out strong" in support of the US in the event of military action.[100]

285. Mr Campbell added that:

- Mr Straw had said "we were victims of hopeless bullying and arrogant diplomacy" and that the UK "was being driven by the US political strategy".
- Sir David Manning also thought the actions had been "a rather crude attempt to shaft us" and had "felt we should say to the Americans they could only use our troops after the first effort and also on humanitarian duties".
- Mr Blair "did not want to go down that route, no matter how much he agreed the Americans were not being helpful".

286. In his daily conference call with the White House, Mr Campbell told the US that it should not comment on UK politics and, in a later call he told Mr Dan Bartlett, President Bush's Communications Director, that the US was doing real damage.

PRIME MINISTER'S QUESTIONS, 12 MARCH 2003

287. In Prime Minister's Questions (PMQs) on 12 March, Mr Blair focused on efforts to secure a second resolution and the importance for the UN of being seen to act in response to Saddam Hussein's failure to co-operate as required by resolution 1441 and of achieving unity in the international community.

288. In a clear reference to President Chirac's statement on 10 March but without naming France, Mr Blair drew attention to the difficulties created by countries saying that they would veto a resolution "whatever the circumstances".

289. Mr Blair also stated that:

- the UK would not do anything which did not have a proper legal basis; and
- it was the Government's intention to seek a vote on a second resolution "in a way that most upholds the authority of the UN".

290. Mr Rycroft sent an urgent email to Mr Powell, Sir David Manning and other No.10 officials at 11.48am, informing them that the French Ambassador to the UK (Mr Gérard Errera) had called "on the instructions of the Elysée".[101]

291. Mr Rycroft reported that Mr Errera had told him that President Chirac's comment about a veto:

> "… needed to be read in the context of what had been said immediately before about two hypotheses – either our resolution gets nine votes or it doesn't. In other words, the Ambassador claims that it is not the case that he [President Chirac] said that he would vote no against any resolution."

292. Most of the questions raised during PMQs on 12 March related to Iraq.[102]

[102] House of Commons, Official Report, 12 March 2003, columns 280-290.

293. In relation to the policy the questions included:

- Mr Peter Bradley (Labour) asked Mr Blair which was the lesser evil, allowing more time for disarmament or dividing the international community "particularly in view of the French President's commitment to exercise his veto". He also asked for an assurance that he would resist US pressure while there was a prospect of rebuilding the international coalition under the authority of the UN.
- Mr Iain Duncan Smith, Leader of the Opposition, asked whether there would be a vote in the UN and whether the US would go to war without the UK if there was no second resolution.
- Mr Barry Sheerman (Labour) asked Mr Blair to use all his efforts to tell President Bush that we needed another UN resolution and that there was "no need for an unseemly haste to war".

294. The points made by Mr Blair included:

- He was doing "everything" he could "to make sure that the international community stays united and that we achieve a second resolution".
- Although he had not complied for "many months", there was still time for Saddam Hussein to avert conflict.
- The "worst thing that could happen" was for Saddam Hussein to defy the clearly expressed will of the UN and for no action to follow.
- It was the Government's intention to seek a UN vote on a second resolution "in a way that most upholds the authority of the UN".
- The UK "should not take military action unless it is in our interests to do so. It is the British national interest that must be upheld at all times."
- In working "flat out" for a second resolution, Mr Blair said the UK was "looking at whether we can set out a clear set of tests for Iraq … to demonstrate that it is still in compliance – not partial compliance …"
- "… not one Iraqi scientist has been interviewed outside Iraq".
- "Iraq should produce the unmanned aerial vehicles, which can spray chemical and biological poison …"
- "If we set out those conditions clearly, and back them with a will of a united UN, we have a chance even now of averting conflict. What we must show, however, is the determination to act if Saddam will not comply fully."
- Military action had been "delayed precisely in order to bring the international community back round the position … set out in 1441".
- The "heart of the agreement" of the US "to take the multilateral path of the United Nations" was that the "other partners inside the United Nations agreed that, if Saddam did not fully comply and was in material breach, serious consequences and actions would follow".
- It would "be a tragedy for the UN" if it failed "to meet the challenge".

- Everyone accepted that Saddam Hussein was not co-operating fully with the United Nations: "[N]ot a single person … in Europe; not a single person in the rest of the world – believes that he is co-operating either fully or unconditionally, and certainly not immediately."

295. Mr Charles Kennedy, Leader of the Liberal Democrats, asked if the Attorney General had advised that a war in Iraq would be legal in the absence of a second resolution authorising force; Mr Richard Shepherd (Conservative) asked why a UN resolution was required; and Mr John Randall (Conservative) asked if Mr Blair would publish the legal advice.

296. In response, the points made by Mr Blair included:

- As he had "said on many occasions … we … would not do anything that did not have a proper legal basis".
- Resolution 1441 provided the legal basis and the second resolution was "highly desirable to demonstrate the will of the international community".
- It was not the convention to publish legal advice but it was "the convention to state clearly that we have a legal base for whatever action we take, and … we must have such a base".

297. In response to a question from Mr Kennedy about whether Mr Annan had said that action without a second resolution would breach the UN Charter, Mr Blair stated that Mr Annan had said that it was "important that the UN comes together". Mr Blair added that it was:

> "… complicated to get that agreement … when one nation is saying that whatever the circumstances it will veto a resolution."

298. Mr Alan Howarth (Conservative) asked whether Mr Blair agreed that:

- divisions in the international community only gave "comfort and opportunity to Saddam Hussein";
- that "a deadline receding into the summer haze was not a serious interpretation of 'serious consequences'" as the Security Council had unanimously agreed in November 2002; and
- given Saddam Hussein's motive and capacity to equip terrorists with chemical and biological weapons, there was an urgent necessity to disarm him whether there was a second resolution or not.

299. Mr Blair replied that Mr Howarth had set out "precisely why we need to take action". Leaving troops in the region "for months on an indefinite time scale, without insisting that Saddam disarms, would send not only a message of weakness … to Saddam, but a message of weakness throughout the world".

300. Mr Blair added:

> "I hope that even now those countries that are saying they would use their veto no matter what the circumstances will reconsider and realise that by doing so they put at risk not just the disarmament of Saddam, but the unity of the United Nations."

301. Mr Duncan Smith also asked, in the light of Ms Short's comments on 9 March, whether the doctrine of Cabinet responsibility applied to the option of committing British forces without a second resolution. Mr Blair replied: "Yes of course it does."

302. In response to a question from Mr Elfyn Llwyd (Plaid Cymru), about whether the House of Commons would have a vote on whether to commit troops, Mr Blair replied that it was:

> "… subject to the security and safety of our troops … it is right that this House has a say on this issue. People will then be able to see the stand that we take, and people will then have to make up their minds as to the stand that they take."

303. In response to a question from Mr James Gray (Conservative) asking if Mr Blair felt he needed the support of the Parliamentary Labour Party, the House of Commons and the country as a whole, as well as the majority support he commanded in Cabinet, before committing the UK to war, Mr Blair replied that as well as a vote in the House of Commons it was:

> "… important that I set out, as Prime Minister, what I believe to be right in this country's national interest. I have tried to do that over the past few months …"

SIR JEREMY GREENSTOCK'S PROPOSAL TO REVISE THE DRAFT RESOLUTION OF 7 MARCH

304. Sir Jeremy Greenstock suggested early on the afternoon of 12 March that in the Security Council that day the UK should:

- table a revised draft resolution explaining that the UK was "setting aside the ultimatum concept" in operative paragraph 3 of the draft of 7 March "because it had not attracted Council support";
- distribute the side statement with tests for Saddam Hussein, "explaining that the text was a national position to which the UK wanted as many Council Members as possible to adhere to maintain the pressure on Saddam"; and
- state that the 17 March date was "being reviewed".[103]

305. Sir Jeremy favoured using the open debate in the Security Council later that day to explain the UK move, adding: "At no point will I signal, in public or in private, that there is any UK fallback from putting this new text to a vote within 24-36 hours."

[103] Telegram 419 UKMIS New York to FCO London, 12 March 2003, 'Iraq: Second Resolution'.

306. Sir Jeremy reported that he had explained the gist of the plan to Ambassador Negroponte who was briefing Secretary Powell for a conversation with President Bush.

SIR JEREMY GREENSTOCK'S MEETING WITH MR ANNAN

307. Sir Jeremy reported that Mr Annan had asked how it could be right, when the Council had not yet reached a decision to authorise force, for some Member States to take the right to use force into their own hands.

308. At Mr Annan's request, Sir Jeremy Greenstock called on him on 12 March.[104]

309. Mr Annan was reported to have told Sir Jeremy that he had an idea from his telephone calls with Mr Blair about the UK efforts to unite the Security Council around compromise text (for a resolution), but how would France and Russia react? Sir Jeremy explained the UK concept of a side statement and tests which Saddam Hussein could meet "within the tight deadline we would offer (ideally 10 days)" if he "was serious about disarming". Council members "should be able to agree the concept we were offering as a way out of the current impasse".

310. Sir Jeremy reported that he had stressed that the UK's objective "was the disarmament of Iraq by peaceful means if possible". The "aim was to keep a united Security Council at the centre of attempts to disarm Iraq", but calls for "grace period for Iraq" of 45 days or longer were "out of the question". The UK would not amend the draft resolution tabled on 7 March:

> "… until it was clear that the new concept had a chance of succeeding. If the Council was interested, we might be able to move forward in the next day or so; if not, we would be back on the 7 March text and my instructions were to take a vote soon."

311. Sir Jeremy and Mr Annan had also discussed press reporting, on 11 March, of Mr Annan's comments, "to the effect that military action without a Council authorisation would violate the UN Charter". Mr Annan said that he had been:

> "… misquoted: he had not been attempting an interpretation of 1441 but merely offering, in answer to a specific question, obvious thoughts about the basic structure of the Charter. Nevertheless the Council was seized of the Iraq problem and working actively on it. It had not yet reached a decision to authorise force; how … could it be right for some Member States to take the right to use force into their own hands?"

312. Sir Jeremy reported that he had "remonstrated that the Council was in paralysis: at least one Permanent Member had threatened to veto 'in any circumstances'. The Council was not shouldering its responsibilities."

[104] Telegram 427 UKMIS New York to FCO London, 13 March 2003, 'Iraq: Call on the Secretary-General, 12 March'.

313. Mr Annan "had agreed ruefully", but asked what the UK would do if we failed to get even nine votes. Sir Jeremy said:

> "… we would have to consider the next steps; but we believed we had a basis for the use of force in existing resolutions (based on the revival of the 678 authorisation by the material breach finding in OP1 of 1441, coupled with Iraq's manifest failure to take the final opportunity offered to it in that resolution) … OP12 … did not in terms require another decision. This was not an accidental oversight: it had been the basis of the compromise that led to the adoption of the resolution."

314. Sir Jeremy reported that he had "urged" Mr Annan "to be cautious about allowing his name to be associated too closely with one legal view of a complicated and difficult issue".

315. At Mr Annan's suggestion, Sir Jeremy subsequently gave the UN Office of Legal Affairs a copy of Professor Christopher Greenwood's (Professor of International Law, London School of Economics) memorandum to the Foreign Affairs Committee (FAC) of October 2002 and Mr Straw's evidence to the FAC on 4 March 2003.

316. Sir Jeremy concluded that Mr Annan had said "several times" that he "understood" what Mr Straw and Mr Blair "were trying to do, and expressed sympathy for the tough situation you found yourselves in". Mr Aznar was "in a similar predicament". The "US did not always realise how comments intended by US politicians for US domestic audiences seriously damaged the position of their friends in other countries".

317. Sir Jeremy also reported that, in a conversation with President Chirac on 12 March, Mr Annan had "found him 'tough but not closed' to possible compromises".

MR STRAW'S CONVERSATION WITH MR IGOR IVANOV

318. Mr Straw informed Mr Igor Ivanov, the Russian Foreign Minister, that the UK was about to table a revised resolution, omitting the paragraph from the 7 March draft which contained the deadline of 17 March for Iraq to demonstrate that it had taken the final opportunity offered in resolution 1441 to comply with its obligations.

319. Mr Straw telephoned Mr Ivanov to inform him that Sir Jeremy Greenstock was about to table a "much lighter draft second resolution", which omitted the third operative paragraph from the draft of 7 March.[105] Mr Straw explained that the UK "did not want the last act of the UN on Iraq to be a deeply divided one"; the "imperatives" in resolution 1441 had not been met; and that neither Mr Blair nor Mr Straw "wanted military action, nor did Powell or Bush". The US and the UN inspectors had "agreed" the tests the UK would propose in a side statement. The format of the tests would be for the UN to decide.

[105] Telegram 46 FCO London to Moscow, 12 March 2003, 'Iraq: Foreign Secretary's Conversation with Russian Foreign Minister, 12 March'.

320. Mr Ivanov agreed to analyse the proposals and respond.

MR BLAIR'S CONVERSATION WITH PRESIDENT BUSH, 12 MARCH 2003

321. Mr Blair decided not to seek to extend the deadline of 17 March. In a telephone call with President Bush on 12 March, he proposed only that the US and UK should continue to seek a compromise in the UN, while confirming that he knew it would not happen. He would say publicly that France had prevented a resolution.

322. Mr Blair sought President Bush's help in handling the debate in the House of Commons planned for Tuesday 18 March, where he would face a major challenge to win a vote supporting military action.

323. Mr Blair wanted:

- to avoid a gap between the end of the negotiating process and the Parliamentary vote in which France or another member of the Security Council might table a resolution that attracted support from the majority of the Council; and
- US statements on the publication of a Road Map on the MEPP and the need for a further resolution on a post-conflict Iraq.

324. On the afternoon of 12 March, Mr Blair and President Bush discussed the latest position and the difficulties with Chile and Mexico.[106]

325. In preparation for the call, Mr Rycroft advised Mr Blair that he needed "to decide if you want to ask for the further week".[107] If he did, Mr Blair could "make the case for trying over the next 24 hours to secure a UN resolution based on the Blix agreed tests with the revised deadline of 24 March (or whatever he [President Bush] accepts)".

326. If Mr Blair decided not to make the case for more time or it was rejected by President Bush, Mr Rycroft advised Mr Blair to set out a "fallback":

- He had "not given up hope of trying to secure a second resolution" and he knew that President Bush "wanted to get out of the UN morass", but he needed "a further 24 hours" to see if he could "get the Chileans to put forward a serious proposal".
- It was "important" that the US did not "publicly lose interest in the UN route" because of concerns that an alternative resolution with a "long, e.g. 45-day, time-line" could be put forward which "could attract 11 votes".

[107] Minute Rycroft to Prime Minister, 12 March 2003, 'Bush Call'.

- He had publicly set out the "Blix-agreed tests" and "also argued that because of President Chirac's threat of a veto in any circumstances, it is difficult to see how the UN can uphold 1441".
- He planned to put the issue to a vote in Parliament.

327. Mr Rycroft suggested that Mr Blair should ask President Bush for help to win the vote in Parliament by stating publicly that he would publish the Road Map for the Middle East and make a commitment to further UN resolutions, establishing a UN role in reconstruction and humanitarian issues and in running the Oil-for-Food programme post-conflict.

328. In the discussion with President Bush, Mr Blair argued that the US and UK should continue to seek a compromise in the UN and show that they were reasonable by setting out the tests, but he knew it would not happen.[108] Mr Blair would say publicly that the French had prevented them from securing a resolution, so there would not be one.

329. Mr Blair and President Bush discussed continuing the diplomatic route until Sunday, 16 March and then closing it down.

330. Mr Blair said he wanted to avoid a gap between the end of the negotiating process and the House of Commons vote planned for the following week; and to minimise the risk of an unhelpful French initiative. He would "have to pull out all the stops to win the vote".

331. Mr Blair and President Bush also discussed:

- a US ultimatum to Saddam to leave;
- the military timetable;
- the need for a communications strategy with an initiative each day before the start of military action;
- the need for initiatives on the Road Map; and
- a US statement on the need for a further UN resolution on post-conflict Iraq.

332. Sir David Manning would pursue the details with Dr Rice.

333. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries:

> "Bush said his people had watched TB at PMQs and said he was brilliant. TB said he had spoken to Lagos and the Chileans … Bush said Fox had told him he would get back to him within an hour and then went off to hospital … TB laid it on the line that we had to have a vote in the Commons. He said we couldn't pull the plug on UN negotiating because the bigger the gap between the end of the negotiation and the Commons motion, the worse it was for us. We had to keep trying.

[108] Letter Rycroft to McDonald, 12 March 2003, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Telephone Conversation with President Bush, 12 March'.

"Bush said when do you anticipate a vote? TB said we had pencilled in next Tuesday. Bush: 'Erm.' Long pause. TB: 'You want to go on Monday?' Correct. TB: 'My military have given me formal advice re the full moon.' It's not a problem, said Bush … TB said he would have to check it out. There was a clear tension between Bush wanting sooner and TB wanting later.

"Bush was clear that the French position meant no UNSCR. But we were still trying to be reasonable. He felt that on withdrawal of the resolution he would give a speech saying the diplomatic phase is over, issue a 48-hour ultimatum to Saddam, say late Friday, which takes us to Sunday.

"TB went over the politics here, how we were pulling out every stop. TB said the Tories would see this as their chance to get rid of him, support us on a war motion, but not a confidence motion.

"Bush said they would make it clear to the Tories that if they moved to get rid of TB 'we will get rid of them'…

"The French had definitely allowed themselves to be presented as the unreasonable ones, which was probably swinging opinion our way a bit, but it was still very difficult. TB said it was important we still showed we were trying to be reasonable. But he said if Bush could delay his broadcast till after our Commons vote, it would help. Sunday, say you've tried, the French are being impossible, we are working the phones. Monday, we take it to Parliament and say we must bring this to a conclusion. Vote Tuesday. Forty-eight hours you go to their people and say war. The best argument we had is that we don't want our foreign policy decided by the French, though TB was clear again that Rumsfeld's comments had given us a problem.

"He [Mr Blair] then started to press on the Middle East and said if Bush would commit to publishing the Road Map, that would be a big breakthrough. We needed a fresh UNSCR on the humanitarian situation post-conflict. Nobody doubts us on the tough side of things, but it's Middle East, humanitarian, democracy in Iraq, that people want to hear about.

"TB spelled out the symbolism in the Road Map. Bush didn't quite get it but he was willing to do it … But TB really pressed on him and he got it in the end. Bush said that we had to watch out for the French, that they would be worried they had got themselves into a ridiculous position."[109]

334. Sir David Manning and Mr Campbell discussed the next steps and news management with their counterparts in the White House.

---

[109] Campbell A & Hagerty B. The Alastair Campbell Diaries. Volume 4. The Burden of Power: Countdown to Iraq. Hutchinson, 2012.

335. A meeting on 15 March was proposed before the UK withdrew the draft resolution on 17 March. The US would issue a 48-hour ultimatum to Saddam Hussein to leave.

336. After the conversation between President Bush and Mr Blair, Mr Campbell and Sir David Manning each spoke to the White House.

337. Reporting his conversation with Mr Bartlett, Mr Campbell advised that the US would need to respond quickly with a "we're going in" message once it was clear that the UN process had collapsed.[110] Given the potential impact on opinion in the Parliamentary Labour Party, Mr Campbell asked that the UK should be consulted about the US message.

338. Mr Campbell also reported a suggestion for a meeting on neutral territory on Saturday (15 March) to "show continued efforts on the diplomatic front, and tactically, to forestall any French ruse. The plan would be to indicate continued strategising around the draft UNSCR." That would "fill the void" and "would mean that any UN talks collapse would be delayed to Monday".

339. Mr Campbell's view was that the perception that Mr Blair and President Bush were "making a 'last push for peace' was fine; 'Council of War' was less so". He feared it would be seen as the latter. Dr Rice would discuss the idea with Sir David Manning. Ending the process on 14 March, with a debate in the House of Commons on 15 March, was also a possibility.

340. Sir David Manning told Dr Rice that publishing the Road Map that weekend was "critical" for the UK; "it had huge symbolic significance in the Middle East" and in the UK.[111] "It might be worth 50 votes to the Government" which "could make all the difference" in the Parliamentary debate.

341. Sir David and Dr Rice discussed the UK intention to withdraw its draft resolution on Monday, 17 March; "news management would be critical in the next four or five days".

342. Sir David told Dr Rice that:

> "… we could fill a lot of column inches in the next 36 hours with the activity at the UN. Jeremy Greenstock would be making great play today with our six tests … This should get us through today, and with any luck comment and follow-up would carry us through tomorrow. Friday might be a short day at the UN anyway. But it would be good to publish the Road Map then."

343. The US proposed a meeting. Sir David and Dr Rice also discussed the timings of a US ultimatum to Saddam Hussein to leave, the UK Parliamentary debate and the beginning of military action.

US CONCERNS ABOUT UK DIPLOMATIC ACTIVITY

345. Secretary Powell subsequently contacted Mr Straw to express concerns about the UK's activity in New York.

346. Mr Straw told Sir Jeremy Greenstock not to table the UK's revised draft resolution, only a "non-paper" setting out "six tests".

347. After Mr Blair's conversation with President Bush, Mr Straw spoke three times to Secretary Powell.

348. In their first conversation at 4.30pm, Secretary Powell asked for clarification of Sir Jeremy Greenstock's instructions in the light of his activity on a new resolution. Mr Straw explained that Secretary Rumsfeld's intervention had "complicated matters" in the UK:

> "We now had to go even further to show we were pursuing an alternative to automatic war. Greenstock's instructions came from himself and the Prime Minister. He had already spoken to Ivanov and Alvear [Mrs Soledad Alvear, the Chilean Foreign Minister] about the new draft."[112]

349. Following further discussion about the US position that the UN route was exhausted and their concerns about the UK activity in the UN, Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that "nonetheless it was important to go through the motions". The chance of success was "one per cent" but "if Jeremy succeeded we would have to go for it". Mr Straw added: "But there was a ninety nine per cent chance that this would simply be for PR."

350. The letter reporting the conversation was sent to Sir David Manning and copied to Sir Jeremy Greenstock, Mr Brenton, Sir Michael Jay, FCO Permanent Under Secretary (PUS), and Mr Ricketts.

351. The Government has been unable to find any record of the second conversation.[113]

352. In a third conversation at 6pm, Secretary Powell reiterated concern about Sir Jeremy Greenstock's activity at the UN and the risks if people thought a real effort was under way which was then brought to an abrupt end on 17 March.[114]

[114] Letter McDonald to Manning, 12 March 2003, 'Foreign Secretary's Conversation with US Secretary of State 12 March'.

353. Mr Straw reassured Secretary Powell that, since their first conversation, Mr Simon McDonald, his Principal Private Secretary, had spoken to Sir Jeremy "to ask him to push but not too hard". In the light of Secretary Powell's continuing concern, Mr Straw "repeated that there was only a one percent chance of success but it gave us room to make the case here".

354. Separately, Mr Straw spoke to Sir Jeremy Greenstock, who was with Ambassador Negroponte, to ask him "not formally to introduce anything this afternoon but to say that we were consulting about the six tests which had already been made public".

355. Mr Brenton reported that the US Administration's "impatience" was "growing over the delay at the UN", and that:

- "However much they want to help us obtain UN backing, they are equally determined to get on with the job of tackling Saddam. Minds are increasingly moving in the direction of abandoning the diplomatic pursuit of the 'undecided six', and focusing instead on firming up a coalition of the willing."
- The latest opinion polls showed "increased impatience with the UN process, with some 55 percent … prepared to support a war without a new UNSCR. Chirac in particular is seen as the villain of the piece for threatening an unreasonable veto under all circumstances."
- A White House spokesman had told the daily press conference that President Bush "was confident that the UK would be with the US in the endeavour to disarm Saddam from a military point of view".[115]

356. Mr Brenton had been told by senior US officials that President Bush would have washed his hands of the Security Council long ago, but he was determined that, whatever, "within reason", Mr Blair needed, he should get. That included the possibility of UN discussions continuing into the following week if necessary. It did not, however, extend to movement on the operational timetable. He had been advised that there was no US willingness to shift the dates to assist a process which seemed to be going nowhere.

SECURITY COUNCIL OPEN DEBATE, 11 AND 12 MARCH 2003

357. At the request of Malaysia, representing the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM), the Security Council held an open debate on the "situation between Iraq and Kuwait" on 11 and 12 March.[116] More than 50 speakers contributed to the debate, but no member of the Council spoke.

[116] UN Security Council, '4717th Meeting Tuesday 11 March 2003' (S/PV.4717).

358. Mr Mohamed Aldouri, Iraqi Permanent Representative to the UN, who spoke at the beginning and end of the debate, stated that:

- The US and UK had propagated "falsehoods and untrue allegations" about "Iraq's compliance and implementation of the relevant Security Council resolutions".
- Ninety-five percent of the disarmament tasks had been completed between 1991 and 1994.
- Dr Blix had reported on 7 March that Iraq was "proactively co-operating".
- There were "no obstacles" to inspections, which were "serious, effective and immediate".
- Iraq had recently unilaterally declared its missile programme and was destroying the Al Samoud 2 missiles which UNMOVIC had deemed to be proscribed.
- None of the "allegations" presented to the Council by Secretary Powell on 5 February had "proved to be true".
- The most recent "intelligence report produced by the UK" (the No.10 dossier 'Iraq – Its Infrastructure of Concealment, Deception and Intimidation' – see Section 4.3), contained previously published information.
- It was important for Iraq to view the "clusters" document presented on 7 March "in order to implement" the main tasks required "as soon as possible and to study such questions and answer them".
- Recent allegations about RPVs were unfounded. They were small experimental aircraft which had been examined by the inspectors.

359. In both his opening and closing statements, Mr Aldouri stated that Iraq had "taken the strategic decision" to rid itself of weapons of mass destruction. In his concluding statement, he warned that war would bring "incalculable catastrophe", and asked for time to provide what evidence Iraq could to the international community to prove it had no weapons of mass destruction. He appealed to the Security Council not to "stand idly by" in the face of the "clear, present and serious" threat to Iraq.

360. A number of states supported the draft resolution tabled by the US, UK and Spain, giving Iraq a deadline, including Kuwait, Australia and Japan. The majority, however, argued that inspections should be given more time in an effort to avoid war.

PRESENTATION OF THE UK'S POSITION

361. UK diplomatic posts were informed that the UK was "working flat out for a second resolution", and there was a possibility of a short extension of the deadline of 17 March.

362. On the evening of 12 March, Mr Edward Chaplin, FCO Director Middle East and North Africa, sent out a personal telegram to Heads of UK Missions, informing them that:

> "All efforts from the Prime Minister downwards are focused on securing at least nine positive votes for a second SCR. To help the middle ground of the Council, we have amended our original draft [resolution] to include an ultimatum (currently 17 March, with a possibility of further softening) and are discussing some tests designed to show whether Iraq is prepared to make a strategic decision to comply fully with the Security Council's demands."[117]

363. The telegram summarised the tests and stated:

> "The hope is that these objective tests, plus a short extension of the 17 March deadline, might deliver positive votes from Mexico and Chile. With their support, plus positive votes from Bulgaria (certain), the three Africans (reasonably secure), Pakistan (not so certain) we would have the nine positive votes required …
> "The threat of vetoes by France, Russia and perhaps even China is real. It remains to be seen if they will take this step if they are convinced that nine positive votes are in the bag. But Chirac has virtually committed himself to a veto in any circumstances, and the Russian line is firmly against any automatic recourse to force. The final denouement in New York will be before the end of the week …"

364. The telegram stated that decisions on UK participation in military action would "depend on the outcome in New York and a debate and vote in the House of Commons, likely to be on 17 March".

365. Heads of Mission were told that the telegram was for "background"; and that:

> "… in any private conversation, even with trusted interlocutors, you should not speculate but rest for the moment on the fact that we are working flat out for a second resolution which reunites the Council and puts the pressure back where it belongs, on Iraq."

366. Mr Chaplin added that if the resolution passed "and assuming the Iraqi regime fails the tests set for it (there is absolutely no sign of Saddam Hussein preparing a U-turn), we can assume military action would follow quickly after the expiry of the ultimatum". If the resolution did not pass, the timetable was "much more uncertain". The Americans would "not want to delay long". Mr Straw had decided that the UK "would not want to get ahead of US travel advice" which would "squeeze the time available for UK citizens [in the region] who want to get out".

367. Mr Chaplin commented that Heads of Mission had been receiving "plenty of guidance in the form of ministerial statements and reports from UKMIS New York on the negotiations" on the second resolution, but they "might like a bit more of the flavour as we enter the end game". Events were "moving pretty fast" and they should not be "surprised" if the guidance was "a little out of date by the time you read it".

CONSULTATIONS ON UK PROPOSALS TO IDENTIFY KEY TESTS FOR IRAQ

368. As agreed by Mr Blair and Mr Straw, the UK's draft tests were circulated in a meeting of Security Council members late on 12 March where they attracted a mixed response. It was recognised that the UK was making "a real effort" to find a way forward; but there was "no breakthrough".

369. France, Germany and Russia focused on UNMOVIC's identification of key disarmament tasks and a work programme, as required by resolution 1284 (1999).

370. Dr Blix said UNMOVIC would be seeking comments on its proposals on 14 March.

371. The UK circulated its draft side statement setting out the six tests to a meeting of Security Council members in New York on the evening of 12 March.[118] The draft omitted an identified date for a deadline and included the addition of a final clause stating that:

> "The United Kingdom reserves its position if Iraq fails to take the steps required of it."

372. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told Council members that the UK "non-paper", setting out six tasks to be achieved in a 10-day timeline, responded to an approach from the undecided six (U-6) looking for a way forward.[119]

373. Sir Jeremy said he had consulted Dr Blix and Dr Perricos, but the list was the responsibility of the UK, which was:

> "… anxious to preserve the possibility of a peaceful solution and had been distressed by the failure of the Security Council to find a formula around which the Council could group without vetoes.
> "I was asking all Council members without exception if this was an opportunity we could take. If there was traction we would be willing to consider dropping OP3 of our draft resolution. But if the Council did not see this as a way through, the co-sponsors would stick with the current draft and the package was null and void.
> "There was a placeholder in the non-paper for a date – 17 March remained and I had no other date to offer. But clearly 17 March was approaching fast and was not consistent with a 10 day timeline for the tests if the idea was taken up. The discussion of dates would have to be set against the realities – there was no great scope for moving to the right.

"I suggested a further session the following day to get more considered reactions."

374. Sir Jeremy reported that the points made by the representatives of the other Permanent Members of the Council were:

- Mr Sergei Lavrov, Russian Permanent Representative to the UN, said that "Russia had not changed its position: they could not accept automaticity or ultimata" and the "10-day deadline was too short". He "questioned how the UK's tasks" related to the "key remaining disarmament tasks and the work programme" required by resolution 1284 which would be issued the following week.
- Ambassador Negroponte "said it was clear the UK was going the extra mile to find a basis for an agreed approach. The proposal should be seriously considered especially if it strengthened the prospects for Council unity."
- Mr Wang Yingfan, Chinese Permanent Representative to the UN, "felt confused". Would the UK approach "wipe the slate – and material breach – clean for Iraq?" He "doubted the timeline was feasible".
- Mr Jean-Marc de La Sablière, French Permanent Representative to the UN, "said France had always been interested in an approach based on benchmarks – but this had to be in the context of the work programme and key remaining tasks" required by resolution 1284. "Benchmarks also had to be completely separate from any ultimatum." He "thought we could have disarmament in a limited time without inspections" but "the UK approach did not allow" Council unity to be preserved.

375. Points raised by the representatives of other members of the Council included:

- Mr Gunter Pleuger, German Permanent Representative to the UN, "pleaded for time to discuss the proposal in detail", and asked about the status of the paper, what would be the purpose of the draft resolution without OP3 and whether it "made sense to set some tasks now when the 1284 key remaining tasks would be issued soon and subsume them".
- Mr Aguilar Zinser, Mexican Permanent Representative to the UN, was "effusive" about the initiative. He said that the Council "would have to devote time to studying the proposal". He questioned the "relationship with the 1284 tasks; the timeframe … proposed; the role of UNMOVIC and IAEA in verifying compliance; whether the tests would be collectively assessed; the connection with the resolution; and whether the use of force would be conditioned". He had been asked to set out his Government's reservations. "They still did not see a way out of the difficulties in the Council nor elements allowing consensus and understanding. They still did not have a final position on the draft resolution."
- Mr Mamady Traoré, Guinean Permanent Representative to the UN and President of the Council, was "happy" that the UK "had made this attempt to reach consensus".

- Mr Mikhail Wehbe, Syrian Permanent Representative to the UN, said the UK's "non-paper made matters even worse as it included warnings over and above those in 1441 as well as multiple ultimata".
- Mr Stefan Tafrov, Bulgarian Permanent Representative to the UN, "felt this was a genuine effort at consensus that would need some time to digest".
- Mr Martin Belinga Eboutou, Cameroonian Permanent Representative to the UN, "thought this might open a path to bringing forward the different viewpoints".
- Mr Munir Akram, Pakistani Permanent Representative to the UN, asked "a host of questions" and said "he had always envisaged a 'credibility test' that would show peaceful disarmament was possible"; but Pakistan had seen that as the "first instalment and as deriving from the 1284 key tasks".
- Mr Ismael Gaspar Martins, Angolan Permanent Representative to the UN, "saw value in the paper and liked the idea of disarmament in instalments".
- Mr Juan Gabriel Valdés, Chilean Permanent Representative to the UN, "welcomed this effort addressing the concerns many had recently expressed". He would divulge his country's views the following day.
- Mr Arias said the approach "was a positive way of achieving consensus". He "supported the concept and content".

376. Dr Blix said UNMOVIC would be sending its draft of the key tasks required by resolution 1284 to the College of Commissioners that evening for comment by 14 March. The tasks would be ready the following week. It was for the Council to decide whether it agreed with the tasks selected.

377. Sir Jeremy reported that Dr Blix had:

> "… said there had been recent discussion of how to continue exerting pressure, of which military pressure was the most important element. There was the concept of a "strategic decision" by Iraq …
> "He understood the UK was asking for a commitment from Iraq along with a down-payment. While they might not be formulated identically, all the questions raised by the UK figured in the key remaining disarmament tasks … The statement by Saddam Hussein was none of UNMOVIC's business while interviews outside Iraq was an element of the work programme. Progress on missiles could be speeded up.
> "How far Iraq would be able to do the rest, he did not know. UNMOVIC's judgement was that these tasks were doable. This was not possible in two days. As for 10 days, he did not think he could guarantee Iraq would do it but UNMOVIC would report on what had been done in the time set by the Council but not offering a judgement.
> "As we reached the end of the period, there might be another batch of tests so to continue and renew the pressure on Iraq to deliver the fastest disarmament possible."

378. Sir Jeremy stated that the Council "had to be clear that the ship of the Security Council was heading for an iceberg". The UK's proposal:

> "… was a repair job … The whole point was to avoid military action. We could not go blindly on with 1284 without the crucial missing ingredient – Iraq's full and willing co-operation."

379. Addressing specific questions that had been raised, the points made by Sir Jeremy included:

- "The UK would take yes for an answer if the tests were completed in their totality. The tests were not impossible and would make it blindingly obvious if Iraq had taken a strategic decision to disarm …"
- "[W]e might not have to vote as early as 14 March if there was traction … If there was no traction we would likely vote on 14 March on the current text."
- "The co-sponsors … had agreed on the package and wanted to see the Council's response."
- "[T]he more people who joined us the more the judgement of compliance would be a collective one. We valued the judgement of the inspectors, but it was for the members who signed up to the statement … to assess whether the tests had been satisfied. 1441 did not specify who would make the judgement on compliance – that was one of its ambiguities – but if the tests were collective, the UK had no problem with the judgement being collective".
- "[W]ithout OP3 our resolution would not be an ultimatum …"
- "[I]f there was traction on this idea, the UK would be committed to getting maximum time. But it was not possible at this stage to give a firm date and the flexibility for extra time was very limited …"

380. France, Germany and Russia had all responded that the draft resolution, "even without OP3", would still authorise force. Sir Jeremy replied that:

> "… without OP3, the resolution would be a restatement of resolution 1441 … There was no way out of the dilemma … unless we delivered Iraqi co-operation. We were trying to offer a means of doing that. We had to rally, not to camp on national positions."

381. Sir Jeremy commented that the initiative had resulted in:

- genuine expressions of warmth from the U-6 for taking them seriously;
- recognition that the UK had made a real effort to find a way through for the Council;
- discomfiture of the negative forces, who sounded plaintive and inflexible in their questioning;
- reasonable support from Blix, who did more than not disown us (though he could have been more helpful on the timeline); and

- finally, a bit of time. I can keep this going at least until the weekend."

But:

- the UK had not achieved "any kind of breakthrough. The French, Germans and Russians will undoubtedly home in on the preambular section of the draft resolution and on the whiff of ultimatum in the side statement"; and
- there were "serious questions about the available time", which the US would "not help us to satisfy".

382. Sir Jeremy concluded that informal consultations would resume the following afternoon. He did "not think he needed detailed instructions if we continue down this track for a further day or two, but grateful for comments and telling arguments on where we have reached so far".

FRENCH CONCERNS ABOUT THE UK PRESENTATION OF PRESIDENT CHIRAC'S REMARKS

383. France registered its concerns about the way in which the UK Government was describing President Chirac's comment about a veto.

384. In addition to his conversation with Mr Rycroft that morning (described earlier in this Section), Mr Errera called on Mr Ricketts on the evening of 12 March for "a private talk on where things stood" between the UK and France on Iraq.[120]

385. Mr Ricketts reported to Sir John Holmes that Mr Errera had remonstrated "about how British Ministers had misconstrued President Chirac's comments", and that he [Ricketts] had responded by pointing out the prominence of the quote on the front page of Le Monde. He and Mr Errera had:

> "… agreed fairly quickly that the immediate crisis would play out with France and the UK on different positions, and that the more productive thing was to look ahead, and consider what lessons we should learn from recent events …"

386. Mr Errera had assumed "that the UK would not want to go through again what we had been put through in recent weeks by the Americans"; "nor would it be so easy for the UK to claim that our policy of close alliance gave us real traction over US policy".

387. Mr Ricketts responded that Iraq had shown up:

> "… very starkly a difference of threat perception, with the UK, Spain, Italy and some others … genuinely believing that the threat of WMD in the hands of a regime like Iraq, in a world inhabited by the likes of Al Qaida, was a worse prospect than the risks of military action to deal with it … Ministers were genuinely convinced of the rightness of the policy, it was not poodleism …"

[120] Letter Ricketts to Holmes, 13 March 2003, 'France and Iraq'.

388. In response to Mr Ricketts' attempt to focus on issues after the conflict and wider US/European relations, Mr Errera stated that "the Americans were determined to divide and rule"; and that they expected "unquestioning support for whatever was their policy objective of the moment".

389. Mr Ricketts "disputed the model", commenting that "a bit more modesty" in European ambitions for a common foreign and security policy "might not be a bad thing". Mr Errera "did not have any new thoughts on how a different transatlantic relationship could be constructed in the light of Iraq beyond the need to strengthen Europe".

390. Mr Ricketts concluded that Mr Errera was "keen to keep channels open despite the difficulties"; and that he had given the same message.

391. A copy of the letter from Mr Ricketts was sent to Sir David Manning.

JIC ASSESSMENT, 12 MARCH 2003

392. The Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) continued to warn in March that the threat from Al Qaida would increase at the onset of military action against Iraq.

393. The JIC also warned that:

- Al Qaida activity in northern Iraq continued; and
- Al Qaida might have established sleeper cells in Baghdad, to be activated during a US occupation.

394. On 12 March, the JIC produced a further update on the implications for international terrorism of military action in Iraq.[121]

395. In its Key Judgements, the JIC stated:

- The threat from Al Qaida will increase at the onset of military action against Iraq. Attack plans in the time-frame of a potential conflict are probably now going ahead under the control of lower-level operational leaders, but Khalid Sheikh Muhammad's capture may lead to postponement or abandonment of at least some terrorist plans.
- The greatest threat to Western interests from Islamist terrorists is in the Middle East. South-East Asia and East Africa are the most likely regions for attack outside the Middle East, although Al Qaida retains a strong determination to mount attacks in the US and UK.
- Al Qaida and sympathisers may well attempt chemical or biological terrorist attacks in the Gulf, including against UK civilian targets there, in the event of war with Iraq.

[121] JIC Assessment, 12 March 2003, 'International Terrorism: War with Iraq: Update'.

- Al Qaida terrorists in the Kurdish Autonomous Zone (KAZ) previously noted testing and producing chemical and biological substances remain active and are likely to attack Coalition forces.
- Senior Al Qaida associated terrorists may have established sleeper cells in Iraq, to be activated during a Coalition occupation.
- Iraq continues to prepare for terrorist attacks against Western interests in the Middle East, Europe, South-East Asia and elsewhere, although the regime's capability remains limited, especially beyond the Middle East."

396. Other key elements from the Assessment are set out in the Box below.

JIC Assessment, 12 March 2003: 'International Terrorism: War with Iraq: Update'

Islamist terrorists

- There was "a substantial body of reporting of plans by Al Qaida and other Islamist terrorists for attacks in the Middle East".
- "Arrests of extremists involved in chemical/biological (CB) attack plans in Bahrain may have reduced the threat of an attack there linked to conflict with Iraq. But the full distribution of instructions for making CB devices has yet to be uncovered […]"
- "A substantial body of reporting (much of which is also uncorroborated) suggests targeting against UK and US interests."
- Al Qaida retained "a strong determination to mount attacks in both countries".

Islamist terrorists in Iraq

- Reporting since 10 February had suggested that the senior Al Qaida associate, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, had "established sleeper cells in Baghdad, to be activated during a US occupation of the city".
- It was "possible" that the sleeper cells had "received CB materials from terrorists in the KAZ".
- "Whatever the precise relationship between al-Zarqawi and his DGI [Directorate of General Intelligence] contacts", it was "unlikely that he could conduct activities in Iraq without the knowledge (and probably the support) of the regime".

Conclusion

- "Despite serious setbacks for Al Qaida, and some disruption of terrorist activity, especially in the Middle East, the threat from Islamist terrorism in the event of war with Iraq remains high, with continuing evidence of attack planning. We can expect Al Qaida to persist with plans for at least one major attack to coincide with an outbreak of hostilities, as well as widespread attempts at low-level attacks by extremist groups and individuals worldwide, especially in the Middle East, Africa and South-East Asia."
- The JIC judged that the threat from Al Qaida remained "greater than any terrorist threat from Iraq".

Events of 13 March 2003

397. Mr Blair saw both Mr Cook and Ms Short before Cabinet on 13 March to discuss their concerns.

398. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that, in the context of preparations for meetings with Mr Cook and Ms Short:

> "JP [John Prescott] emphasised how important it was to make clear today was not the final Cabinet before any action, that there would be another one if the UN process collapsed. The political argument that we needed now was that the French had made it more not less likely that there would be conflict. This was the way some of our MPs could come back … Jack [Straw] agreed to go out and do clips [for the media] on the French."[122]

399. Mr Cook wrote in his memoir that he told Mr Blair before Cabinet on 13 March that his mind was made up (to resign if the UK went ahead without a second resolution), but he would not make a public move while Blair was "still working for a result at the UN".[123]

400. Mr Cook wrote that his impression was that Mr Blair was "mystified as to quite how he had got into such a hole and baffled as to whether there was any way out other than persisting in the strategy that has created his present difficulties".

401. In relation to press reports that Mr Blair had told Mr Duncan Smith that he now thought a second resolution "very unlikely", Mr Cook also wrote:

> "Since the fiction that Tony still hopes to get a second resolution is central to his strategy for keeping the Labour Party in check, it is not welcome news that IDS has told the world that not even Tony believes this."

402. Following Ms Short's interview with the BBC's Westminster Hour on 9 March, Mr Chakrabarti had written to Sir Andrew Turnbull on 11 March to explain Ms Short's position.[124]

403. Mr Chakrabarti described Ms Short's concerns as:

- The process of trying to obtain the second resolution "prior to military action should be fair and transparent". "That would include no undue pressure on the smaller SC members; allowing enough time (perhaps until the end of March) after voting on a new resolution for the process of an ultimatum to run its course; an objective judgment about whether Iraq had complied with any ultimatum

(which the proposed tests would help with); and a clear legal opinion about the circumstances under which military action without a further resolution could meet the UK Government's commitment to respect international law."

- "Early and public agreement with the USA on a UN SC mandate for the civil administration and reconstruction of Iraq", which would "almost certainly require" Mr Blair's personal involvement with President Bush. DFID understood that "it would be illegal for us, the UN and many other donors to get involved in the reform of Iraqi institutions and reconstruction of the country (beyond what is needed for the delivery of immediate humanitarian assistance under our Hague and Geneva Convention obligations) without a further … UNSC mandate. The absence of agreement with the US on this is holding up international planning and the prospects of burden sharing."
- It would be "highly desirable" for Mr Blair to meet Mr Annan "soon and more often". That "would send a clearer signal of the certainty we attach to the UN role".
- The Quartet Road Map "should be published before any military action". Ms Short felt "strongly that now is the time" for Mr Blair to get President Bush to "sign up" to publication. Progress would "reduce the hostility to the West and tensions in the Arab world which our actions in Iraq risk provoking".

404. In relation to the need for a legal opinion, Mr Chakrabarti added:

> "I know DFID is not alone in wanting to see written advice from the Attorney General and/or Ministerial discussion about the legality of military action without the second UNSCR. It would be strongly desirable for the legal opinion, to cover the range of possible voting outcomes, to be put to Ministers before the end of the week. If that legal opinion gave backing to US/UK military intervention in the absence of a second resolution, Clare believes the Government would still need a discussion on the political merits of taking that course of action."

405. Mr Chakrabarti suggested that the Government's communications strategy might "make clearer the UK's concerns for the Iraqi people and the centrality of the UN in resolving the crisis, including through a strong role for the UN after any conflict".

406. Mr Chakrabarti also suggested that "more frequent and systematic discussion of these issues between senior ministers would be helpful". He understood that Mr Blair might ask senior ministers to meet more regularly if conflict started, but advised starting sooner, "given the scale and significance of the decisions being taken". In addition, Mr Blair and Ms Short needed "to talk more often, probably on a daily basis until negotiations on the second resolution are concluded". "Most of her concerns" were "agreed government policy", but she needed to be reassured that they would be "taken fully into account".

407. In her memoir, Ms Short wrote that when she arrived in her office on 11 March, Mr Chakrabarti and senior officials had "obviously been instructed by No.10 to try to get me in line".[125] They had also "been asked to find out what it would take to make me stay". After discussion, they agreed that the conditions were:

"1. Publish Road Map [for the Middle East]
2. Absolute requirement UN mandate for reconstruction
3. UN mandate for military action."

408. Ms Short added that her diary also recorded:

> "Briefing from No.10 I had not raised these issues before. Shocking! Raised at every Cabinet and at a series of private meetings with TB."

409. Mr Blair told Ms Short that President Bush had "promised a UN mandate for reconstruction" and that her position on the Road Map might help him with President Bush. In response to a request from Ms Short that he should "try a process at UN that treats UN with respect not just forcing US timelines", Mr Blair "said he could get more time".

CABINET, 13 MARCH 2003

410. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 13 March that work continued in the UN to obtain a second resolution and, following the French decision to veto, the outcome remained open.

411. Mr Blair indicated that difficult decisions might be required and promised a further meeting at which Lord Goldsmith would be present.

412. Mr Straw told Cabinet that Iraq continued to be in material breach of resolution 1441 and set out his view of the legal position.

413. Mr Straw told Cabinet that there was "good progress" in gaining support in the Security Council and described President Chirac's position as "irresponsible".

414. The position presented to Cabinet by Mr Blair and Mr Straw did not acknowledge the reservations expressed by the non-permanent members of the Council. The limited time available for a decision, dictated by US decisions on the military timetable, meant that it would be very difficult to secure nine votes in support of the UK proposals.

415. Nor did Mr Blair and Mr Straw acknowledge the concern that, if there were nine votes in support of the resolution, China and Russia, as well as France, might exercise their vetoes.

[125] Short C. An Honourable Deception: New Labour, Iraq and the Misuse of Power. The Free Press, 2004.

416. Cabinet was not informed of the strategy Mr Blair had agreed with President Bush to manage the issue until 17 March.

417. There was no discussion of the options available to the UK if the attempt to secure a second resolution failed.

418. Mr Gordon Brown, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Ms Short, whose responsibilities were directly engaged, had not seen Lord Goldsmith's legal advice of 7 March.

419. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 13 March that work continued in the UN to obtain a second resolution.[126] The UK had presented proposals for six "tests", "endorsed by Dr Blix", to judge whether Saddam Hussein had decided to commit himself to disarmament. Satisfying those tests would not mean that disarmament was complete, but that the first steps had been taken. The non-permanent members of the Security Council were uncomfortable with a situation where "following the French decision to veto", the Permanent Members were "not shouldering their responsibilities properly". The "outcome in the Security Council remained open". If the United Nations process broke down, difficult decisions would be required and there would be another Cabinet meeting at which the Attorney General would be present.

420. Mr Blair also stated that the MEPP needed to be "revived"; and that "the reconstruction of Iraq after a conflict would need a United Nations Security Council resolution". The US had "now agreed" to that, which would "help to bring countries with divergent views on military action back together again".

421. Mr Straw said that although there were differences between members of the Security Council, "none was saying that Iraq was complying with its international obligations"; and that it "followed that Iraq continued to be in material breach" of those obligations.

422. On the legal basis for military action, Mr Straw said that he "was already on record setting out the position to the Foreign Affairs Committee" on 4 March. Mr Straw rehearsed the negotiating history of resolution 1441 (2002), stating that:

- "the French and Russians had wanted a definition of what would constitute a material breach, but had settled for the facts being presented to the Security Council";
- "they had also wanted a statement that explicit authorisation was required for military action and instead had settled for further consideration by the Security Council …"; and
- failure by Iraq to comply with resolution 1441 "revived the authorisations existing" in resolutions 678 (1990) and 687 (1991).

[126] Cabinet Conclusions, 13 March 2003.

423. Mr Straw noted that the Government's supporters had "a clear preference" for a second resolution but that "had not been seen as an absolute necessity". There had been "good progress" in New York in "gaining the support of uncertain non-permanent members of the Security Council, including Mexico and Chile".

424. Mr Straw described Mr Chirac's public assertion that "France would veto in any circumstances" as "utterly irresponsible"; and that Mr Annan was "equally unhappy" with that development.

425. Mr Straw's sense was that there was "growing understanding for the Government's case" in the House of Commons.

426. In the discussion, the points made included:

- the integrity of the UN process should be respected and enough time allowed for Saddam Hussein to meet the tests;
- the French veto was significant because "it implied that France would never be prepared to use force"; its approach "amounted to dismissing the evidence and insisting on indefinite delay". The French position had "undermined the unity" of the Security Council;
- a majority of the members of the European Union supported the UK line;
- a "balance had to be struck between striving" for a second resolution and "being prepared to do without it if that was the outcome of negotiations". It would be "easier" to make the "political, moral and legal case" if such a resolution could be achieved;
- although the rhetoric used by the US leadership was "sometimes unpopular", that "did not mean that their policy was wrong". President Bush had made more use of the UN than his predecessor and he had publicly committed the US to a two-state solution in the Middle East;
- the "atmosphere in the Middle East and more generally would be transformed for the better" if the United States could be persuaded to publish the Road Map for the MEPP; and
- UN authority for the reconstruction of Iraq was "essential so that all countries and international institutions could contribute".

427. Summing up the discussion, Mr Blair said that there had been welcome progress in the Middle East with the appointment of a Palestinian Prime Minister. That called for a positive response by the US. The French position "looked to be based on a calculation of strategic benefit". It was "in contradiction of the Security Council's earlier view that military action would follow if Iraq did not fully and unconditionally co-operate with the inspectors". The UK would "continue to show flexibility" in its efforts to achieve a second resolution and, "if France could be shown to be intransigent, the mood of the Security Council could change towards support for the British draft".

428. Cabinet: "Took note."

429. Mr Cook wrote in his memoir:

> "When we began, Gordon launched a long and passionate statement of support for Tony's strategy. The contribution was rather marred by an outspoken attack on France: 'the message that must go out from this Cabinet is that we pin the blame on France for its isolated refusal to agree in the Security Council'."[127]

430. Mr Cook added that he had reminded colleagues that "when this is over, the first priority must be to repair the divisions in Europe" and that the Government should not make that job more difficult by sending out messages that attack France or any other European country". He had "applauded" the "ingenuity" of Mr Blair, Mr Straw and Sir Jeremy Greenstock in finding new initiatives but stated that "the intensity of our efforts to get agreement in the Security Council means that we cannot now pretend that it does not really matter if we fail to get agreement". Mr Cook had warned that the Government "should avoid saying that we will take military action even if we fail to get a resolution, as we need some flexibility to consider what we do if we find ourselves in that position".

431. Ms Short wrote that she had asked for "a special Cabinet with the Attorney General present" and that had been agreed.[128] She had also said, "if we have UN mandate, possible progress on Palestine /Israel and try with the second resolution process, it would make a big difference". She was "hopeful of progress".

432. Ms Short added:

- "GB spoke animatedly about what France was saying – no to everything."
- "Jack Straw also anti-France."
- "David Blunkett [the Home Secretary] said we must stand by the PM and Chirac was reckless …"

433. Ms Short had been advised by Mr Chakrabarti that she should focus her intervention in Cabinet on the need for "a proper decision making process", which would be "important both in substance and … for the politics". In his view, there were two key points to make:

- "Cabinet needs to discuss now the legal opinion of the Attorney General and how to make it public. This is vital for Ministers, our armed services and the civil service."

- "As soon as we are clear on the second resolution (whether it fails to get the necessary votes or is not put to a vote), Cabinet should meet again for a discussion on the politics and to put a proposition to Parliament for immediate debate."[129]

434. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that:

- Lord Williams of Mostyn, the Leader of the House of Lords and Attorney General from 1999 to 2001, had "said there would be a debate [in Cabinet] on the legality", and Ms Short had said Lord Goldsmith should be present. Mr Blair had "said of course he would".
- Mr Blair "said that the French had exposed fully how intransigent they were. Chirac's 'whatever the circumstances' was a mistake, and the wrong approach, and people were angry about it. They had also now rejected the basis of the tests we were proposing without any discussion or consideration. He felt Chirac's desire for a 'bipolar world' was leading him to turn away from discussion of any kind on this. He promised another discussion before a vote."
- Mr Brown "came in very strongly later on, on the French in particular".
- Mr Cook "said we should not 'burn our bridges' with the French, made clear that there must be a legal base for action, there was no political case without a second resolution and we must keep working for it".
- Ms Short "said we needed the Road Map published, lambasted the 'megaphone diplomacy' but as ever gave the impression that it was just us and the Americans who engaged in it. She said the world community was split because the Americans were rushing. We should not be attacking the French but coming up with a different kind of process. 'If we can get the Road Map, we can get the world reunited behind it.'"[130]

435. Mr Campbell commented that Mr Cook had spoken "very deliberately" and his intervention was "a very clear marker" that he would resign "if there was action without a second resolution. He felt we did not have the moral, diplomatic or humanitarian cover."

436. Ms Short told the Inquiry that the "strategy was: blame the French and claim that they'd said they would veto anything. And they said it at the Cabinet …"[131]

437. Sir Stephen Wall, Mr Blair's Adviser on European Issues and Head of the Cabinet Office European Secretariat 2000 to 2004, told the Inquiry that at Cabinet on 13 March:

> "As Tony Blair came into the room John Prescott stood up and saluted. It was a sort of funny moment but in I think in a rather characteristic way John Prescott was doing something quite clever. He was saying 'You are the Commander in Chief and this is the time to rally to the flag'. People laughed but interestingly the atmosphere changed. Sitting at the back I had thought to myself 'This is going to be a difficult Cabinet', and it wasn't."[132]

438. Asked by the Inquiry why he had decided to continue the negotiations and whether that was "not in particularly good faith", Mr Blair replied:

"No. It was very simply this, that obviously this was a second best thing now … but what we decided was … even if you can't get the resolution because they have said they will veto, nonetheless you would have some greater, if you like, political authority if you could at least get a majority of members of the Security Council to say they would agree such a resolution even vetoed."[133]

439. Asked whether a vetoed resolution would have undermined the authority for military action in resolution 1441, Mr Blair said:

"No, it would not have undermined that because we were saying that we accept that we believed we had authority in 1441, but it would have allowed us politically to say we had the majority of the Security Council. So had we ended up in a situation where Chile and Mexico had said 'We are with you'. We would probably have put this resolution down, had it vetoed."[134]

FRANCE'S POSITION

440. In a statement on 13 March, Mr de Villepin rejected the UK's tests.

441. In a statement issued on 13 March, Mr de Villepin said that the UK proposals did "not address the issues raised by the international community".[135] The aim was "not to grant Iraq a few extra days before embarking on a path leading to the use of force, but to move resolutely forward on the peaceful disarmament route". Inspections were "a credible alternative to war" and were "producing results" as Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei had "pointed out in the 7 March report". In the "spirit" of resolution 1441, France wanted "a realistic timeframe in which to achieve effective disarmament". Success would "demand" Iraq's "full and wholehearted co-operation".

442. In subsequent interviews for French media, Mr de Villepin stated that the UK proposal embraced "the idea of an ultimatum, of the automaticity of the recourse to force" which for France "was unacceptable".[136] He pointed out that the US had "a determining role" as it was "maintaining that the die is cast" and was "intent on moving towards a military intervention".

443. Mr Straw characterised France's position as "extraordinary".

444. In remarks to the press in Downing Street, Mr Straw said that he found it "extraordinary" that France had rejected the UK's proposals "without even proper consideration".[137] That made a peaceful resolution of the crisis "more difficult".

445. On 13 March, Sir David Manning asked Mr Rycroft for the full text of President Chirac's remarks of 10 March, which was circulated within No.10.[138]

446. President Chirac's Diplomatic Adviser, Mr Maurice Gourdault-Montagne, complained about the UK Government's "increasingly polemical approach", its interpretation of President Chirac's remarks out of context, and the difficulties with the UK tests.

447. Sir John Holmes robustly defended the UK position.

448. Mr Gourdault-Montagne telephoned Sir John Holmes at lunch time on 13 March "to complain about the increasingly polemical approach" the UK was taking.[139]

449. Mr Gourdault-Montagne stated that the UK approach "ran counter to the understanding hitherto that we should try to minimise the bilateral fall-out and avoid mutual or personalised criticism". France was "particularly upset by our repeated taking out of context … the President's remarks on the veto in all circumstances". The UK "must be well aware that he had been talking about the particular circumstances that evening … It was not reasonable to distort what he had said in this way." Mr Straw's reaction to Mr de Villepin's statement "had also seemed excessively sharp".

450. Sir John Holmes reported that he had responded that France:

> "… could hardly be surprised if it became harder to avoid criticism of the French position when they had spelled out their intention to veto the draft of their allies, apparently whatever it said. The French were doing everything they could to block us, not least in our attempt to give a last chance to Saddam to disarm peacefully and to achieve the second resolution which would reunite the international community and make international participation in the next stage easier. Villepin's statement … this morning attacking our proposals had been particularly hard to take."

451. Sir John stated that the UK "conditions" were taken from the UNMOVIC report and "were precisely the questions which needed answering if we were to conclude that Saddam Hussein had taken a strategic decision to disarm".

452. Mr Gourdault-Montagne responded by saying that the requirement that Saddam Hussein should appear on TV to apologise was "a nonsense". The UK "knew the Arab world better than that"; and the UK was "still on the line of an ultimatum with an absurdly short deadline". France's position had been "consistent and coherent throughout", and it had "warned" the UK "not to underestimate" its "determination to carry this position to its logical conclusion".

453. Sir John stated that he "respected the French right to have a different position, but there had been no need to go as far as a veto, and a deliberate move to declare it in advance to try to influence others against our ideas". He added that:

> "France seemed to be forgetting what was in 1441 – Saddam had to make an immediate and accurate declaration and co-operate fully and immediately … or face the consequences. He had done neither of these things. We could not simply let things drift."

454. Mr Gourdault-Montagne replied that "the inspectors had made clear that the process was working, even if co-operation was not total. In these circumstances, it was not right to rush to war." He repeated "in a spirit of friendship" that what the UK was doing "was against what the French had … thought was agreed between us. The French had been very careful to avoid any such thing …"

455. Sir John concluded that Mr Gourdault-Montagne "should appreciate the extent to which France had pushed her position against her closest allies was hard to understand". The UK "had offered to try to find common ground several times but to no avail".

456. Sir John also recorded that he had been told by the US Ambassador to France that "he had seen Mr de Villepin the previous evening to enquire what lay behind the President's words on the veto". Mr de Villepin "had claimed US and French positions were really quite close, but the problem was the lack of flexibility in the US stance". The Ambassador had advised him to speak to Secretary Powell and they had subsequently "spoken at length" but their "positions were too far apart … on timescale and automaticity" to reach agreement: "Like us, the Americans judged that Chirac was not really looking for a way out."

457. Sir John commented that it was:

> "Predictable that the French would react in this way. There is a clear danger of an upward spiral of polemics which could make working together afterwards harder. But our position can hardly surprise the French, nor the fact that we are using Chirac's words against him when the stakes are so high – he did say them, even if he may not have meant to express quite what we have chosen to interpret."

458. Mr de Villepin told Mr Straw that France was willing to look at an ultimatum as long as the Security Council was responsible for the final decision on action.

459. Mr Straw responded that France had made life very difficult for the UK.

460. In response to a suggestion that France and the UK should look for a point of compromise, Mr Straw replied that "the key decision had to be made in the Security Council" and "no one on 10 March had said that Saddam Hussein was complying with his obligations. He was therefore in further material breach."

461. Mr de Villepin also telephoned Mr Straw on 13 March. The record stated that he:

> "… said France was still willing to consider any new proposals … ready to discuss any solution based on benchmarks … [and] any timetable, even a reduced one, if that was 'satisfactory for you and the US'. His bottom line focused on automaticity. France could work on any mechanism which contained an ultimatum as long as it was the Security Council which took full responsibility at the end of any deadline."[140]

462. Mr Straw said that President Chirac's statement on 10 March that "France would vote against a second resolution 'whatever the circumstances' had caused great difficulties. It was clear that France would veto."

463. Mr de Villepin responded that President Chirac had "never said that"; he "had not meant that France would not try to find common ground"; nor "that, whatever happened, France would vote no". His comments had been "only in the context of text [of the draft resolution] on the table" on 10 March.

464. Mr Straw replied that:

> "… he had read the comments differently. It had made life very difficult in the US. They had assumed France would vote no in any circumstances. As a result they were now falling back on UNSCR 1441. The UK had, however, managed to keep dialogue going through the weekend. The UK had never said that 1441 contained automaticity … But the UK did not want Iraq stringing things out. If things went on too long, the military threat was degraded."

465. In response to a request from Mr de Villepin that they should look for "a point of compromise" with a meeting of the Security Council following a further report from the inspectors "perhaps in one month, two months or perhaps just three weeks", Mr Straw pointed out:

> "The key decision had to be made by the Security Council. The inspectors' role was to provide evidence, although others could too. It was clear that Iraq was in material breach. Though there were many different positions in the Security Council, no one on 10 March had said that Saddam Hussein was complying with his obligations. He was therefore in further material breach."

---

466. Later in the conversation, Mr Straw:

> "… briefly described the importance of the UK's new benchmarks. Unless Iraq realised it was facing its final, final chance, the international community would not get Iraq to face reality. Put bluntly, delay played into the hands of those in the US who said we should not go down the UN route. That said, he was happy to see new propositions at any time."

467. Mr de Villepin concluded that "a way forward could be found". Mr Straw replied that "there would have to be discussion of these issues at Heads of Government level, though not in New York".

468. The UK Embassy in Paris reported that Mr de Villepin had followed his rejection of the UK's proposals on 13 March with a briefing emphasising France's wish to find a solution leading to consensus in the Security Council and referring to his conversation with Mr Straw.[141]

469. Asked to confirm that France did not exclude an ultimatum, a senior French Foreign Ministry official had, however, been "adamant: any ultimatum that did not leave the final decision to the Security Council constituted a red line … The French were open to any solution that enabled inspections to continue." The official had claimed that a failed attempt to get a second resolution would annul the effects of the first resolution; the Council would have refused to authorise military intervention and any intervention would be outside the Charter and "at the limit of aggression".

470. The Embassy concluded that Mr de Villepin's position was "a tactical move intended to deflect criticism" of President Chirac's announcement of a veto "'whatever the circumstances": "It was too little, too late – and the French know it."

MINISTERIAL MEETING TO DISCUSS THE MILITARY PLAN

471. Mr Blair agreed the military plan later on 13 March.

472. On 13 March, Mr Blair held a meeting, with Mr Prescott, Mr Straw, Mr Hoon and Adm Boyce to discuss the timing of the start of the military campaign and formal approval of the military plan set out in Mr Watkins' letter of 11 March (see Section 6.2).[142] There was "a discussion about the timing of the end of the UN process … and the start of military action". It was agreed that Mr Blair would pursue the timing issues with President Bush.

473. Adm Boyce advised that:

> "… the full moon meant that a later start date […] would certainly be preferable, but that the projected date was not a show stopper. The US military shared the preference for a later date, but had been told to accept the earlier date."

474. Sir David Manning confirmed Mr Blair's approval for the plan in a letter to Mr Watkins the following day.[143]

475. Reflecting discussion at the JIC on 12 March, the Assessments Staff produced a JIC Note on Saddam Hussein's plan to defend Baghdad, on 13 March.[144] The detail of the JIC Note is addressed in Section 6.2.

MR BLAIR'S CONVERSATION WITH PRESIDENT BUSH, 13 MARCH 2003

476. Mr Blair and President Bush discussed withdrawing the resolution on 17 March followed by a US ultimatum to Saddam Hussein to leave within 48 hours. There would be no US military action until after the vote in the House of Commons on 18 March.

477. Mr Blair continued to press President Bush to publish the Road Map because of its impact on domestic opinion in the UK as well as its strategic impact.

478. Mr Blair also suggested their meeting in the next few days should produce "something" on the UN "angle" addressing post-conflict issues.

479. Mr Campbell spoke to Mr Bartlett about the proposed meeting between President Bush and Mr Blair.[145] President Bush was prepared to come to London but Mr Campbell (and Mr Blair) considered that was "not what we needed".

480. Sir David Manning told Dr Rice that Mr Blair was keen to have a meeting with President Bush and Mr Aznar but the weekend might be very difficult. The political situation in the UK:

> "… remained extremely tense … Condi [Dr Rice] should not underestimate the political pressure we were now under. There might be resignations from the Cabinet … We had a huge fight on our hands. We needed all the help we could get."[146]

Sir David emphasised the importance of the US publishing the Road Map to influence opinion in the UK.

481. Sir David and Dr Rice also agreed the need for experts to discuss the UK's proposals for the role of the UN in a post-conflict Iraq. The main area of debate was likely to be the relationship between a UN Co-ordinator and the military authorities. Sir David reported that "Washington wanted something that was more or less the reverse of the situation in Afghanistan where Brahimi [Mr Lakhdar Brahimi, Special Representative of the UN Secretary-General for Afghanistan and Head of the UN Assistance Mission in Afghanistan, October 2001 to December 2004] was pre-eminent and the military were subordinate".

482. Mr Blair and President Bush discussed the prospects for a vote in the House of Commons and a Road Map for the Middle East.[147] Mr Blair said that it would have considerable impact on political opinion in the UK. Later he commented on its "totemic significance" in the Middle East.

483. On the UN, Mr Blair commented that the "haggling over texts in New York was frustrating and muddied the waters. But it was buying the vital time we needed this weekend."

484. Mr Blair and President Bush also discussed the possibility of a meeting in the next few days. Mr Blair said that it would be useful if something on aftermath issues could emerge from that meeting "with a UN angle".

485. A discussion on the military timetable was reported separately.[148] That envisaged the withdrawal of the resolution on 17 March followed by a speech from President Bush which would give Saddam Hussein an ultimatum to leave within 48 hours. He (President Bush) would call for freedom for the Iraqi people and outline the legal base for military action.

486. There would be no military action before a vote in the UK Parliament on 18 March. President Bush would announce the following day that military action had begun. The main air campaign was planned to begin on 22 March.

487. In a conversation after the telephone call between Mr Blair and President Bush, Mr Bartlett advised Mr Campbell that the meeting had been postponed to 16 March, and they had agreed on the Azores as the venue.[149]

488. Mr Campbell wrote:

> "Bush said they could do the Road Map, give it to the Israelis and Palestinians once Abu Mazen [about to become Palestinian Prime Minister] accepts the position.
> "TB said that would make a big difference, anything up to fifty votes. 'It'll cost me 50,000', said Bush. TB said he had seen a group of 'wobbly MPs' who were all clear the Road Map would help. TB said it might also help him hang on to a couple of Cabinet Ministers. GWB [President Bush] suggested he might be better off without them. He clearly could not fathom why the Road Map mattered so much. He had been reluctant because of Arafat. He then said 'Tell Alastair, like I'm telling my boys, that I don't want to read a word about this until I've said it. It is in our interests that I come out and say this, and it's clear I mean it.'

"TB said the French thought they had lost the initiative and were getting worried. He felt we had to keep in very close touch with Mexico and Chile over the weekend. He was worried the French would come up with a counter-proposal and win them over."

489. Mr Campbell wrote:

"They kept going back to the Parliamentary arithmetic. TB said it was knife edge … He said I know you think I have gone mad about the Road Map but it really will help.

"Bush said that Rumsfeld had asked him to apologise to TB.

"He [Bush] said … After our vote, if we win, the order goes to Rumsfeld to get their troops to move. Ops begin. He said he would not be doing a declaration of war. Wednesday 8pm in the region … 'They go …' He intended to wait as long as possible before saying the troops were in action."[150]

490. In his memoir, Mr Blair wrote that he and President Bush were due to meet in the Azores on 16 March "partly to bind in Spain and Portugal who were both supportive and both of whose Prime Ministers were under enormous heat from hostile parliamentary and public opinion", and that:

"It was clear now that action was inevitable barring Saddam's voluntary departure. George had agreed to give him an ultimatum to quit. There was no expectation he would, however."[151]

DEVELOPMENTS IN NEW YORK, 13 MARCH 2003

491. Reporting developments in New York on 13 March, Sir Jeremy Greenstock warned that the UK tests had attracted no support, and that the US might be ready to call a halt to the UN process on 15 March.

492. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported overnight on 13/14 March that:

- In a meeting with the "undecided six" he had hosted, the "Latins [had] come down hard against the UK compromise package". The main objections had included the "perceived authorisation of force in the draft resolution" and a desire to wait for UNMOVIC's own list of key tasks which would issue early the following week.

- Mr Lavrov had argued that the resolution was not necessary given that the inspections were making progress; the side statement was based on an unproven premise that Iraq had WMD; contained an arbitrary timeframe (shorter than Blix's months); and unacceptably left the decision on whether Iraq fulfilled the tests with the member states. The Council should wait until the inspectors submitted the list of key tasks the following week.
- Mr de La Sablière had taken a similar position. France had "suspicions" that Iraq had WMD but it could not hand over weapons that did not exist.[152]

493. Sir Jeremy reported that he had "explained again":

> "There had to be a test of Iraqi willingness to comply. I did not think anyone thought that Iraqi compliance had been immediate, unconditional and active. We therefore needed a 'downpayment' or the contract of inspections could not continue. We were trying to create an alternative to the 'serious consequences' in 1441 … In the next 24 hours I would wish to discuss with all members of the Council … We had to maintain the two essential elements of 1441: pressure and the effective use of inspections. The pendulum had swung too far to inspections only. The intention of the draft was not to provide authorisation for the use of force. We already had sufficient authorisation in 1441 and related resolutions provided the conditions in 1441 were met."

494. In subsequent discussion, Sir Jeremy stated:

- the "tests were a 'downpayment' on whether Iraqi co-operation would be forthcoming";
- resolution "1441 was deliberately ambiguous on whether the Council or Member States would judge Iraqi compliance. We would want the inspectors to report on the facts"; and
- "the timeframe had to reflect the realities on the ground and the need for pressure on Iraq …"

495. In comments to the press after the meeting, Sir Jeremy emphasised the need for a strong signal of strategic change from Iraq and strict time limits based on resolution 1441 not resolution 1284.

496. In a subsequent telegram, Sir Jeremy commented that the US thought the benchmark process was "running out of steam", and that support from London would be needed. That:

> "… might take us through to the end of Friday. But by 15 March (if not before), I suspect that Washington will be ready to call a halt to the UN process, no doubt with some strong words about France and Russia."[153]

497. Dr Blix wrote that on 13 March Sir Jeremy had:

> "… tried desperately to win support for the British benchmark paper. If he got 'traction' on it, he could be flexible on a number of points, even altogether dropping the draft operative paragraph 3 or, indeed the whole draft resolution, which looked like an ultimatum. Although this step was presented as a last concession, the political signal of the benchmark paper standing alone would probably be seen as an ultimatum. It would be understood that if the declaration was not made and/or the benchmarks not attained, serious consequences could be expected."[154]

498. Asked by the Inquiry if he was aware in the second half of the week beginning 10 March that the Prime Minister and the President had decided on 12 March that the game was up; and that the UK would, for appearances' sake, continue negotiations in New York for a couple more days, and then withdraw the resolution, Sir Jeremy Greenstock replied "No".[155]

499. Sir Jeremy added that activity had "really stopped after Wednesday [12 March]" and that:

> "On Thursday morning, which was probably my most difficult day, I suspected that somebody would put down an alternative resolution, saying that the use of force should not be allowed, because we knew that the Mexicans and the Chileans were beginning to draft that …
> "… By Friday morning there was an eerie silence. Nothing was happening. We were not negotiating. Nobody was putting down anything against us. We knew that the allies were going to meet … at the weekend, and there was no negotiating going on in New York."

THE DIVISIONS IN THE SECURITY COUNCIL

500. Although there had been unanimous support for a rigorous inspections and monitoring regime backed by the threat of military force as the means to disarm Iraq when resolution 1441 was adopted, there was no such consensus in the Security Council in March 2003.

501. Although the Security Council had unanimously agreed resolution 1441 on 8 November, there were marked differences in the positions of the members of the Council, particularly between the five Permanent Members – China, France, Russia, the US and the UK, reflecting the history of the Security Council's role in relation to Iraq since 1991.

[154] Blix H. The Search for Weapons of Mass Destruction: Disarming Iraq. Bloomsbury Publishing Plc, 2005.
[155] Private hearing, 26 May 2010, pages 35-36.

502. As the preceding Sections of the Report show:

- France and Russia had consistently expressed reservations about US and UK policy on Iraq and the consequences of military action. In particular, they were concerned about the use of force without clear evidence that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction and without an explicit authorisation by the Security Council.
- Members of the Security Council had differing views of Iraq's position and whether or not its actions indicated a strategic decision to co-operate with the requirements of resolution 1441.

503. In his statement for the Inquiry, Sir Jeremy Greenstock wrote that:

- he had been in no doubt that France and Russia, accompanied consistently by Germany, would be fighting the UK all the way on the proposed second resolution;
- the US, the UK, Spain and Bulgaria were a "reasonably solid quartet";
- China and Syria "could not be expected to support the UK"; and
- much of the resistance in the Security Council to the UK's arguments revolved around the question "What is the hurry when the inspectors are just getting down to business again?"[156]

504. Sir Jeremy judged "with hindsight that most members of the Security Council would have opposed the use of force … on almost any timing unless the inspectors had succeeded in exposing Iraq's deception with the discovery of an active chemical or biological weapon".

505. Sir Jeremy told the Inquiry, "I never felt that we got close to having nine positive votes in the bag" and that when he was asked by London how many votes he felt were sure, he would say four:

> "I would never report it back to London that I had more than four sure votes."[157]

506. Sir Jeremy said that President Chirac's remarks on 10 March:

> "… made my life more difficult, because it made the 'undecided six', for instance, believe that we were now going through the motions of something that was not going to produce a result; therefore why should they do something unpopular with their public opinions at home in siding with the United States on attacking an Islamic country like Iraq, or whatever the reasons were domestically, when clearly the Security Council was not going to reach anything if a Permanent Member had pre-declared a veto?
> "So it did rather undercut the ground that we were on, yes."[158]

[157] Public hearing, 27 November 2009, page 71.
[158] Public hearing, 27 November 2009, page 88.

507. Asked whether President Chirac's statement was "simply saying what everybody already knew, and what to a degree had already been said by the French in public", Sir Jeremy replied:

> "Yes, but saying it at Presidential level very publicly changed the political effect of the French position on the rest of the Security Council."[159]

508. Sir Jeremy subsequently told the Inquiry that the effect of the statement had "considerably lessened" the chances of turning the middle-ground six round and "therefore it was quite an important turning point in the public politics".[160] President Chirac's statement had an impact "on the little tiny bit of momentum we still had in the Security Council with the middle ground".

509. Sir Jeremy stated that:

> "… we knew we had only a minority chance of achieving a second resolution … but with the United States in the game pulling out all the stops, you never quite know when countries opposing them may be pulled into another position."[161]

510. Asked what, at the beginning of the negotiation, he had thought the chances of success in the second resolution were, Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Inquiry: "Less than 50 percent."[162] Sir Jeremy added that hindsight discoloured his recollection but, "in my mind, between a quarter and a third of a chance that we might do this". He "wasn't advising London that we were likely to succeed".

511. Asked about his statement that the UK never had more than four firm votes, Sir Jeremy Greenstock replied:

> "Right at the end. We knew we had four. We were after those six to make it ten, the middle-ground members. Each of those six at some point during February, as they were being chased round by Baroness Amos and others, trying to persuade them in their capitals to follow us, said that they might do it or were going to follow us, and then backed off when they saw that the others weren't following. So we were herding cats unsuccessfully in that respect, and never got all six together to have confidence in each other's preparedness to do it."[163]

512. Sir David Manning did not think that the middle-ground six would have supported action in the timeframe that was under discussion:

> "… if there had been more time, I think that the six in the UN – their minds weren't necessarily closed … if you had got a different dynamic going in February, March, April between the leaders on the basis of whatever Blix was saying, and there seemed to be more common ground, then it was possible that you could have found some kind of common resolution."[164]

513. Asked whether Ministers had been over-optimistic in tabling the second resolution, thinking that France and Russia would agree to it, Sir John Holmes told the Inquiry:

"It was always an optimistic approach to think you would get a second resolution and you would get nine votes for it, as the struggle to get those votes demonstrated very clearly in the weeks that followed."[165]

514. Sir John Holmes stated that France thought the timelines and tests in the draft resolution were "deliberately impossible" for Saddam Hussein to pass and were "not a way of actually avoiding war but was simply a way of legitimising it".[166] That was why it was "so strongly opposed".

515. Asked if there were any circumstances in which France might have supported a second resolution authorising the use of force, Sir John said that, by that stage, "it would have taken something pretty dramatic", such as a find by the inspectors or reckless behaviour by Saddam Hussein, to change the mind of France.[167]

516. Mr Straw told the Inquiry that, before President Chirac's statement of 10 March, the UK had "got the three African states on board, we thought we had the Chileans and the Mexicans" although the negotiations were finely balanced.[168] The moment when he did not think it would be possible to achieve a second resolution was when he had "turned on the television" and seen "President Chirac saying that, whatever the circumstances, France would veto a second resolution".

517. Later, Mr Straw took a more qualified view:

"… our judgement was that we thought that the three African states were highly likely to support a resolution. The problem was between … Chile and Mexico and President Fox and President Lagos [each] looking over [his] … shoulder at the other one. My own view is – not that – in the absence of the Chirac 'veto' statement on 10 March, we would have got their support, but it would have been much more probable."[169]

518. Mr Straw also stated:

"… the great danger, which we felt we faced, was that, if you didn't bring this to a conclusion one way or the other quite quickly, then the whole strategy of diplomacy backed by the threat, and if necessary, the use of force, would fall away and that's what Saddam wanted."[170]

519. Mr Stephen Pattison, Head of the FCO UN Department, told the Inquiry:

"I am not sure that the American Administration was ever formally committed to a second resolution … I think … they were willing to let us have a go at trying … They certainly did not see a legal necessity for it and they, I think, obviously feared that it could only result in more complication at the UN Security Council."[171]

520. Asked whether that was his understanding, Mr Straw replied:

"That was, of course, the downside. That it might expose divisions rather than resolve them. I still with the benefit of hindsight think it was worth attempting the second resolution. We were elusively close, in my judgement, to getting those magic nine votes and no veto but it didn't happen. That was their concern. That said, the Americans, certainly Secretary Powell, were very assiduous in seeking to build up support for the second resolution. There are records that you will have seen where he reports he worked the phones with various people."[172]

521. In his memoir, Mr Straw wrote that the leaders of the African nations, Chile and Mexico "would not put their heads above the parapet knowing that France would veto 'whatever the circumstances'. The resolution was dying."[173]

522. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that the UK had come "pretty close" to a majority of votes; and that, "we could have got Chile and Mexico actually if the French position had been less emphatic".[174]

Events of 14 March 2003

523. In a minute of 14 March, Mr Jonathan Powell recorded that Mr Blair had agreed that he would start holding meetings of a "War Cabinet" from 19 March.[175]

524. The composition of the War Cabinet is addressed in Section 2.

PRESIDENT CHIRAC'S CONVERSATION WITH MR BLAIR

525. President Chirac asked Mr Blair on 14 March if Mr Straw and Mr de Villepin could discuss whether there was sufficient flexibility to find an agreed way forward. Mr Blair agreed.

526. Mr Blair had "insisted that it must be the Security Council" which decided whether Saddam Hussein had co-operated, not the inspectors.

527. President Chirac asked to speak to Mr Blair on 14 March.[176]

528. Drawing the report of Mr Straw's conversation with Mr de Villepin on 13 March to Mr Blair's attention before the telephone call with President Chirac, Sir David Manning wrote:

> "No surprises: will probably complain we are misrepresenting him; will offer new effort based on the shorter time line but no automaticity. You can certainly point to his frenetic efforts to block us at every turn."[177]

529. President Chirac told Mr Blair that France was "content to proceed 'in the logic of UNSCR 1441'; but it could not accept an ultimatum or any 'automaticity' of recourse to force".[178] He proposed looking at a new resolution in line with resolution 1441, "provided that it excluded these options".

530. Mr Blair "said that we needed clear, specific 'tests' to measure whether Saddam was co-operating". Of the six tests proposed by the UK, "five were from the Blix 'clusters' report and the sixth had been proposed by the inspectors and was intended to provide a mechanism for junior Iraqi officials and scientists to co-operate with the inspectors".

531. President Chirac "suggested that the UNMOVIC work programme might provide a way forward. France was prepared to look at reducing the 120 day timeframe it envisaged."

532. Mr Blair responded that "still did not get round the problem that if Saddam was found to be in breach, all the [sic] followed was more discussion and we were back where we started. It must be clear that … action would ensue."

533. In response to a question from President Chirac about whether it would be the inspectors or the Security Council who decided whether Saddam had co-operated, Mr Blair "insisted that it must be the Security Council".

534. President Chirac agreed, "although the Security Council should make its judgement on the basis of the inspectors' report". He "wondered whether it would be worth" Mr Straw and Mr de Villepin "discussing the situation to see if we could find some flexibility"; or was it "too late"?

535. Mr Blair said "every avenue must be explored".

536. President Chirac concluded that "talking direct was better than via TV and radio broadcasts". He had told Mr Blair that he did not want "disagreements over Iraq to have an impact on the UK and France's joint interests in Europe" and they should talk before the European Council on 20 March.

537. Mr Blair "said that he too did not want things to become more difficult". He "wanted to ensure the strength of the UK/France relationship was not affected".

538. Mr Campbell suggested that Mr Straw was "instructed" to "concede nothing" when he spoke to Mr de Villepin.

539. Mr Campbell wrote that the discussion was "a lot friendlier than it might have been" but President Chirac had been:

> "… straight on to the point TB expected, namely he could see a way of co-operating on the tests but it must be the inspectors who decide if Saddam is co-operating. He said he could not support an ultimatum or anything taken as a support for military action.
> "TB said the problem with that was that it meant he could have as many last chances and as much time as he [Saddam] wanted. There had to be automaticity [trigger for attack].
> "Chirac said there could not be automaticity."[179]

540. Mr Campbell added that Mr Blair and President Chirac had agreed Mr Straw and Mr de Villepin should talk, but Mr Blair "issued instructions" to Mr Straw "to concede nothing. There was intelligence suggesting the French were seeking to get the undecided six to go for tests plus more time." Mr Blair suspected President Chirac "would move to a position of automaticity but inspectors are the sole judges of compliance".

541. Asked whether the UK had been told by France that it was misrepresenting President Chirac's position, Mr Blair told the Inquiry that he had spoken to President Chirac on 14 March and:

> "The French position was very, very clear. It wasn't that they would veto any resolution, it is that they would veto a resolution that authorised force in the event of breach."[180]

542. Mr de Villepin stated that no country had shown any support for the UK proposals.

543. In an interview with BBC Newsnight on 14 March, Mr de Villepin asked what game was being played and whether there was a search for a "scapegoat in order to accuse one country of being irresponsible".[181] He stated that: "We should present the real position of both countries."

544. Mr de Villepin pointed out that "no country … had shown any support" for the UK proposals tabled in the Security Council late on 12 March.

MR BLAIR'S CONVERSATION WITH PRESIDENT BUSH

545. In a conversation with President Bush about the French position and what to say when the resolution was pulled, Mr Blair proposed that they would need to show that France would not authorise the use of force in any circumstances.

546. When Mr Blair and President Bush spoke on 14 March they discussed the French position and what to say about the French position when the decision was taken to pull the resolution.[182]

547. Mr Blair stated that:

> "… we would need to do so as the reasonable party, showing that France would not authorise the use of force in any circumstances, and demonstrating that we were sticking to 1441."

548. Mr Blair said that at some point we needed to set out our views on post-conflict, including humanitarian issues; a joint statement at the Azores Summit would be welcome.

549. Mr Campbell wrote:

> "Bush said he was predicting a 'landslide, baby!'
>
> "TB said it was too close to call.
> "Bush … The Azores was on.
> "TB said we had to be seen striving all the way even if we felt the French made it impossible.

> "TB said that the French appearing to be so unreasonable had been a big mistake by Chirac."[183]

550. Asked whether he had agreed with President Bush on 14 March that "the game was up", Mr Blair said:

> "The game was up in the sense that we were not going to get a resolution. This was the second best … Our preference was to have got a resolution that passed the Security Council … I was very conscious that I had Cabinet members who were unhappy about this … that it might give us some political weight, I mean not much frankly, but some if we could say at least we have a majority of members on our side, even though we knew we were not going to get the resolution."[184]

551. Mr Blair added:

> "It is simply a political point. If you can say, 'Well we didn't get the resolution because France vetoed but nonetheless we got the majority of the Security Council in our favour,' it would allow us to say that … It would have helped me. I would have definitely used this in terms of the presentation of the case …"

MR BLAIR'S CONVERSATIONS WITH PRESIDENT LAGOS

552. President Lagos initially informed Mr Blair on 14 March that the UK proposals did not have Chile's support and that he was working on other ideas.

553. Later President Lagos informed Mr Blair that he would not pursue his proposals unless Mr Blair or President Bush asked him to.

554. No.10 reported that President Lagos told Mr Blair on 14 March that the "elected six" had been working on some ideas which they planned to announce at "noon" (New York time).[185] Those ideas were "based on reasonable benchmarks and timing, but also the use of force if Saddam did not comply".

555. President Lagos also told Mr Blair that the draft resolution tabled on 7 March did not have Chile's support and he "had the impression that France and Russia were now looking for a real solution" in the Security Council. There was "a slim chance that war could be avoided within the next 3-4 days". He would be holding a press conference in three hours.

556. Mr Blair had responded that it was not clear how things would develop. The Security Council "did not want to vote on a resolution that would be vetoed. Both France and Russia were very clear that they would not allow a resolution which authorised the use of force."

557. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported at 5.50pm on 14 March that the US, UK and Spanish Permanent Representatives had met early that morning to discuss how to react to the new proposal forming amongst the "middle-ground six (U-6)". They had agreed:

- the proposal that "the Council would meet at the end of an ultimatum period to decide on Iraq's co-operation towards compliance with the tests was completely unacceptable"; and
- to "major on the primacy of 1441" and tell contacts that "if any of the U-6 abandoned that baseline, they would do huge damage to the Security Council".[186]

558. President Lagos telephoned No.10 that evening and, in the absence of Mr Blair, spoke to Mr Rycroft to draw attention to the key points in his statement, including the benchmarks proposed by the UK and a deadline of three weeks, not longer, reflecting Mr Blair's advice.[187]

559. Mr Rycroft also reported that President Lagos would not push the proposal further unless President Bush or Mr Blair wanted him to; and that he [Lagos] had not received any reaction from other Security Council members.

560. An unofficial translation of President Lagos' statement produced by the British Embassy Santiago reported that it expressed "full understanding of the United States concern for the threats posed to its security", which were "also threats to world security".[188] It also stated that Chile continued to make "best efforts to avert war" while fully supporting the "UN decision aimed at bringing to full and verified compliance the Iraqi disarmament process" mandated in resolution 1441. President Lagos referred to "a special co-operative bond", which Chile had established with the UK.

561. The proposal was "for the Security Council to impose … five critical conditions" derived from the inspection process which should be fulfilled "within a realistic time period not later than three weeks as from the date on which they are approved by the Security Council". Verification of compliance was to be reported by inspectors with the Security Council controlling the decisions that followed.

562. The Chilean proposal omitted the demand for a public statement by Saddam Hussein but repeated the UK proposal for interviews outside Iraq. The remaining tests were a subset of the UK proposals, requiring Iraq to:

- disclose any remaining warhead with mustard gas or mustard gas bombs or any documentation to prove their destruction;
- disclose the 10,000 litres of anthrax or account for its destruction;
- destroy any Al Samoud 2 missiles and their components; and
- disclose any information stating that "Remote Control" vehicles do not carry chemical weapons.

563. President Lagos also stated that the "great powers" had "unfortunately failed to include" the "delicate equilibrium" between "reasonable goals and realistic deadlines" in their proposed resolutions. Chile would "not concur with a resolution" that failed "to exhaust all the means available to complete Iraqi disarmament and preserve world peace". It was "still possible to reach an understanding and strengthen international unity"; and that unity would be "the only guarantee of a stable, fair peace". Chile believed that Iraqi disarmament could "still be done while preserving and strengthening the international institutional framework afforded by the United Nations and its Charter, and seeking any other alternative for the rule of law to prevail over force".

564. Dr Blix wrote that the Chilean proposal replaced the requirement for a televised speech from Saddam Hussein with a less humiliating letter from the Iraqi leadership and extended the time given for attainment of the benchmarks to three weeks or 30 days and for Council collectively to assess if Iraq had attained the benchmarks and to decide on further action.[189] Chile was "not willing to let the Council abdicate this prerogative. The US on the other hand were not ready to drop the claim of a right to go it alone."

DEVELOPMENTS IN NEW YORK, 14 MARCH 2003

565. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that US pressure on Chile had contributed to its decision to stop work on its proposal.

566. Sir Jeremy told his colleagues in New York that the UK would continue to look for agreement on its proposals. Key decisions would be made at the Azores Summit.

567. Reporting on developments on 14 March, Sir Jeremy Greenstock wrote that the U-6 had "made no further efforts to achieve consensus" and their proposal had been "confirmed dead".[190]

568. Sir Jeremy commented that the process had "ground to a halt" because the text leaked and the leaked version did not resemble the final draft and because President Lagos had spoken out too soon, "alerting the US who then put on great pressure to kill it". A Chilean official had told the UK Mission that the US pressure on Chile in particular had been "more … than that put on them to support the UK/US/Spain resolution".

569. When the EU Heads of Mission met to take stock on 14 March, Sir Jeremy Greenstock told them "discussions were continuing" and he had made clear to the African and Latin American members of the Council that he was "ready to talk at any stage. But there remained differences on substance and procedure." In response to a comment from the German Ambassador that "both the British and U-6 proposals were dead in the water", Sir Jeremy replied that the UK "would keep going"; the Azores Summit "represented a final opportunity".

570. A scheduled meeting of the P5 was cancelled because there was "little to talk about".

571. Sir Jeremy also spoke to Dr Blix, and to Mr Annan about "the leading role" he (Mr Annan) could play in the event of conflict "in healing wounds and reinserting the UN into the post-conflict situation".

572. Sir Jeremy concluded:

> "The fact of the Azores Summit, the collapse of the U-6 compromise under our combined pressure and general exhaustion here in New York, have all added up to a less troublesome day than we might have expected.
> "Clearly key decisions on the resolution will be made at the Summit. In addition to any other instructions, grateful if you could consider whether it is worth giving UNMOVIC/IAEA and the UN advance notice of any announcement on next steps so that they can make the earliest possible preparations to evacuate staff from Iraq …"

573. Mr Campbell wrote that on 14 March "the diplomatic scene was going nowhere but we kept going with the line we were working flat out for a second resolution".[191]

The UK decision that Iraq had committed further material breaches

THE EXCHANGE OF LETTERS OF 14 AND 15 MARCH 2003

574. Resolution 1441 decided:

- that Iraq had been and remained "in material breach of its obligations under relevant resolutions", in particular through its "failure to co-operate" with the [191] Campbell A & Hagerty B. The Alastair Campbell Diaries. Volume 4. The Burden of Power: Countdown to Iraq. Hutchinson, 2012.

UN inspectors and the IAEA and to complete the actions required by operative paragraphs 8 to 13 of resolution 687 (OP1);

- to afford Iraq "a final opportunity" to comply with its obligations (OP2);
- that Iraq should provide "a currently accurate, full, and complete declaration of all aspects of its programmes" within 30 days of the resolution (OP3); and
- "that false statements or omissions in the declarations submitted by Iraq pursuant to this resolution and failure by Iraq at any time to comply with, and co-operate fully in the implementation of, this resolution shall constitute a further material breach of Iraq's obligations and will be reported to the Council for assessment …" (OP4).

575. On 14 March, Lord Goldsmith asked for confirmation of Mr Blair's view that Iraq had "committed further material breaches as specified in [operative] paragraph 4 of resolution 1441".[192]

576. Mr David Brummell, Legal Secretary to the Law Officers, wrote to Mr Rycroft on 14 March:

> "It is an essential part of the legal basis for military action without a further resolution of the Security Council that there is strong evidence that Iraq has failed to comply with and co-operate fully in the implementation of resolution 1441 and has thus failed to take the final opportunity offered by the Security Council in that resolution. The Attorney General understands that it is unequivocally the Prime Minister's view that Iraq has committed further material breaches as specified in [operative] paragraph 4 of resolution 1441, but as this is a judgment for the Prime Minister, the Attorney would be grateful for confirmation that this is the case."

577. Mr Rycroft replied to Mr Brummell's letter the following day, stating:

> "This is to confirm that it is indeed the Prime Minister's unequivocal view that Iraq is in further material breach of its obligations, as in OP4 of UNSCR 1441, because of 'false statements or omissions in the declarations submitted by Iraq pursuant to this resolution and failure to comply with, and co-operate fully in the implementation of, this resolution'."[193]

578. It is unclear what specific grounds Mr Blair relied upon in reaching his view.

579. Following receipt of Mr Brummell's letter of 14 March, Mr Blair neither requested nor received considered advice addressing the evidence on which he expressed his "unequivocal view" that Iraq was "in further material breach of its obligations".

580. The significance of Lord Goldsmith's request and Mr Blair's response are addressed in Section 5.

THE FCO PAPER OF 15 MARCH, 'IRAQI NON-COMPLIANCE WITH UNSCR 1441'

582. A paper for publication providing examples of Iraq's failure to comply with the obligations imposed by the UN was produced by the FCO on 15 March.

583. The question of what would constitute a further material breach as specified in OP4 of resolution 1441 (2002) was the subject of considerable debate within the UK Government in late 2002 (see Section 3.6).

584. In January 2003, Mr Blair said that, if the inspectors' reports established a pattern of non-compliance, they would, in the absence of other evidence that Iraq had concealed WMD (a "smoking gun"), be sufficient to secure Security Council support for a second resolution stating that Iraq was in further material breach of resolution 1441.[194]

585. Mr Blair proposed that the US and UK should seek to persuade others, including Dr Blix, that this was the "true view" of resolution 1441.

586. By the end of January, Mr Blair had taken a public position that Iraq was failing fully to comply with resolution 1441, and that that was a further material breach (see Section 3.6).

587. In his advice of 7 March, Lord Goldsmith said that the views of UNMOVIC and the IAEA would be highly significant in demonstrating hard evidence of non-compliance and non-co-operation.[195]

588. In his minute to Mr Blair of 11 March, Mr Straw wrote that the:

> "… three recent meetings of the [Security] Council more than fulfil the requirement for immediate consideration of reports of non-compliance. So we can say convincingly that the process set out in resolution 1441 is complete."[196]

589. Mr Straw suggested that the UK Government should use "the overwhelming evidence that Iraq has not used the four months" since the adoption of resolution 1441 "to co-operate 'immediately, unconditionally and actively'" to make a "more compelling" case to Parliament and public opinion. The UNMOVIC "clusters" document would be a material help in making that case".

590. A draft of the FCO paper on Iraq's failure to comply with resolution 1441, intended to "demonstrate clearly the extent of Iraqi intransigence" was sent to Mr Straw's Private Office and other FCO addressees on 13 March.[197] It was agreed with the MOD, Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) and the Cabinet Office Assessments Staff.

591. The paper was referred to in a note on the Attorney General's file, in relation to the need for "further material to be assembled" as discussed by Lord Goldsmith and Mr Straw, in their meeting late on 13 March, to provide "evidence showing" that Iraq was "in further material breach". That listed a need for:

- Any examples of false statements/omissions and (significant) non-co-operation reported to Security Council pursuant to OP4 of SCR 1441.
- Any examples of Iraqi interference reported by Blix or ElBaradei to the Council pursuant to OP11.
- For these purposes, we need to trawl through statements from the draft Command Paper on Iraqi non-compliance which is to be published.
- See attached FCO paper Iraqi non-compliance with UNSCR 1441 of 13 March 2003."[198]

592. A note of a conversation with Ms Kara Owen in Mr Straw's Private Office, on 14 March, recorded that Mr Brummell had made the following points on Lord Goldsmith's behalf:

- "Demonstration of breaches of UNSCR 1441 are critical to our legal case. Therefore we must be scrupulously careful to ensure that the best examples of non-compliance are referred to."
- "It would be distinctly unhelpful to our legal case if the examples of non compliance … were weak or inadequate; and it would be difficult – indeed it would be too late – to seek to add further (better) examples 'after the event'."
- The FCO needed to check the document they were preparing "very carefully" and subject it to "the tightest scrutiny".
- The document should include "a caveat … acknowledging that the examples of non-compliance … were not exhaustive but illustrative".
- The submission to Mr Straw should reflect those points.[199]

593. Mr Brummell's record of his conversation with Ms Owen on 14 March also stated that he had been informed that the FCO paper would be sent out with a letter from Mr Blair to Ministerial colleagues on 17 March, "after Cabinet". Mr Blair's letter would also contain a "one page" summary of the legal position, which was "news" to Mr Brummell. A subsequent conversation with Mr Rycroft had "confirmed that it would be helpful if" Lord Goldsmith's staff would draft that summary.

594. The FCO paper was finalised on 15 March.[200] It was produced by officials in the FCO but drawn largely from official reports and statements by UN inspectors. It drew heavily on UNMOVIC's report, 'Unresolved Disarmament Issues – Iraq's Proscribed Weapons Programmes', the "clusters" document, which it characterised as "a 173 page-long catalogue of Iraqi intransigence since 1991".

595. The paper examined the extent of Iraq's non-compliance with the obligations placed upon it by the UN Security Council in resolution 1441, which it stated was "unambiguous". Resolution 1441:

- recognised the threat which Iraq's non-compliance "and proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and long-range missiles" posed to international peace and security (preambular paragraph (PP) 3);
- decided that Iraq had been and remained "in material breach of its obligations under relevant resolutions" (OP1);
- decided to "afford Iraq … a final opportunity to comply" (OP2); and
- decided that "false statements or omissions in the declarations submitted by Iraq … and failure by Iraq at any time to comply with, and co-operate fully in the implementation of, this resolution shall constitute a further material breach of Iraq's obligations" (OP4).

596. Assessing Iraq's "progress in complying with relevant provisions of UNSCR 1441", the paper stated that Iraq had "Not met" the requirement in five areas and had only "Partially met" or "Not yet met" other demands.

597. The FCO paper stated:

- Iraq had "Not met" the requirement for a "currently accurate, full, and complete declaration of all aspects of its programmes". The Iraqi declaration, of 7 December, "did not contain any new information to answer any of the outstanding questions", and there were "significant falsehoods".
- Iraq had not provided UNMOVIC and the IAEA with "immediate, unimpeded, unrestricted, and private access to all officials and other persons whom UNMOVIC or the IAEA wish to interview". Only 16 interviews had taken place and there was "reason to believe" that the Iraqi authorities had intimidated interviewees.
- No interviews had taken place outside Iraq. The paper cited "evidence that Iraqi scientists have been intimidated into refusing interviews … They – and their families – have been threatened with execution if they deviate from the official line."

[200] Paper FCO, 15 March 2003, 'Iraqi Non-Compliance with UNSCR 1441' attached to Letter Straw to Colleagues, 17 March 2003, [untitled].

- Iraq had not provided UNMOVIC and the IAEA with "the names of all personnel currently and formerly associated with Iraq's chemical, biological, nuclear, and ballistic missile programmes and the associated … facilities".
- Iraq was not co-operating "immediately, unconditionally, and actively with UNMOVIC and the IAEA". It had not answered the outstanding questions raised by UNSCOM when it was forced to withdraw or by the 1999 Amorim panel (see Section 1.1).

598. The list of unresolved "outstanding issues" included:

- "Failure to account adequately for SCUD-type missiles and components 'suggests that these items may have been retained for a prohibited missile force'."
- "Failure to explain why Iraq has built a missile test stand at al-Rafah that can accommodate missiles with over four times the thrust of the prohibited Al Samoud missile."
- "[A]t least 80 tonnes (in 550 shells and 450 aerial bombs)" of "unaccounted for" mustard gas, and that quantity "could be substantially higher".
- Whether Iraq had retained "some capability with regard to VX".
- Whether Iraq's claimed destruction of bulk agent, including anthrax, in 1991 had occurred.
- Failure to account for the aircraft associated with the L-29 RPV programme.

599. The FCO paper also stated that Iraq had only:

- "Partially met" the requirement for free and unrestricted use of aircraft "belatedly and under pressure".
- "Not yet met" the requirement to destroy Al Samoud missiles and associated equipment. It stated that the programme of destruction had started by the deadline set by UNMOVIC, but suggested it could be stopped "at any time".
- "Partially met" the requirement not to "take or threaten hostile acts", although it stated "inspections had been largely incident-free".

600. The paper also identified Iraqi "gestures" which it characterised as examples of a "pretence of co-operation".

601. The paper was sent to all Members of Parliament on 17 March.[201]

602. The statements in the FCO paper about Iraq's approach to interviews and its intimidation of personnel were based on the UK's interpretation of the intelligence reporting it had received that Iraq was actively and successfully pursuing a policy of concealing its programmes and deceiving and obstructing the inspectors.

[201] Letter Straw to Colleagues, 17 March 2003, [untitled] attaching Paper FCO, 15 March 2003, 'Iraqi Non-Compliance with UNSCR 1441'.

603. The FCO paper did not evaluate the seriousness of either the five requirements which Iraq had "Not met" or the other areas where Iraq had only "Partially met" or "Not yet met" the requirement.

604. The way in which that intelligence was drawn on in briefings for and statements by Ministers, and the withdrawal of some of the reporting in September 2004, is addressed in Section 4.3.

605. OP11 of resolution 1441 (2002) directed Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei "to report immediately to the Council any interference by Iraq with inspection activities, as well as any failure by Iraq to comply with its disarmament obligations, including its obligations regarding inspections under this resolution".

606. OP12 recorded that the Security Council had decided "to convene immediately upon receipt of a report in accordance with paragraphs 4 or 11 … in order to consider the situation and the need for full compliance with all of the relevant Council resolutions in order to secure international peace and security".

607. The FCO paper did not mention that OP4 of resolution 1441 required a further material breach to be "reported to the Council for assessment in accordance with paragraphs 11 and 12" of the resolution. Nor did it contain any reference to the Security Council having done so.

608. In setting out the analysis, there were a number of salient points the FCO paper did not make, including:

- Dr Blix had reminded Mr Blair on 6 February that the material described as "unaccounted for" in UNSCOM's report of 1999 was not necessarily present in Iraq; and that it would be "paradoxical to go to war for something that might turn out to be very little".[202]
- Dr Blix made a similar point in his report to the Security Council on 7 March.[203]
- The quantities of material described as "unaccounted for" were estimates extrapolated from data in UNSCOM official records.
- Dr Blix had not at that point requested any interviews outside Iraq. He told the Security Council on 7 March that he would be requesting such interviews "shortly".
- There had been no problems once aircraft flights over Iraq started.
- UNMOVIC had not reached a conclusion on the purpose of the test stand at al-Rafah or the L-29 RPV programme.
- Iraq had already destroyed 65 of the 120 short-range Al Samoud 2 missiles it was estimated to possess.

609. UNMOVIC had informed Sir Jeremy Greenstock on 11 March that Iraq had provided names of personnel currently and formerly associated with Iraq's WMD programmes and had said "they were willing to provide more in particular areas on request".[204]

610. Dr Blix's reports to the Security Council presented a nuanced picture. He did not say that Iraq was complying, but neither he nor Dr ElBaradei had reported to the Security Council that Iraq was not complying or that the inspectors could not complete their tasks.

611. In his report of 7 March, Dr Blix stated that, when the quarterly report had been finalised, there had still been "relatively little tangible progress to note" and the report had been "cautious".[205] By 7 March, however, there was more. Iraq had accepted the destruction of Al Samoud 2 missiles and associated items and that constituted a "substantial measure of disarmament … the first since the middle 1990s".

612. In relation to other recent Iraqi initiatives, Dr Blix stated:

> "One can hardly avoid the impression that, after a period of somewhat reluctant co-operation, there has been an acceleration of initiatives from the Iraqi side since the end of January. This is welcome, but the value of these measures must be soberly judged by how many question marks they actually succeed in straightening out. This is not yet clear."

613. Dr Blix added that Iraq had not "persisted" in attaching conditions to inspections. Recent Iraqi initiatives could not be said "to constitute 'immediate' co-operation. Nor do they necessarily cover all areas of relevance"; but they were "nevertheless welcome".

614. Dr Blix was not reporting that he was unable to carry out inspections. He stated that "Even with a pro-active Iraqi attitude" it would still take "months" to "verify sites and items, analyse documents, interview relevant persons and draw conclusions". A document addressing unresolved disarmament issues and to identify key remaining disarmament tasks, as required by resolution 1284 (1999), would be submitted later that month.

615. Dr ElBaradei reported that there were no indications that Iraq had resumed nuclear activities since the inspectors left in December 1998, and the recently increased level of Iraqi co-operation should allow the IAEA to provide the Security Council with an assessment of Iraq's nuclear capabilities in the near future.[206]

616. Dr Blix told the Inquiry that he had been "pushed very hard" to conduct interviews abroad.[207] Resolution 1441 had provided for such interviews but did not say they were mandatory. He:

> "… never thought that you would get much out of it. It would only have been trouble, but we would have been driven to it in the end. I think the push was so hard, so we would have persuaded the Iraqis …"

617. Dr Blix added that he did not think interviews outside Iraq were realistic but he would have pursued them if there had been more time: "The pressure from the British was also strong. [Mr] Blair felt very strongly about it."[208]

Events of 15 and 16 March 2003

618. In the entry in his diaries for 15 March, Mr Campbell wrote that there was a meeting with Mr Blair at 8.30am. He was "clear now what the French would try – yes to the tests, even to the possibility of military action, but they would push for a later date".[209]

619. That had been followed by a pre-meeting with Mr Prescott, Mr Brown and Mr Douglas Alexander, Minister of State at the Cabinet Office. Mr Campbell commented:

> "GB [Gordon Brown] was beginning to motor a bit, firing with good media and political lines. He also felt we needed to explain more clearly why we had been so keen to get the second resolution when now we were saying we didn't need one. The answer lay in the pressure we had been putting on the Iraqis, through the building of international support. He also felt that we should be pressing publicly over some of the questions he felt Blix had not fully answered.
> "Goldsmith was happy for us to brief that in the coming days he would make clear there was a legal base for action. We now had to build up the Azores as a genuine diplomatic effort, which was not going to be easy …
> "John Scarlett [Chairman of the JIC] joined us, reported signs of the Iraqis really hunkering down, said there were reports of summary executions …
> "Godric [Smith – Mr Blair's Official Spokesman] and I were briefing Ministers and then the media re the forthcoming AG [Attorney General] advice. A few decisions having been taken, the travel of direction clear, we felt in a stronger position."[210]

THE FCO GAME PLAN

620. A Note for the Record written by Mr McDonald on 15 March reported that Cabinet on 17 March would need:

> "… to be choreographed with the Security Council meeting where Jeremy Greenstock would announce that we were pulling our resolution.
> "The Foreign Secretary assumed the Cabinet would meet sometime in the morning. It will need specifically to approve the course of action proposed and to have passed across the terms of the Commons motion for Tuesday.
> "… it might be a good idea for him [Mr Straw] to do a statement on Monday to inform colleagues of the decision to withdraw … A statement … might give us a better chance of assessing from where the strongest arguments would come."[211]

621. The FCO advised No.10 that the UK's "aim should be to leave the current diplomatic process in a way that helps ensure that we can return to the Council shortly for action on other important areas, such as amending the Iraq sanctions regime and obtaining UN authorisation of post conflict arrangements".[212] That could best be done by a "short statement" by Sir Jeremy Greenstock in informal Council consultations, making clear that the UK "regretted that it had proved impossible to make progress on our text and that we were not taking any further action on it": "Ideally this should coincide with any US announcement of a short final ultimatum to Iraq."

622. The FCO also identified the risk of a resolution being tabled in the Security Council or the UN General Assembly criticising the use of force; the need to address travel advice and the safety of UK nationals in the region; and the reaction to the US announcement about publishing a Road Map on the MEPP.

623. Mr Ricketts subsequently advised that Sir Jeremy Greenstock had pointed out "that we should try to keep the issue open in the Security Council for as long as possible in order to minimise the risk of rival initiatives"; and that "a key element" of that strategy would be "to ensure that we do not say we are closing down or giving up on the Security Council route".[213]

624. Sir David Manning recorded that Mr Blair had made those points "strongly" at the Azores Summit.[214]

625. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Inquiry that it was his "responsibility not to be caught having allowed somebody to put down a resolution against us because I had lost the initiative. I would have been criticised for that."[215]

626. The FCO advice on setting out a "Vision" for Iraq after the conflict at the Azores Summit is addressed in Section 6.5.

MR BLAIR'S CONVERSATION WITH PRESIDENT BUSH, 15 MARCH 2003

627. In his discussion with President Bush on 15 March, Mr Blair proposed that the main message from the Azores Summit should be that it was the final chance for Saddam Hussein to demonstrate that he had taken the strategic decision to avert war; and that members of the Security Council should be able to sanction the use of force as Iraq was in material breach of its obligations.

628. The UK would take the decision on the timing for bringing the UN process to an end on 17 March.

629. President Bush was trying to help Mr Blair achieve a majority for military action in the Parliamentary Labour Party before the House of Commons vote on 18 March.

630. When Mr Blair spoke to President Bush on 15 March, he thanked him for the announcement on the MEPP.[216]

631. Mr Blair said that the main message for the Azores Summit should be that this was a final chance for the UN to deliver, and that countries should be able to sanction the use of force as Iraq was in material breach. They discussed the positions of various countries and Mr Blair underlined the importance of appearing as reasonable as possible when we pulled the UN resolution. The timing of that decision would be for the UK.

632. Mr Blair and President Bush also discussed the role of the UN post-conflict, the need to have a post-conflict strategy to deal with the opponents of military action, and the consequences of the experience on Iraq for the UN in the longer term.

633. Mr Blair's attempts to agree the role of the UN post-conflict with the US are addressed in Section 6.5.

634. In his diaries, Mr Campbell provided a long account of the conversation, including:

> "He [President Bush] accepted that we had done the right thing on the Road Map. 'Good advice and it has helped a lot.' …

[216] Letter Rycroft to McDonald, 15 March 2003, 'Iraq and Middle East: Prime Minister's Telephone Conversation with President Bush, 15 March'.

"Bush was pretty vile about Fox, Chirac and Schröder [Mr Gerhard Schröder, the German Chancellor] and to a lesser extent Lagos. He wanted to go for a 'coalition of the willing' meeting next week …

"TB said it was time for the UN to show it could do its job.

"Bush said that anything that weakened 1441 was not on. His plan now was: 1. get through Monday, 2. get through our vote; then 3. Coalition of the willing.

"He and TB then came up with the idea of doing the press conference before rather than after the meeting in the Azores. I was opposed, felt it would fuel the idea it was all a charade …

"His [Bush's] main line was that anything that takes us back from 1441 was not enough. This was the final stage of the diplomacy.

"TB said the UN had to be seen to do its job.

"Bush felt the TB lines re the divisions being between those prepared to use force and those who were not would come best from TB not him … He said we have to come to a conclusion at the UN. If we issue an ultimatum and the prospect of force, and France says no, it becomes impossible.

"TB said he still thought Chirac might say yes, but with a delay.

"Bush said that if he went for yes with twenty-one days, he would reject it. They are the ones being unreasonable, not us.

"TB said he would definitely lose … RC [Robin Cook] …

"TB said he was not sure where Kofi [Annan] was.

"Bush said he had totally different problems to us re the UN … the pressure in the States was to bury it. Then 'I told Fox he has seriously messed up. He has really let me down on this.' …"[217]

635. Mr Brenton reported that President Bush was determined to remove Saddam Hussein and to stick to the US timetable for action.

636. The UK's "steadfastness" had been "invaluable" in bringing in other countries in support of action. Helping Mr Blair to make the transition from the UN process to military action was in the US's own interests.

---

[217] Campbell A & Hagerty B. The Alastair Campbell Diaries. Volume 4. The Burden of Power: Countdown to Iraq. Hutchinson, 2012.

637. Advising on the perspective from Washington, Mr Brenton reported that President Bush was:

> "… utterly determined to get Saddam out. In retrospect it looks as if he finally and firmly reached that conclusion in early December at the time of the false Iraqi declaration. The entire subsequent action has been driven by it. This is a President who sets targets and expects his subordinates to deliver. Hence the ironclad determination of the timetable (which has hardly budged in three months) and the occasionally visible uneasiness about focusing exclusively on disarmament and sticking to the UN route (in case we got the answer 'yes'). This does not mean that Bush wants to go to war, but the bottom line is that Saddam must go."[218]

638. Mr Brenton added that President Bush "had every reason to feel confident" about military action:

> "The chief current nightmare in the Pentagon and intelligence community is 'catastrophic success' – a collapse of resistance in Iraq which moves too fast for us instantly to establish order in its wake. Of course nothing is certain and there are downside scenarios … But the high probability projection is for a quick and relatively clean victory.
> "As you know, the US are ready to start the (short) countdown to military action next week."

639. President Bush also had domestic political grounds for confidence as the conviction that war is inevitable "had taken hold". Liberal politicians had "kept their heads down", and conservative commentators had "grown increasingly impatient with the UN's delays".

640. Mr Brenton wrote that the US Administration had, however, "been shocked" at their "inability" to get Turkey on board and the "failure, despite what they see as vigorous arm twisting, to get a majority for a second … resolution". The State Department was "concerned at images of US unilateralism" and was:

> "… working hard at giving the 'coalition' of supportive countries a more visible presence. In this optic, the steadfastness of UK support, bringing with it other key players … had been invaluable to them. The President is thus concerned about the Prime Minister's present political difficulties not only out of fellow feeling (… a genuinely significant factor …) but also out of self interest. It would be massively damaging for US interests for the British Government to fall because of our support in Iraq. The US will go to great lengths to help it not happen (as indeed they have started to do with their announcement on the Road Map)."

[218] Telegram 350 Washington to FCO London, 15 March 2003, 'Iraq'.

641. Mr Brenton concluded:

> "At the Azores Summit … Bush will be looking for a way of making the transition from the UN process to the military countdown in a manner maximally helpful to the Prime Minister. A key component of this will be the announcement of our intentions for a post-Saddam Iraq, and in particular the level of UN involvement in administering. […] and there is a clear US red line on fighting to liberate Iraq and then handing the governance over to the UN. Extensive UN involvement short of this ought to be achievable, and is a prize worth fighting for."

642. Mr Blair saw the telegram on the way to the Azores Summit.

643. Mr Sherard Cowper-Coles, the British Ambassador to Israel, subsequently reported that there were some suggestions that the announcement of the Road Map had been a gesture to help Mr Blair; and that "as such it should not be taken too seriously by Israel".[219]

MR BLAIR'S CONTACTS WITH OTHER LEADERS

644. Mr Blair contacted a number of leaders to prepare the ground for the announcement that the UK would be taking no further action on the draft resolution.

645. Mr Rycroft recorded that in the conversation with Mr John Howard, the Australian Prime Minister, on 15 March, Mr Howard asked "if the diplomatic process was dead".[220] Mr Blair replied that it had "reached an impasse. The process would struggle on until Monday. Even the Russian position was making things difficult."

646. Mr Blair added that "a way forward could have been found" if everyone had supported the proposals tabled by the UK the previous week; the "US had not been eager about the proposals, but they were prepared to go along with them. The tests had been taken from the Inspectors' own reports – they were perfectly reasonable." Saddam Hussein was "now busy hiding material around Iraq".

647. Mr Blair and Mr Howard also discussed the effect of the French veto which the "elected six"' were "hiding behind". The implication would be that the US, UK and Australian troops should stay in the region indefinitely; without forces in the region the inspectors would be "kicked out". If it was clear the diplomatic process was not going to proceed, there was little point in putting the resolution to a vote.

648. Mr Blair and Mr Howard also discussed the role of the UN and international financial institutions after conflict and the importance of a Road Map for the MEPP.

[220] Letter [Francis] Campbell to Owen, 15 March 2003, 'Iraq: Australia, 15 March'.

649. In response to a letter from Mr Atal Vajpayee, the Prime Minister of India, proposing a summit-level meeting of the leaders of the five Permanent Members of the Security Council about the situation in Iraq, Mr Blair wrote:

> "… the current situation in Iraq poses many challenges for the international community. How we handle this issue will have wide-ranging global implications for many years to come. It is for this reason that we and other UNSC members are working so hard to secure a peaceful resolution.
> "I am conscious that all P5 members have a duty to do everything within their power to resolve this issue without eroding the authority of the UN system. I am meeting my US and Spanish counterparts on 16 March in the hope that a way can be found to bridge the differences within the Security Council. I hope that the UK and India will keep in very close touch as the situation develops."[221]

650. In a discussion with President Lagos about the Chilean proposal, the position of the "elected six" and the position of the US and other members of the Security Council, Mr Blair said that there were concerns that the "elected six" document would be "used by the French to cause further delay".[222] Time was running out. It was clear from his conversation with President Chirac the previous day that France "would still not accept the automatic use of force or an ultimatum in the event of non-compliance".

651. President Lagos stated that benchmarks without a timeline would result in endless discussion, but it was not clear what the Security Council could do and time was running out. Secretary Powell had told the Mexican Foreign Minister that the US did not want any further movement at the UN.

652. President Lagos was reported to have stated that he:

> "… had acted in good faith, but he would not do anything further. He was very mad with the US response. They had assumed motives that were not true."

653. Mr Blair said he would have further discussions with the US and "there could be a chance to squeeze things through"; and that "he thought there was still time and he would keep trying until the last minute".

654. President Lagos responded that Mr Blair "knew where Chile stood and he was sorry that they had not been able to achieve a successful outcome last week".

655. Mr Blair wrote in his memoir that the six tests tabled by the UK on 12 March:

> "… were immediately rejected by France. Jacques Chirac gave a very strong statement saying he would not support military action whatever the circumstances. Dominique de Villepin … also then rejected the tests per se. This was before the Iraqis even responded. Ricardo [Lagos] then explained that, in this case, he couldn't really participate in an obviously futile charade at the UNSC. The UN route was blocked."[223]

656. In his statement for the Inquiry, Mr Blair wrote:

"… the strength of the French statements of opposition and his internal politics made President Lagos say, reasonably enough, that he could not support what was going to be not only a resolution doomed to a veto, but one strongly attacked by certain P5 members."[224]

TRIPARTITE DECLARATION, 15 MARCH 2003

657. In a declaration on 15 March, France, with Germany and Russia, attempted to secure support in the Security Council for continued inspections.

658. In a declaration late on 15 March, France, Germany and Russia appealed to Security Council members to "make every effort to ensure" that a peaceful approach prevailed to meet the shared goal of the international community for the disarmament of Iraq.[225] The points made in the declaration included:

- The inspections regime in resolution 1441 was "unprecedented".
- A reaffirmation that "nothing in current circumstances justifies abandoning the inspections process or resorting to force".
- The "successive reports" to the Security Council by Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei had shown that inspections were "producing results" and that disarmament of Iraq had begun. There was "every reason to believe that it can be completed rapidly and in accordance with the rules set out by the Council. Iraq, for its part, must co-operate actively and unconditionally."
- "France, Russia and Germany, supported by China" had "submitted proposals" to achieve disarmament "by defining key disarmament tasks and establishing a rigorous timetable".
- "Suggestions in the same spirit" had "been put forward by other members of the Council".
- The unity of the Security Council could be preserved, and all members bore "a particular responsibility for ensuring" it was "not divided at this crucial time".
- When UNMOVIC's work programme was submitted to the Security Council, the Council should meet "immediately thereafter at the ministerial level to approve key disarmament tasks and establish an implementation timetable" which was "both demanding and realistic".

- The use of force could only be "a last resort".
- A "peaceful approach" was "supported by the immense majority of the international community".

659. President Chirac's interview with CNN, which was broadcast on 16 March, is addressed later in this Section.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENTS, 16 MARCH 2003

660. Mr Blair and other Ministers continued on 16 March to insist that there was still time for a peaceful solution. They also drew attention to difficulties created by President Chirac's stance on a veto and dismissed the tripartite proposal to extend the inspections process.

661. In his interview on the BBC's Breakfast with Frost programme on 16 March, Mr Brown focused on the Government's wish to avoid military action.[226] He stated that "obviously we don't want war, we want peace, we want the diplomatic process to work". The UK was not seeking military action: "Even now … Saddam Hussein could announce that he would comply and he would co-operate …" The "purpose of the second resolution was to put the maximum pressure on Saddam Hussein … that he had to disarm immediately and that he could not get off the hook".

662. Mr Brown stated:

> "My view … and I think this is the view of Tony Blair, is that we should continue to try, even now, even in these difficult times, to secure international agreement … to a resolution that would involve international co-operation and force Saddam Hussein to disarm. It is unfortunate that we have both got non-compliance on the part of Iraq …
> "And of course the other issue that makes it difficult is that at least one country has said that although it has supported the resolutions that imply the use of force, that they would not support a resolution now on the use of force, at this stage, whatever the circumstances …
> "… even today the focus is on seeing if we can move the diplomatic process forward … even at this stage there are initiatives that can be taken that would move it forward. I would like every one of the Security Council members to be in a position to say that they would support the disarmament of Saddam Hussein."

663. Mr Brown added:

> "This is about our national interests, this is our role in the international community. Tony Blair has tried to bring Europe and America together. He's trying to find a diplomatic way forward … I believe there are options still available to us and these will be discussed today with President Bush … the important thing to recognise is that when the international community passes its resolutions … it has got to show that it's got a mechanism for enforcing its will. And that was, of course, the purpose of the second resolution, but … that could form initiatives that could be taken this afternoon and later, to see if we can resolve this issue without military action.

"… Even now there are initiatives on the table that have been put forward by us and others that may help us resolve the question of whether there can be international co-operation but the blockage is the non-compliance of Saddam Hussein and … at least one country saying … in what I think is unreasonable terms, that whatever the circumstances … they would not consider the use of force. And that really deprives us of a mechanism for action …"

664. Mr Brown also stated that the Government would not be acting in the way it was "unless it was satisfied that there was a legal basis for its actions".

665. In his diaries, Mr Campbell described a "long meeting" in Sir David Manning's office before leaving for the Azores, with Sir David, Baroness Morgan and Mr Rycroft, who were joined by Mr Brown, Dr John Reid, Minister without Portfolio and Labour Party Chairman, and Ms Armstrong.[227]

666. The meeting had tried:

"… to boil down the central arguments and dividing lines now. I suggested we say we intend to go back to the French and test their position – do they support any element of what we are saying? Are they really saying there are no circumstances in which they would support anything seen as a threat of military action. If they are, we go. If not, we have to look again.

"David M said there was no indication the French intended to shift.

"GB did Frost and came back saying the really tough questions were in the field of legality. GB also said if we are saying this is the final shot at diplomacy, what are we actually saying we are going to do after today? Bush didn't want a process story but I suggested one, namely a last round of contacts at the UN post the Azores meeting."

MR BLAIR'S CONVERSATION WITH PRIME MINISTER BALKENENDE

667. Mr Rycroft recorded that in a conversation with Mr Jan Peter Balkenende, Prime Minister of the Netherlands, Mr Blair had said, in reply to a question about whether Mr de Villepin and President Chirac's recent telephone calls signalled a "willingness to be more co-operative", that France:

> "… would still not accept a resolution that contained an ultimatum or the automatic use of force. They were only prepared to look at timing and benchmarks. An impasse had been reached."[228]

668. Subsequently, Mr Blair stated that:

- "… the UN track was now quite difficult. The 'elected six' had been close to agreement last week but were frightened off by pressure from Russia and France."
- There was a "slim chance" of a majority in favour of a second resolution, "but only with a big push": "The problem was that once it became clear … France was going to veto the elected six saw little point in putting the resolution to the vote."
- The ideas put forward by Mr de Villepin were "yet another way of creating further delays. The process was going round in circles."
- "… France, Germany and Russia had made an agreement that they would act together. Russia would not countenance anything other than a peaceful solution … France and Russia were prepared to veto a resolution containing an ultimatum or the automatic use of force."
- "China was one step removed … they would not use their veto."
- "… French and Russian statements that disarmament was happening went against reality. Had the international community presented Saddam with a strong ultimatum then he would probably have complied."
- At the Azores Summit "they would try to give the UN one last chance".
- "… it had to be made clear – compliance or military action would follow".

MR BLAIR'S CONVERSATION WITH MR ANNAN, 16 MARCH 2003

669. Mr Blair told Mr Annan, who wanted to explore the scope for compromise before the Azores Summit, that an impasse had been reached with France, and Saddam Hussein would comply only if there was a clear threat of force.

670. Ms Short spoke to Mr Annan on 15 March. She recorded that he had:

> "… said he had talked to every member of the Security Council and governments across the world were ringing him saying surely one more effort at compromise was possible … all agree time too short and should not be automatic trigger to war."[229]

[229] Short C. An Honourable Deception: New Labour, Iraq and the Misuse of Power. The Free Press, 2004.

671. Ms Short also recorded that she had subsequently spoken to both Mr Brown and Mr Blair. She had told Mr Brown, who "kept on about French" that he should speak to Mr Annan. In response to a request for her view on announcing a UN lead on reconstruction in the Azores, she told Mr Blair that if war was inevitable that was all he had got. Mr Blair had said he would "still be open to other possibilities".

672. The FCO suggested that Mr Blair should talk to Mr Annan from the Azores with key messages including:

- Exploring the scope for any remaining diplomacy (if relevant), including the possibility of a final ultimatum to Saddam Hussein as the last window for a peaceful solution.
- Discouraging any further visits to Baghdad (as suggested by Iraq – see Box below), "whose only purpose would be to buy more time".
- Looking forward to the UN having "a significant role after any conflict in helping Iraq move quickly towards new prosperity and stability".
- Hoping that Mr Annan could "work to improve the atmosphere in the Council and keeping the UN steady".[230]

Iraqi actions

Iraq also sought to deflect military action.

Dr Blix wrote that a letter from Dr al-Sa'adi, Scientific Adviser to the Iraq Presidency who represented Iraq in its negotiations with the UN, inviting Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei to visit Baghdad to try to accelerate the inspections process and take note of the progress achieved, was received on 15 March.[231]

Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei had earlier concluded that any visit would need to be preceded by a declaration from Saddam Hussein and that they would come to discuss its implementation. Dr Blix informed Mr Annan, Ambassador Negroponte and Sir Jeremy Greenstock.

Dr Blix wrote that:

- Sir Jeremy responded quickly; the UK Foreign Office urged caution. The bars for a visit should be set high with the need not only for a declaration but also some "down payment".
- Ambassador Negroponte "discouraged" a visit.
- Mr Annan advised that Dr al-Sa'adi should be asked to clarify more precisely what he thought could be attained; and that the President of the Council should be informed.

On 16 March, Saddam Hussein was reported to have said that Iraq used to have weapons of mass destruction to defend itself against Iran and Israel, and that when he (Saddam) said he had no weapons "he means what he says".[232]

673. Mr Blair spoke to Mr Annan, who wanted to explore the scope for compromise, before the Azores Summit.[233]

674. Mr Blair reiterated his comment that an impasse had been reached:

> "There was no point in passing a resolution, which was not backed by force because Saddam would just ignore it. France had also rejected the tests Britain had put forward last week. The problem with the latest French proposal was that after allowing a further month of inspections, there would be yet another discussion and we would be back to where we started. Clear tests were needed … but the French would not accept that. It was very difficult to see a way through."

675. Mr Blair added that: "Saddam would only comply if there was a clear threat of force."

676. Mr Blair and Mr Annan also discussed the importance of a strong UN role in post-conflict Iraq, the need for a relationship between the UN and "whoever was occupying Iraq" and a resolution establishing the relationship between the occupying force and occupied Iraq.

THE AZORES SUMMIT, 16 MARCH 2003

677. At the Azores Summit it was agreed that unless there was a fundamental change in the next 24 hours, the UN process would end.

678. In public the focus was on a "last chance for peace". The joint communiqué contained a final appeal to Saddam Hussein to comply with his obligations and to the Security Council to back a second resolution containing an ultimatum.

679. When President Bush, Mr Blair, Mr Aznar and Mr Barroso met in the Azores, Mr Blair stated that the meeting:

> "… had to send a message that this was the final appeal to Saddam to comply, and to the Security Council to back a second resolution containing an ultimatum."[234]

680. They also discussed:

- The need to avoid an alternative resolution which might secure enough support to delay action.
- The likelihood that the invasion would be welcomed but the risk that there would be communal violence.
- The role the UN should play, including that it would not be able to deal with communal violence. That would need to be "handled rapidly by the military".
- The importance of pushing the peace process in the Middle East.
- The document on transatlantic security which they would issue.

[234] Letter Manning to McDonald, 16 March 2013, 'Iraq: Summit Meeting in the Azores: 16 March'.

681. Mr Blair said that:

> "The point of decision had arrived. It had been an agonising process going through the UN. But the justification had been that we had to look at every alternative before turning to military action. We should now be prepared to explain that continued non-compliance by Saddam Hussein could not be met by another discussion. We had made every effort … We had to explain yet again that unless there was effective pressure on Saddam, he would never comply. Yet the French and Russians made it impossible to bring that pressure to bear. We should now engage in a last round of final contacts, and appeal to the Security Council to take its responsibilities seriously."

682. Mr Blair added there was "24 hours to assess whether there had been a fundamental change … If not … we should be ready for military action". He would be content to ask Sir Jeremy Greenstock to take the draft resolution off the table "tomorrow morning 'if there had been no lightning strike'. He would do so on behalf of the three co-sponsors."

683. Mr Blair stated that the role of the UN in post-conflict Iraq must be defined very carefully:

> "We must give the impression that the administration was under UN authority. The clearer the UN role, the better. It was vital that UK public opinion understood that we were not taking possession of Iraq's oil."

684. Mr Blair also stated that the UN should be seen to give overall authorisation but it could certainly not run everything. He wanted the UN Security Council to remain seized of the Iraqi issue.

685. The record of the discussion was to be seen by Mr Straw and Mr Hoon and their Principal Private Secretaries.

686. Mr Campbell wrote:

- "Bush talked about it being a last effort. But he said it was important the world saw we were making every effort to enforce 1441. He said everyone had to be able to say we did everything we could to avoid war. But this was the final moment, the moment of truth, which was the line most of the media ran with. He stressed he wanted the UN to play an important role in the post-Saddam era. He was clear we had to emphasise Iraq's territorial integrity. He was emphasising he really would move on MEPP. He said again TB had been right to push him on the Road Map, and said he intended to spend a lot of time on this. He said re Chirac 'I don't want to provoke him into unreasonableness.' He was however keen to say he wanted the UN properly involved in the post-Saddam era …"

- "TB said we had reached the point of decision for people. We had been there before but there really had to be a decision. How many times could there be a last chance, serious consequences for material breach? He reported that Kofi [Annan] had said the French and Russians would not rule out force but would not agree to an ultimatum, which was an odd position. He really hit the UN buttons post-Saddam, and was trying to force Bush to go further on that. 'It has to be a UN-authorised government.' He was also hammering home the advantages on MEPP, but I wasn't convinced it would happen."
- "We needed some kind of process story so I suggested to TB they all instruct their ambassadors at the UN to have one last go, see if the position of the others had changed."
- "TB was constantly emphasising final appeal, final opportunity."
- "Bush was scathing re the Turks … He was pretty keen to get on with things now, wanted to pull down the SCR now. He then said he would address the American people tomorrow – say diplomacy had failed, issue the ultimatum. He said to TB we should say we were issuing one last set of instructions to UN ambassadors to have a go at securing agreement."
- "Aznar was really pushing the importance of the transatlantic alliance, but he was in even more political hot water on this than we were."[235]

687. The 'Vision for Iraq and the Iraqi People', issued at the Summit, and outlining the challenge Saddam Hussein posed to the world, stated:

- "Iraq's talented people, rich culture, and tremendous potential had been hijacked by Saddam Hussein", whose "brutal regime had reduced" Iraq "to an international pariah" that oppressed "its citizens, started two wars of aggression against its neighbours" and still posed "a grave threat to the security of the region and the world".
- "Saddam's defiance" of Security Council resolutions demanding disarmament had "undermined the authority of the UN". The international community had "tried to persuade him to disarm and thereby avoid military conflict, most recently through the unanimous adoption of resolution 1441". If he refused "even now to co-operate fully" with the UN, he brought "on himself the serious consequences foreseen in resolution 1441 and previous resolutions".
- "In these circumstances, we would undertake a solemn obligation to help the Iraqi people build a new Iraq at peace with itself and its neighbours. The Iraqi people deserve to be lifted from insecurity and tyranny, and freed to determine for themselves the future of their country. We envisage a unified Iraq with its territorial integrity respected. All the Iraqi people – its rich mix … should enjoy freedom, prosperity, and equality in a united country. We will support the Iraqi people's aspirations for a representative government that upholds human rights and the rule of law as cornerstones of democracy."

- "We will work to prevent and repair damage by Saddam Hussein's regime to the natural resources of Iraq and pledge to protect them as a national asset of and for the Iraqi people. All Iraqis should share the wealth generated by their national economy. We will seek a swift end to international sanctions, and support an international reconstruction program …"
- "We will fight terrorism in all its forms. Iraq must never again be a haven for terrorists any kind."
- "In achieving this vision, we plan to work in close partnership with international institutions, including the UN; our Allies and partners; and bilateral donors."
- "If conflict occurs we plan to seek … new … resolutions that would affirm Iraq's territorial integrity, ensure rapid delivery of humanitarian relief, and endorse an appropriate post-conflict administration for Iraq. We will also propose that the Secretary-General be given authority', on an interim basis, to ensure that the humanitarian needs of the Iraqi people continue to be met through the Oil-for-Food program."
- "Any military presence, should it be necessary, will be temporary and intended to promote security and elimination of weapons of mass destruction; the delivery of humanitarian aid; and the conditions for the reconstruction of Iraq. Our commitment to support the people of Iraq will be for the long term."
- "We call upon the international community to join with us in helping to realize a better future for the Iraqi people."[236]

Azores communiqué on Transatlantic Solidarity

The communiqué on transatlantic solidarity stated that:

- The Summit had been held "at a time of great challenge"; and that the four leaders faced "painful choices".
- They had reaffirmed their "commitment to our core values and the Transatlantic Alliance", which rested on "a common commitment to democracy, freedom and the rule of law". They were "bound by a solemn commitment to defend one another"; and they would "face and overcome together the twin threats of the 21st century: terrorism and the spread of weapons of mass destruction".
- Security was "tied to peace and security throughout the world".
- They were "working together to bring security to Afghanistan".
- They had affirmed "a vision of a Middle East peace in which two states, Israel and Palestine, will live side by side in peace, security, and freedom"; and they welcomed "the fact that the Road Map designed to implement this vision will soon be delivered …"

[236] The White House, 16 March 2003, Statement of the Atlantic Summit: A Vision for Iraq and the Iraqi People.

- They urged “friends and allies to put aside differences, and work together for peace, freedom and security”. The “friendship and solidarity between Europe and the United States” was “strong” and would “continue to grow in years to come”.[237]

688. In the press conference following the Summit, President Bush said that the following day would be the “moment of truth for the world”.[238] Nations had “voiced a commitment to peace and security” and now needed to demonstrate that “in the only effective way, by supporting the immediate and unconditional disarmament of Iraq”.

689. In response to questions, President Bush added:

- Saddam Hussein could “leave the country if he’s interested in peace … the decision is his to make”.
- His speech of 12 September 2002 had “called the UN into account” because he understood the “wars of the 21st century” were “going to require incredible international co-operation”. He hoped that the following day the UN would “do its job”.

690. Mr Blair emphasised the “key point” was “our responsibility to uphold the will of the United Nations set out in resolution 1441”, which had provided the final opportunity for Saddam Hussein to disarm and for “serious consequences” to follow if he failed to do so.

691. In an oblique reference to France, Mr Blair stated that there was an “impasse” where “some say there should be no ultimatum, no authorisation of force in any new resolution”. He added:

> “… without a credible ultimatum authorising force in the event of non-compliance, then more discussion is just more delay, with Saddam remaining armed with weapons of mass destruction …”

692. Mr Blair warned that Saddam Hussein was still playing “a game he has played over the last 12 years” and:

> “Disarmament never happens … instead the international community is drawn into some perpetual negotiation … but never real and concrete progress leading to disarmament.”

693. Mr Blair stated that “Nobody” was prepared to say there was “full co-operation” and drew attention to the absence of interviews outside Iraq and Iraq’s failure to provide evidence of the destruction of 10,000 litres of anthrax as the reason why the international community needed to give a "strong and unified message" that the "games had to stop". The UK would do all it could:

> "… in the short time that remains to make a final round of contacts to see if there is a way through this impasse. But … now is the time when we have to decide."

694. In response to a question, Mr Blair added:

> "So when people say we haven't exhausted all the diplomatic avenues, we tried … But … from our perspective and from the perspective of the security of the world, we cannot simply go back to the Security Council, for this discussion to be superseded by another discussion. That's what happened for 12 years …"

695. Dr Blix wrote that it seemed to him that there was a difference in tone between President Bush and Mr Blair.[239] The former had talked about "what a bright future Iraq would have if Saddam was taken out". Mr Blair had talked about "going the last mile for peace and the need for the UN to stop a proliferator". Dr Blix wrote: "Perhaps Blair still had some hope that Saddam would crack … if he was faced with a unanimous Council resolution."

696. Dr Blix recorded that Sir Jeremy Greenstock had "ventured" that the Azores Summit was "about peace rather than about war"; but that the declaration seemed to him to be "more belligerent than peaceful". Dr Blix commented that:

> "… the statement from the one-hour meeting was at this late stage perhaps less of an ultimatum to Saddam than one to the members of the Security Council – to support the resolution or be bypassed. The game was over … later that Sunday afternoon I got the call from … Washington saying that it was time to withdraw our inspectors from Iraq."

697. In his memoir, President Bush described the meeting as a "last-minute summit on diplomatic strategy" where they had "all agreed the diplomatic track had reached its end. We planned to withdraw the second resolution Monday morning."[240]

698. President Bush wrote:

> "I was deeply disappointed that diplomacy had failed but I had promised the American people, our allies and the world that we would enforce the UN resolutions. I was not going to break my word.
> "For months I had solicited advice … Some believed we could contain Iraq by keeping the inspectors in Iraq. But I didn't see how. If we were to tell Saddam he had another chance – after declaring this was his last chance – we would shatter our credibility and embolden him.

"Others suggested that the threat wasn't as serious as we thought … we had a warning like a blaring siren. Years of intelligence pointed overwhelmingly to the conclusion that Saddam had WMD. He had used them in the past. He had not met his responsibility to prove their destruction. He had refused to co-operate with the inspectors … The only logical conclusion was that he was hiding WMD. And given his support of terror and his sworn hatred of America, there was no way to know where those weapons would end up.

"Others alleged that America's real intent was to control Iraq's oil and satisfy Israel. Those theories were false. I was sending our troops into combat to protect the American people.

"I knew the cost would be high, but inaction had a cost, too. Given everything we knew, allowing Saddam to remain in power would have amounted to an enormous gamble. I would have had to bet that every major intelligence agency was wrong or that Saddam would have a change of heart. After seeing the horror of 9/11, that was not a chance I was willing to take. Military action was my last resort. But I believed it was necessary."[241]

699. Mr Blair described the Summit in his memoir as a:

"… slightly surreal event. On the face of it we were still pushing for a political solution. There were some last minute hopes of an Arab initiative to get Saddam out; or of a Saddam capitulation. George was content to adopt the line that we were going to hold out every last hope for peace …

"We rehearsed again the main arguments. He was completely calm. He thought we had to send out a message of total clarity to the world: have anything to do with WMD and we are going to come after you. More even than me, he was focused on the possibility of terrorist groups getting hold of WMD material: 'I am just not going to be the president on whose watch it happens' …"[242]

700. Mr Blair concluded:

"So when I look back … I know there was never any way Britain was not going to be with the US at that moment, once we went down the UN route and Saddam was in breach. Of course such a statement is always subject to in extremis correction. A crazy act of aggression? No, we would not have supported that. But given the history, you couldn't call Saddam a crazy target.

"Personally I have little doubt that at some point we would have to have dealt with him. But throughout I comforted myself, as I put it in the Glasgow speech, that if we were wrong, we would have removed a tyrant; and as a matter of general principle, I was in favour of doing that.

> "Nonetheless, I was also aware that the very split in international opinion meant that we were absolutely at the mercy of events … So as we left the Azores, I knew the die was cast. I was aware of my isolation … my total dependence on things going right not wrong … What's more this was the first time I would be committing troops to an action to topple a regime where we would be the junior partner, where we would not be in charge of the arrangements …
> "… I was calm … I was doing what I thought was right. But … I wished I wasn't doing it."

701. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that, on the way to the Azores, Mr Blair was "still angry at the way the US had handled it" and that he had said: "If we had been totally in charge of this, I am absolutely sure we could have won the French round." Mr Campbell "felt the US and France both, for different reasons did not want to meet on this".[243]

702. Commenting on the Summit, Mr Campbell wrote:

> "Everyone kept going on about it being 'the last effort for a political solution'. But there was more than a slight feeling of going through the motions."

703. Mr Campbell also wrote that Mr Blair "was still saying it was the right thing to do" and that he "had lost count of how many times" he "had heard those same words".

PRESIDENT CHIRAC'S INTERVIEW WITH CNN, 16 MARCH 2003

704. In an interview broadcast on CNN on 16 March, during the Azores Summit, President Chirac said that he hoped the Summit would recognise that inspections provided an effective system "to achieve our common goal … the disarmament of Iraq, elimination and destruction of her weapons of mass destruction".[244]

705. Asked about his bottom line for a compromise, President Chirac replied that was a matter for the inspectors. In his view, the Security Council had unanimously:

> "… decided to disarm Iraq peacefully through inspections for as long as the inspectors consider this possible."
> "We see today … that a lot of progress has been achieved … admittedly we haven't reached the goal, but the inspectors consider … that we have the possibility of reaching our goal without waging war. That is the goal I am seeking. I am totally ready to accept all the practical arrangements that the inspectors will suggest …"

706. Asked if he would be prepared to accept a 30- or 60-day deadline, President Chirac stated that the inspectors' advice must be accepted:

> "We have given them a mission and we have a moral and political obligation to accept their advice or else explain why we are not following it. But if we don't follow their advice, then only the Security Council can decide not to."

707. President Chirac added that it was in that spirit that France, Germany and Russia, "supported today by China", had proposed a Ministerial meeting of the Security Council to discuss the inspectors' proposed work programme.

708. President Chirac accepted that US and British military pressure had achieved a shift in Iraq's position, adding that he considered:

> "… the Americans have already won … without firing a shot… we should be thankful to them for exercising that effective pressure. But that doesn't mean that we have to wage war if it isn't necessary. And today, I don't think it's necessary."

709. Asked if it would have sent a stronger signal if France had also sent troops, President Chirac replied that "from the very beginning" France felt that the process of resolution 1441 "didn't embrace the possibility of war". That was why France was "refusing today, and I mean today, the prospect of war". If the strategy (of inspections) failed, France would "refuse no solution, including war".

710. Asked if his repeated vow to veto had strengthened and emboldened Saddam Hussein, President Chirac replied:

> "I don't think so at all and, in any case, it isn't a relevant problem today … there isn't a majority on the Security Council for war …"

711. Asked if he believed Iraq had chemical or biological weapons, President Chirac replied: "I don't know … we have no proof", but that was the task for the inspectors.

712. Asked in conclusion again why France hadn't sent troops to exert pressure on Saddam Hussein, President Chirac replied that the US on its own was "exerting all the pressure"; the British were "just making an additional contribution". He wanted to "limit the risks of war as far as possible". He was "not a pacifist", but "simply saying that war is the last resort when everything else has been done. And we are not in that situation."

713. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair said: "It was clear now … that the French did not intend to move."[245]

714. Mr Campbell also wrote that the briefing to the press on the aircraft on the way back from the Azores made "clear that the French had to come back and say whether there were any circumstances at all in which they might support military action".

The end of activity on the second resolution

715. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that he had agreed with his US and Spanish colleagues to tell the press "late the following morning" that there was no prospect of putting the resolution to a vote, and blaming France.

716. After the Azores Summit, Sir David Manning spoke to Sir Jeremy Greenstock to ask him to phone his Security Council colleagues that evening to establish whether there had been any change in their positions on the draft resolution.[246]

717. Sir Jeremy Greenstock subsequently reported that the UK Mission in New York had spoken to all Security Council colleagues with the message that:

> "… there was now a short time left to consider whether the Council could agree at last on an ultimatum to Saddam which, if he did not fulfil it, would result in serious consequences. If their respective governments were in a position to engage in such a discussion, I would need to hear it as early as possible on 17 March. When asked (as the majority did), I said that I had no (no) instructions as to whether to put the text … to a vote …"[247]

718. Sir Jeremy commented that the French and Russians did not like the message. Mr de La Sablière had claimed that the French had moved significantly over the last two days as President Chirac's interview would show. The "undecided 6" were "only slightly more positive".

719. Sir Jeremy also reported that he had agreed with his American and Spanish counterparts to tell the press during the "late morning" of 17 March that there was "no prospect of putting our resolution to the vote, casting heavy blame on the French". The key elements of the statement should be:

"(a) the Azores Summit had called for a last effort to see if the Council could unite around an ultimatum;

(b) having contacted every member it was clear that Council consensus was not possible within the terms of 1441, given the determination of one country in particular to block any ultimatum;

(c) we would therefore not be pursuing a vote;

(d) the Azores communiqué had made clear the positions of our governments on the way forward."

720. Sir Jeremy informed Mr Annan and Dr Blix that he would be receiving final instructions "eg on whether to stop pursuing the resolution on the morning [Eastern Standard Time] of 17 March".

721. Sir Jeremy asked for instructions and comments on a draft statement, writing: "I have assumed you will want to be fairly strong on the French."

722. Mr Campbell wrote that a meeting on 17 March between Mr Blair, Mr Prescott, Mr Brown, Mr Straw, Dr Reid and Ms Armstrong had:

> "… agreed Greenstock would put down the SCR at 10.15 New York time, that we would say at the 11[am briefing for the media] there would be a Cabinet at 4, Jack's statement later and also that the Attorney General would publish his view that there was a solid legal base for action. Jack would go through the motions of chatting to his opposite numbers but basically the game was up."[248]

723. Mr Straw spoke to Secretary Powell at lunchtime to brief him on the timetable for Sir Jeremy Greenstock's announcement of the end of the diplomatic route, Cabinet and his Parliamentary Statement.[249] Mr Straw also informed Secretary Powell that Lord Goldsmith had issued legal advice to the effect that a second resolution was not necessary for military operations.

MR BLAIR'S CONVERSATION WITH PRESIDENT BUSH, 17 MARCH 2003

724. Mr Blair discussed his efforts to rally political support in the UK with President Bush at 12.45pm on 17 March.[250] The publication of the Road Map and the public airing of the UN role post-conflict had had a positive effect. They also discussed the positions of Dr Blix and other members of the Security Council.

725. Mr Blair commented that: "It should not be forgotten how many times Saddam had given the UN supposed full and final declarations of his WMD." Keeping the UN "in play" was "a high priority with British opinion".

RUSSIA'S POSITION

726. Sir Roderic Lyne reported that President Putin had stated earlier that day that "a possible war in Iraq is a mistake fraught with the gravest consequences, which may result in casualties and destabilise the international system in general".[251]

727. Mr Straw telephoned Mr Ivanov at lunchtime to confirm that he was anxious that the UK and Russia should maintain good relations despite "current difficulties" and his hope that:

> "… even if military action appeared necessary, the UK and US could still make good use of the UN, especially on post-conflict reconstruction and relief."[252]

728. The FCO reported that Mr Ivanov had stated that Russia wanted to continue working under the aegis of the Security Council. The Council should discuss Dr Blix's report, which constituted a real action plan for Iraq's disarmament, in its meeting on 19 March. He would attend that meeting. The Azores meeting represented the views of only three states; it could not replace a Security Council meeting. No single country had the right to stop the work of the weapons inspectors, whose authority came from the UN. Recalling an assurance from Mr Blair to President Putin before the adoption of resolution 1441 that it did not imply the automatic use of force, Mr Ivanov stated that Russia's main condition remained that the Security Council should vote on any resolution sanctioning military action.

SIR JEREMY GREENSTOCK'S ANNOUNCEMENT, 17 MARCH 2003

729. At "about 3.15pm UK time" on 17 March, Sir Jeremy Greenstock announced that the resolution would not be put to a vote, stating that the co-sponsors reserved the right to take their own steps to secure the disarmament of Iraq.

730. At "about 3.15pm UK time",[253] Sir Jeremy Greenstock made a statement announcing that the UK, the US and Spain, as co-sponsors of the draft resolution, would not be pursuing a vote on it.[254]

731. Sir Jeremy stated:

> "… we have worked very hard in the last few days in a final effort to seek a Council consensus on Iraq. In an effort to reunite the Council the United Kingdom proposed last week an ultimatum which would challenge Iraq to take a strategic decision to disarm.
> "There were three key elements to the compromise we proposed …
> "Having held further discussions with Council Members over the weekend and in the last few hours, we have had to conclude that Council consensus will not be possible … One country in particular has underlined its intention to veto any ultimatum 'no matter what the circumstances'. That country rejected our proposed compromise before even the Iraqi government itself and has put forward suggestions that would row back on the unanimous agreement of the Council in 1441 – those suggestions would amount to no ultimatum/no pressure/and no disarmament.
> "The communiqués and press statements that issued at the Azores Summit explain the positions of our governments … The co-sponsors reserve their right to take their own steps to secure the disarmament of Iraq."

732. The subsequent discussion in the Council suggested that only the UK, the US and Spain took the view that all options other than the use of military force had been exhausted.

733. Sir Jeremy reported that he had "highlighted the particular role played by France – without naming her – in making agreement impossible". Mr de La Sablière had said shortly afterwards that the French position reflected the majority view in the Council.

734. In the subsequent Council meeting, which Sir Jeremy Green stock described as a "downbeat and rather surreal affair", France Germany and Russia continued to push for an open Council meeting at Ministerial level to consider and approve the work programme for the inspectors.[255]

735. Mr Lavrov said the statement by France, Russia and Germany on 15 March spoke for itself: "Inspections were actively under way and yielding results." He wanted to hear more from Dr Blix about recent steps by Iraq "on substance". The Council should meet at Ministerial level on 18 or 19 March to consider the work programme. Russia "took a different approach based on the concrete facts that disarmament was working".

736. Sir Jeremy reported that he had "regretted that it was not possible to find a way forward on an ultimatum that would both put pressure on Iraq to take the strategic decision to disarm and maintain inspections as the tool"; and stated that the UK:

> "… reserved the right to take steps that would deliver disarmament. While the prospects for peace were very slim, it was still possible even at this late hour for Saddam to take a strategic decision and the actions that would prove such a decision. In the circumstances, our national advice to UNMOVIC/IAEA and UN staff was that it would be prudent to suspend inspections and for staff to withdraw immediately … we remained interested in the 1284 work programme against the background of the slim possibility of a strategic decision by Iraq."

737. Sir Jeremy reported that Ambassador Negroponte told the Council that, given the threat of a veto, there had been no purpose in pursuing the resolution any further. The US had warned UNMOVIC and the IAEA the previous evening that it would be necessary to evacuate their personnel: "War was not imminent but it would not be possible to give further notice."

738. Mr de La Sablière was reported to have told the Council that:

> "At a time when inspections were making progress and peaceful disarmament in a limited time seems possible his delegation had indeed made clear that it would oppose a resolution authorising force. But it was not a veto when the co-sponsors did not have a majority – it was a straight no. The situation was serious but we should continue to work for even the slightest likelihood of a peaceful outcome … the Council should consider and approve the work programme and key tasks … It was up to the inspectors to set the timetable … if they said a month was necessary, France could live with that. In accordance with 1441 the Council would then evaluate the situation. Automaticity was difficult for the French, as for the majority, as it allowed for the use of force without a Council decision. We should continue to work for peaceful disarmament – the basis supported by the majority of the delegations and of the world."

739. Sir Jeremy also reported:

- Germany wanted the work programme to be discussed and approved: "As there was not much difference between the UK proposal and the key tasks, it could, even at this late hour, lead to consensus."
- Spain had "concurred" with Sir Jeremy's intervention.
- Syria had argued that there was another course which would have led to peaceful disarmament and supported the Russian position.
- China stated that if "withdrawing the resolution signalled a push for war, this was very regrettable. Avoiding war was in the interest of all sides."
- Chile "continued to believe that inspections and the persistent threat of force could have achieved peaceful disarmament". It had made a proposal "along the lines in the UK compromise and designed to bridge the gap between the different parties", but it had been "rejected within half an hour".
- Mexico stated that there was "no justification or implicit authorisation for the use of force".
- Bulgaria was "open to any initiative that might restore unity".
- Angola stated that it had "always believed that all alternatives should be exhausted before war. Unfortunately, this now appeared to be the case." If the proposed ministerial meeting "was just one more meeting we should let things calm down first. If it could help to find a way forward, even at this late hour, that was another matter."
- Cameroon appealed for dialogue, stating that the "failure to agree was a disservice to multilateralism and the Council". The draft Presidential statement from the "undecided six" would have been "a platform for compromise".
- Guinea "hoped for a miracle".
- Pakistan said that members should "continue to explore all possible approaches for a unified Council. The Council should accept the work programme and continue to appeal for a positive response from Iraq, even at this late stage."

740. In the light of misunderstandings in the Council, Sir Jeremy explained that the co-sponsors:

> "… were not withdrawing the resolution but, instead, not putting it to a vote. The key to any chance for diplomacy lay in our being convinced that Iraq would co-operate within the terms of 1441. The Council had failed to find that key and unlock the possibility of further inspections. On the authorisation for force … I would be circulating the view our Attorney General had given earlier that day."

741. Dr Blix told the Council that the UNMOVIC draft programme identifying key tasks would be available that afternoon, and that with a pro-active attitude it would take Iraq "months" to complete.

742. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that Dr Blix had told the Council that:

- UNMOVIC's draft work programme would be available that afternoon. It identified 12 key tasks. With a pro-active Iraqi attitude, all disarmament tasks would take months to complete.
- The UK had set out a smaller group of tasks and UNMOVIC would accept a time set down by the Council and then report for it to judge compliance. Some issues would take little time with Iraqi co-operation (eg interviews, missile destruction and UAVs). But others – anthrax and mobile labs – were more difficult: it would not take long to present materials if they existed, but it could take longer to prove their non-existence.
- While there had been pro-active Iraqi co-operation in recent days (including further efforts to convince UNMOVIC that anthrax/VX had been destroyed and footage of mobile sites), Dr Blix could not offer conclusions until he had a view from his experts.
- It was not clear whether the pro-active Iraqi co-operation covered all areas.[256]

743. Mr Annan announced the withdrawal of the inspectors.

744. Mr Annan told the Security Council that, following the US call to evacuate personnel, he had decided to withdraw:

- all UN humanitarian personnel from Iraq, which could lead to the suspension of the Oil-for-Food programme;
- UNMOVIC and IAEA inspectors; and
- troops and personnel in the UN Iraq-Kuwait Observation Mission (UNIKOM).[257]

745. Sir Jeremy commented that delegations would be waiting for President Bush's speech, but the "danger of blow-back in the Security Council and General Assembly" remained. He suggested that "it would be helpful to neutralise work programme arguments – e.g. by pointing to a post-conflict UNMOVIC/IAEA disarmament role".

746. In a press conference after the meeting, Mr Annan announced that he was withdrawing staff from Iraq following a warning from the US authorities the previous day "that it would be prudent not to leave our staff in the region".[258] Mr Annan also announced that several UN mandates, such as the Oil-for-Food programme, would be suspended, but the UN would "find a way of resuming our humanitarian activities" and to do "whatever we can to give them [the Iraqi population] assistance and support". Regardless of how the issue was resolved, the Security Council would have a role to play in post-conflict Iraq.

747. Mr Annan stated:

> "I have made it very clear that in my judgement if the Council were to be able to manage this process successfully and most of [sic] the collective will to handle this operation, its own reputation and credibility would have been enhanced. And I have also said if the action is to take place without the support of the Council, its legitimacy will be questioned and the support for it will be diminished."

748. In response to questions, Mr Annan stated that war was "always a catastrophe" and would lead to "major human tragedy":

> "… nobody wanted that and this was why we had hoped that the Iraqi leadership would have co-operated fully and would have been able to do this [disarm] without resort to the use of force. But the little window that we seem to have seems to be closing very, very fast. I am not sure at this stage the Council can do anything in the next couple of hours."

749. Sir Jeremy Greenstock's proposal to cast "heavy blame on the French" for the failure to reach agreement and his draft statement to the Security Council on 17 March were sent to No.10 and the FCO for clearance.

750. The terms of Sir Jeremy's statement about the position of France were almost unchanged from the draft text he had sent to London earlier that day asking for instructions and comments.[259]

751. Sir Jeremy subsequently told the Inquiry that, in making his statement to the Security Council on 17 March, casting blame on France, he "was acting under instructions".[260] The "basic telegram" drafting his statement had gone "backwards and forwards [between London and New York]", but he had spoken to Mr Straw by telephone on 16 March.

752. Having been notified of this point, Mr Straw told the Inquiry that he had:

> "… had the record checked. No-one can find any telegram of instructions to New York to say 'Blame the French'. None exist."[261]

753. Mr Straw added that he spoke frequently to Sir Jeremy on the telephone but Sir Jeremy did not "need instructions".[262] President Chirac's intervention spoke "for itself"; he had been "absolutely categorically saying" that, "the position of France this evening is that we will vote no". President Chirac's statement had undermined the UK's efforts.

MR IVANOV'S STATEMENT, 17 MARCH 2003

754. A statement issued on 17 March by Mr Ivanov said that:

- Russia had "firmly adhered" to an agreement made in a telephone call between President Putin and President Bush on 6 September 2002, to "jointly seek the unconditional return of inspectors to Iraq in accordance with UN Security Council resolutions mandating Iraq's disarmament".
- Russia had taken "a step towards Washington" by helping to pass resolution 1441 unanimously, and sought Iraq's "full co-operation and the meeting of all demands" made by UNMOVIC and the IAEA.
- Russia's position, which was "shared by most members of the Security Council and by other states, allowed the establishment of a reliable mechanism of inspections that would be able to disarm Iraq"; and: "Because of this pressure from the international community, disarmament is under way".
- In that context, "the idea of an imminent war against Iraq does not appear to be valid". It would involve "serious risks to all nations". "In speaking out for a political solution", Russia was "striving not only to overcome this particular crisis [Iraq] but also to push for continued joint efforts to solve other international problems that are no less acute".
- The relationship between Russia and the US was "marked by growing mutual trust and the spirit of co-operation"; including "an open and honest dialogue over the most complex issues". If Russia believed "that war against Iraq" would "lead to harsh consequences", it should "talk about it openly" with its partners in Washington. Eliminating the threat of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction by working with the US and other countries "and using political means" would be "true partnership".
- "The value of partners and allies" was "not that they automatically agree with one another but that they search together for solutions to solve problems in common interests". Striving for a political solution on Iraq was "in the best interests" of Russia, the US and the rest of the world.[263]

[261] Public hearing, 8 February 2010, page 95.
[262] Public hearing, 2 February 2011, pages 95-96.

755. Separately, Sir Roderic Lyne reported that Mr Ivanov's statement was:

> "… claiming that Iraq 'no longer presents a threat to international peace and security' and that 'under these conditions, the use of force against Iraq, particularly with references to the previous UNSC resolutions has absolutely no grounds, including legal'."[264]

756. Mr Ivanov had stressed that resolution 1441 gave "no one the right to an automatic use of force" and said that Russia wanted to ensure that the Security Council retained control of the situation.

IMPACT OF THE US MILITARY TIMETABLE

757. The US decision on the timing of military action determined the time available for diplomatic negotiations.

758. As the evidence in this and preceding Sections of the Report shows, the timetable available for diplomatic negotiations on the second resolution was determined by President Bush's decisions on the timing of military action.

759. Sir Jeremy Greenstock identified President Bush's decision on the timing of military preparations as the main factor leading to the end of the attempt to secure a second resolution.[265]

760. Sir Christopher Meyer, the British Ambassador to Washington from 1997 to February 2003, told the Inquiry that "when you looked at the timetable for the inspections, it was impossible to see how Blix could bring the inspection process to a conclusion for better or for worse by March".[266]

761. Sir Christopher added that had the effect of turning resolution 1441, which had been a challenge to Saddam Hussein, "on its head". The military timetable meant that the UK found itself "scrabbling for the smoking gun" to prove that Saddam Hussein was guilty.

762. Mr Jonathan Powell told the Inquiry that, from January 2003, the UK had repeatedly asked for, and been given, more time by President Bush; but by mid-March "he wasn't going to give us more time".[267]

763. Asked whether it was the need for the Armed Forces to move which set the deadline, Mr Powell replied: "Yes".[268]

764. Asked whether the approaches from France following President Chirac's remarks had made clear that it was not closed to the idea of continuing the inspections negotiation and, if this led to a particular result, voting for a resolution further down the track, Sir Jeremy Greenstock replied:

> "Yes, that's probably true. But we knew by 10 March, because we had been talking with the Americans all along about how much time we had for the benchmarks, that we didn't have time for that sort of escape route from what Chirac said."[269]

765. Asked about Mr Annan's report on 12 March that President Chirac was not closed to compromise, Sir Jeremy stated: "The Americans were closed to compromise."

766. Sir John Holmes told the Inquiry that the dialogue with France about a second resolution had continued after President Chirac's statement:

> "… but … it was becoming increasingly clear that this was a game without meaning at that point, because the military timetable was so close to fruition …"[270]

767. If the matter had been left to the Security Council to decide, military action might have been postponed.

768. In his statement for the Inquiry, Sir Jeremy Greenstock said that, "[I]t would have been in our interests to give the inspectors more time to find a smoking gun", and that the second resolution might have taken on a different shape or character on a different timing.[271]

769. Sir Jeremy thought it was "more than a 50 per cent chance that, if we had waited until October, the inspectors would not have found a satisfactory solution and that military force might well have been used at that point, the difference being the legitimacy involved in giving the inspectors the greater time".

770. Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that he believed "letting the inspections run longer … would have been a useful thing to do". He:

> "… regretted that this process ended when it did, but … by this stage, the United States was convinced these provisions were not working and it was also convinced that a second resolution was impossible because of the political backdrop, not least the suggestion that the French made that they would not approve any second resolution, so I think you get into a situation where there is impatience in Washington with the process and a determination to bring it to an end."[272]

771. Asked whether the suggestion by France and others to extend the period of inspections was "for real" or "purely tactical to hold off the invasion", Sir David responded:

"I don't know that I can be sure … there was an element of tactics and I think it is important to recall how bad political relationships were at the top among different governments at this time.

"One of the difficulties I felt … was the lack of communication between those who were on different sides of the argument and I think there was undoubtedly a tactical perception …

"I am not sure it was entirely tactical …"[273]

772. Sir David Manning subsequently told the Inquiry:

"It became clear in January and February that it was very, very tough. This is a period when relationships between leaders become very strained, and to a certain extent just break down, to be honest.

"The French sort of go into overdrive against the idea of the second resolution in February. The Americans tell us, well, we will get you the second resolution, we know the Prime Minister needs one, and are, I think, considerably surprised when they find actually they can't deliver a second resolution.

"And I think the degree to which emotion and anger are affecting the argument at the very top of Government during this period is very considerable.

"So it looked pretty bleak, to be honest. On the other hand, it seemed to me tempers might cool. It would have been dramatically changed, the whole tempo of the crisis, if Hans Blix had had a serious find, and initially it didn't look impossible."[274]

773. Sir David added:

"… if over a series of months we didn't find anything, then the mood would have changed anyway, and whether we needed to get a second resolution or rethink the whole crisis, at least you had a shot at that."

774. Asked if France would have been prepared to vote for a resolution authorising force if the process had been pursued to the point where Dr Blix might have reported that the process was exhausted, Mr Blair replied that in his judgement:

> "… it was very, very clear … the French, the Germans and the Russians had decided they weren't going to be in favour of this and there was a straightforward division … I don't think it would have mattered how much time we had taken, they weren't going to agree that force should be used."[275]

775. Mr Blair added that, if the inspectors had uncovered something "absolutely dramatic", that "might have made a difference" to France's position, but "there was by then a political divide on this, of a pretty fundamental nature".

776. Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

> "We never misrepresented the French view. The French view was perfectly clear. It wasn't that they were against any second resolution. They would perfectly happily have agreed a second resolution provided it meant a third resolution and they would have agreed a third resolution provided it meant a fourth one.
> "What they were not prepared to do in any set of circumstances, never mind ce soir, was that they were not prepared to agree to a resolution with an ultimatum."[276]

777. Mr Blair added that the UK was "caught" in a situation where the US was "quite rightly" saying that what France was "prepared to agree" was "basically a rerun of 1441 except possibly weaker"; and that was "useless".

778. Mr Blair stated that President Chirac's view was that inspections were working and that was the route to deal with Saddam Hussein; "we should not deal with him by force, whatever the circumstances". President Chirac's "point was not time", "His point was if it has an ultimatum in it, I don't want it."[277] Mr Blair added: "Anything with an ultimatum, they were going to veto."

The decision to take military action

779. On the morning of Monday 17 March, preparations for Cabinet later that day and Parliamentary debates the following day were put in place.

780. Mr Straw wrote to Parliamentary colleagues drawing their attention to the documents being published, the statements issued at the Azores Summit the previous day, and an FCO paper assessing Iraq's progress in meeting the provisions of resolution 1441.

781. Lord Goldsmith replied on the morning of Monday 17 March to a Written Question tabled by Baroness Ramsey of Cartvale (Labour):

> "To ask Her Majesty's Government what is the Attorney General's view of the legal basis for the use of force against Iraq."[278]

782. Mr Straw sent a copy of Lord Goldsmith's Written Answer to Mr Donald Anderson, Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee (FAC), on the morning of 17 March, together with an FCO paper giving "the legal background in more detail".[279]

783. Lord Goldsmith's Written Answer and Mr Straw's letter to the Chairman of the FAC, with a copy of Lord Goldsmith's Answer and a FCO paper which addressed the legal background, are addressed in Section 5.

784. To supplement the Command Paper of UN documents published in February (Cm 5769), Mr Straw published a further Command Paper (Cm 5785) with UN documents from early March.[280]

785. That comprised:

- Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei's statements to the Security Council on 7 March;
- Mr Straw's statement to the Security Council on 7 March;
- UNMOVIC's 12th quarterly report to the Security Council: and
- UNMOVIC's working document of "unresolved disarmament issues", the "clusters" document of 6 March 2003.

786. Mr Straw wrote to all Parliamentary colleagues with a copy of the FCO paper of 15 March on Iraq's non-compliance (considered earlier in this Section), a copy of his letter to the Chairman of the FAC, and copies of the statements made at the Azores Summit the previous day.[281]

787. Mr Straw wrote that the FCO paper, 'Iraqi Non-Compliance with UNSCR 1441', stated that Iraq had "failed to comply fully with 14 previous UN resolutions related to WMD" and assessed Iraq's "progress in complying with relevant provisions of UNSCR 1441 with illustrative examples".

THE MILITARY PLAN

788. A letter from Mr Hoon's Private Office to Sir David Manning on 17 March confirmed that the military plan took full account of the risks and problems identified by the JIC Note of 13 March, 'Saddam's Plan for Baghdad'.[282]

789. The MOD's objectives and plans for the military campaign, and the JIC's assessments of Iraq's capabilities and intent, and are addressed in Sections 6.2 and 8.

MR SCARLETT'S ADVICE, 17 MARCH 2003

790. In response to a request from Sir David Manning, Mr Scarlett provided advice on "the strength of evidence showing Saddam's possession of WMD".[283]

791. In relation to Iraq's chemical and biological weapons capability, Mr Scarlett concluded that the JIC view was clear: Iraq possessed chemical and biological weapons, the means to deliver them, and the capacity to produce them.

792. Mr Scarlett attributed the failure to find any significant evidence of chemical and biological weapons to Iraq's ability to conceal its activities and deceive the inspectors.

793. Mr Scarlett's advice is addressed in more detail in Section 4.3.

794. A draft of the document held by the MOD, also dated 17 March 2003, shows Sir David Omand, Cabinet Office Permanent Secretary and Security and Intelligence Co-ordinator, Sir Richard Dearlove, Chief of the Secret Intelligence Service (SIS), Sir Francis Richards, Director, Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ) and senior officials in the MOD, the FCO and the Cabinet Office as copy recipients.[284]

795. The Government was unable to find any evidence that the final version of Mr Scarlett's minute to Sir David Manning was sent to anyone outside No.10.[285]

Cabinet, 17 March 2003

796. A specially convened Cabinet at 1600 on 17 March 2003 endorsed the decision to give Saddam Hussein an ultimatum to leave Iraq and to ask the House of Commons to endorse the use of military action against Iraq to enforce compliance, if necessary.

797. Mr Blair told his colleagues that he had called the Cabinet because "an impasse" had been reached at the UN.[286]

798. The Government had tried its "utmost", and had "tabled a draft … resolution, amended it, and then been prepared to apply tests against which Iraq's co-operation … could be judged". Although the UK had been "gathering increasing support from members of the Security Council", the French statement "that they would veto a resolution in all circumstances had made it impossible to achieve a new … resolution". France, with Russia in support, "were not prepared to accept" that if Saddam Hussein "did not comply with the United Nations obligations, military action should follow". The UK was in a situation it had "striven to avoid": "There would be no second resolution and military action was likely to be necessary … to enforce compliance by Saddam Hussein with Iraq's obligations."

799. Mr Blair stated that the US "had now undertaken to produce a 'Road Map' for the Middle East Peace Process, once the new Palestinian Prime Minister's appointment had been confirmed". That would "open the way to a full and final settlement within three years". The US "had also confirmed" that it "would seek a UN mandate for the post-conflict reconstruction of Iraq", and: "Oil revenues would be administered under the UN's authority."

800. Mr Blair stated:

> "A lot of work was needed to repair the strains which had arisen internationally over the past few weeks. He regretted that the international community had sent mixed messages to Saddam Hussein, whose regime could have been disarmed peacefully if confronted by international solidarity. The blockage we had encountered in the United Nations impeded any progress."

801. Mr Straw said that Mr Blair:

> "… had persuaded President Bush … to go down the United Nations route in order to achieve the maximum authority for the disarmament of Iraq, but the diplomatic process was now at an end."

802. Mr Straw added:

> "Progress had been made towards forging a consensus before the French and Russians had indicated their intention to veto any Security Council resolution proposed which indicated that military action would follow Saddam Hussein's failure to comply. His assessment was that President Chirac of France had decided to open up a strategic divide between France and the United Kingdom; the row in Brussels in late 2002 had been manufactured. Effectively, one member of the Security Council had torpedoed the whole process."

803. Mr Straw concluded:

> "… the one chance now remaining to Saddam Hussein was to seek exile. If that course failed, the Government would seek the support of the House of Commons for military action against Iraq. There would be a substantive motion in a debate now scheduled for Tuesday [18 March].”

804. Lord Goldsmith told Cabinet that he had answered a Parliamentary Question in the House of Lords that day “on the authority for the use of force against Iraq”; and that Mr Straw had also sent a document “on the legal basis” to the FAC.

805. The minutes record that Lord Goldsmith informed Cabinet that:

“Authority existed from the combined effect of United Nations Security Council resolutions 678, 687 and 1441, all of which were adopted under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter. The latter allowed the use of force for the express purpose of restoring international peace and security … resolution 1441 determined that Iraq had been and remained in material breach of … resolution 687 and gave Iraq a final opportunity to comply with its disarmament obligations, warning of serious consequences if it did not do so. It was plain that Iraq had failed so to comply and therefore continued to be in material breach. The authority to use force under … resolution 678 was revived as a result … [R]esolution 1441 did not contain a requirement for a further … resolution to authorise the use of force.”

806. The points made during discussion included:

- the attitude of France “had undermined the mechanism of the United Nations to enforce the will of the international community”;
- with the removal of a tyrant and the new initiative on the MEPP, “a different Middle East was in prospect”;
- “after the strenuous efforts to find a diplomatic solution”, the Government “had enhanced its credibility by the integrity and consistency of its position on Iraq”;
- the Government’s supporters “needed a comprehensive statement to explain the position”: a second resolution “had been politically desirable but not legally essential”;
- “it was important to focus on Saddam’s failure to comply, and to avoid the impression that the failure to gain a further … resolution was the issue”;
- within the UK the views of all citizens had to be respected and a dialogue with the Muslim community maintained, “while setting out clearly the case for military action in the current circumstances”;
- failure to disarm Iraq “risked sending a message of encouragement to dictators and countries illegally holding weapons of mass destruction”;
- in conducting military operations, it would be important to show “we wished to protect civilians, seek the surrender of Iraqi conscripts, and protect religious and cultural sites”;
- the Government’s commitment to the UN was to make “its writ run” and to encourage its members to work within that framework;

- the "stalemate" in the UN "should prompt a new look at the international security architecture whose modernisation needed to be addressed";
- as occupation forces would be "restricted" in the action they could take, there was a legal necessity for a UN mandate for the reconstruction of Iraq;
- the "real test of the Government's credibility" would be the extent to which the MEPP was driven forward "and the manner in which the Iraqi people were cared for after the conflict"; and
- the Government "was motivated by a world view which promoted justice, good governance and pluralism and this set it apart from other governments of the industrialised world".

807. Mr Prescott stated that Mr Blair:

> "… had played a major role in upholding the credibility of the United Nations. French intransigence had thwarted success in taking the United Nations process to its logical conclusion. Nevertheless, the use of force against Iraq was authorised by existing … resolutions."

808. Mr Blair concluded that:

> "… the diplomatic process was now at an end. Saddam Hussein would be given an ultimatum to leave Iraq; and the House of Commons would be asked to endorse the use of military action against Iraq to enforce compliance, if necessary."

809. Cabinet: "Took note."

810. Mr Cook's decision to resign from the Government was announced during Cabinet, which he did not attend.[287]

811. Cabinet was provided with the text of Lord Goldsmith's Written Answer to Baroness Ramsey setting out the legal basis for military action.

812. That document represented a statement of the Government's legal position – it did not explain the legal basis of the conclusion that Iraq had failed to take "the final opportunity" to comply with its disarmament obligations offered by resolution 1441.

813. Cabinet was not provided with written advice which set out, as Lord Goldsmith's advice of 7 March had done, the conflicting arguments regarding the legal effect of resolution 1441 and whether, in particular, it authorised military action without a further resolution of the Security Council.

814. Cabinet was not provided with, or informed of, Mr Brummell's letter to Mr Rycroft of 14 March; or Mr Rycroft's response of 15 March. Cabinet was not told how Mr Blair had reached the view recorded in Mr Rycroft's letter.

815. The consideration of the legal basis for military action and the evidence from those present on the discussion of the legal issues in Cabinet is addressed in Section 5.

816. The majority of Cabinet members who gave evidence to the Inquiry took the position that the role of the Attorney General on 17 March was, simply, to tell Cabinet whether or not there was a legal basis for military action.

817. None of those Ministers who had read Lord Goldsmith's 7 March advice asked for an explanation as to why his legal view of resolution 1441 had changed.

818. There was little appetite to question Lord Goldsmith about his advice, and no substantive discussion of the legal issues was recorded.

819. Cabinet was, however, being asked to confirm the decision that the diplomatic process was at an end and that the House of Commons should be asked to endorse the use of military action to enforce Iraq's compliance. Given the gravity of this decision, Cabinet should have been made aware of the legal uncertainties.

820. Lord Goldsmith should have been asked to provide written advice which fully reflected the position on 17 March, explained the legal basis on which the UK could take military action, and set out the risks of legal challenge.

821. Mr Blair and Mr Straw continued to attribute the primary responsibility for the failure to secure support in the Security Council to France's statements that it would veto a resolution setting an ultimatum for Iraq to demonstrate that it was co-operating as required by resolution 1441.

822. As the evidence in this Section shows, the Security Council was deeply divided and China, France and Russia, and others, took the view that options other than the use of military force had not yet been exhausted.

823. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that Mr Blair had told Cabinet that "an impasse was an impasse" and that the "French block" was "not conditional but absolute".[288]

824. In his memoir, Mr Blair wrote:

> "Apart from Clare Short, the Cabinet were supportive. All my most loyal people weighed in. As ever on these occasions, John Prescott was a rock. Derry Irvine [Lord Irvine of Lairg, the Lord Chancellor] came in with a very helpful intervention saying that if France had not threatened to veto any resolution authorising action, we could probably have got a second resolution and the problem was that we had tried so hard to get a second resolution that people assumed, wrongly, that we needed one legally."[289]

825. In his memoir, Mr Prescott wrote that:

"Apart from Clare and Robin, everyone understood and accepted what was happening. Although we all had worries, we tended to go along with the feeling that we were stuck with Bush. Tony couldn't walk away. We were blaming the French, for backing out of supporting an invasion, but we knew the Americans would go in whatever happened, so the French didn't really matter.

"Our relationship with the US had always been fundamental. All British prime ministers have to decide whether we're with the US or not. And Tony had decided we were. Most of us agreed with that, deep down. During the run-up to the invasion, we all had our own reservations, and we were genuinely trying to delay an actual invasion, and go the UN route, if not stop it altogether, for as long as possible. But once it was inevitable we felt that was it.

"My attitude was that Tony, having made up his mind, should be supported. I took one of the Cabinet meetings on Iraq and got quite carried away, saying it was vital to stick together. We should do the brave thing, not be cowards."[290]

826. Lord Boateng, Chief Secretary to the Treasury from 2002 to 2005, told the Inquiry that he had been "governed by a desire" that he sensed was shared with colleagues that "military action should be a last resort" and that it was not until Cabinet on 17 March:

"… when it was clear that all other options had been exhausted and where we had the benefit of legal opinion … that I formed the firm view that it was now inevitable."[291]

Statements to Parliament, 17 March 2003

MR STRAW'S STATEMENT, 17 MARCH 2003

827. In his Statement to the House of Commons that evening, Mr Straw said the Government had reluctantly concluded that France's actions had put a consensus in the Security Council on a further resolution "beyond reach".

828. As a result of Saddam Hussein's persistent refusal to meet the UN's demands, Cabinet had decided to ask the House of Commons to support the UK's participation in military action should that be necessary to achieve the disarmament of Iraq "and thereby the maintenance of the authority of the United Nations".

829. Mr Straw stated that Lord Goldsmith's Written Answer "set out the legal basis for the use of force".

830. Mr Straw drew attention to the significance of the fact that no one "in discussions in the Security Council and outside" had claimed that Iraq was in full compliance with its obligations.

831. Mr Straw made a statement to the House of Commons at 8.24pm.[292]

832. Referring to the statement issued at the Azores Summit calling on all members of the Security Council to adopt a resolution challenging Saddam Hussein to take a strategic decision to disarm, Mr Straw told the House of Commons:

> "Such a resolution has never been needed legally, but we have long had a preference for it politically."

833. Mr Straw stated that there had been "intense diplomatic activity to secure that end over many months, culminating in the last 24 hours". Despite "final efforts" by Sir Jeremy Greenstock the previous evening and his own conversations with his "Spanish, American, Russian and Chinese counterparts that morning", the Government had:

> "… reluctantly concluded that a Security Council consensus on a new resolution would not be possible. On my instructions, Sir Jeremy Greenstock made a public announcement to that effect at the United Nations at about 3.15pm UK time today."

834. Mr Straw continued that, since the adoption of resolution 1441 in November 2002, he, Mr Blair and Sir Jeremy Greenstock had "strained every nerve" in search of a consensus "which could finally persuade Iraq by peaceful means, to provide the full and immediate co-operation demanded by the Security Council".

835. Mr Straw stated that it was significant that "in all the discussions in the Security Council and outside" no-one had claimed that Iraq was "in full compliance with the obligations placed on it"; and:

> "Given that, it was my belief, up to about a week ago, that we were close to achieving a consensus that we sought on the further resolution. Sadly, one country then ensured that the Security Council could not act. President Chirac's unequivocal announcement last Monday that France would veto a second resolution containing that or any ultimatum 'whatever the circumstances' inevitably created a sense of paralysis in our negotiations. I deeply regret that France has thereby put a Security Council consensus beyond reach."

[292] House of Commons, Official Report, 17 March 2003, columns 703-705.

836. Mr Straw told the House of Commons that the proposals submitted by France, Germany and Russia for "more time and more inspections" sought to "rewrite" resolution 1441. They "would have allowed Saddam to continue stringing out inspections indefinitely, and he would rightly have drawn the lesson that the Security Council was simply not prepared to enforce the ultimatum … at the heart of resolution 1441".

837. Mr Straw pointed out that "in the event of non-compliance" Iraq should, as OP13 of resolution 1441 spelled out, expect "serious consequences". Mr Straw stated:

> "As a result of Saddam Hussein's persistent refusal to meet the UN's demands, and the inability of the Security Council to adopt a further resolution, the Cabinet has decided to ask the House to support the United Kingdom's participation in military operations, should they be necessary, with the objective of ensuring the disarmament of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, and thereby the maintenance of the authority of the United Nations."

838. Mr Straw confirmed that Parliament "would have an opportunity to debate our involvement in military action prior to hostilities" the following day; and that the debate would be on a substantive motion "proposed by the Prime Minister and Cabinet colleagues". He also drew the attention of the House to Lord Goldsmith's Written Answer, which "set out the legal basis for the use of force against Iraq" and the documents provided earlier that day.

839. Mr Straw concluded:

> "Some say that Iraq can be disarmed without an ultimatum, without the threat or the use of force, but simply by more time and more inspections. That approach is defied by all our experience over 12 weary years. It cannot produce the disarmament of Iraq; it cannot rid the world of the danger of the Iraq regime. It can only bring comfort to tyrants and emasculate the authority of the United Nations …"

840. Mr Ancram responded that diplomacy was "at an end" and there was the "grim prospect of war … because Saddam Hussein has contemptuously failed to take the final opportunity … offered him". There had been "a chance that a clear, unequivocal and united voice from the international community might … have persuaded him to disarm or to go. France put paid to that. I hope that in Paris they will reflect tonight on what they have achieved."[293]

841. Mr Ancram stated: "Saddam Hussein, in possession of weapons of mass destruction, is a threat to international peace and security… including ourselves. That is why we believe that action to disarm him can no longer be delayed."

---

[293] House of Commons, Official Report, 17 March 2003, columns 705-706.

842. Mr Ancram concluded:

> "Our thoughts tonight must be with our Armed Forces … they have our unqualified support. We will offer the Government our support in the decisions that must now be made. We will do so because they have reached the same conclusions as us on the threat posed by Saddam Hussein and the legality of taking action. We believe they are acting in the national interest and as long as that is the case we will continue to support them. Her Majesty's Opposition will do what in our hearts we know for our country to be right."

843. In response to a question from Mr Moore about the implications of taking action without the backing of the Security Council and allowing inspections to continue, Mr Straw agreed that it would have been better to achieve a consensus in the UN. He also stated that France and Russia had agreed the process in resolution 1441:

> "… if Iraq was in further material breach, which it has been for weeks, setting out further discussions in the Security Council, which have already taken place; and … if Iraq failed to comply, serious consequences would follow."[294]

844. The provisions required by resolution 1441 were examined in depth by Lord Goldsmith in his advice of 7 March, which is addressed in Section 5.

845. Asked about his statement to the House of Commons on 17 March that it was his "belief, up to about a week ago, that we were close to achieving a consensus that we sought on the further resolution", Mr Straw told the Inquiry:

> "My point … was accurate. I didn't say we had a consensus. I said we were close to it."[295]

846. Mr Straw's statement was repeated in the House of Lords by Baroness Symons of Vernham Dean, the joint FCO/Department of Trade and Industry (DTI) Minister for Trade and Investment.[296]

847. In reply to the points made in response to her statement, Baroness Symons made a number of comments, including:

> "… I believe that the legality of the position is indeed settled. I do not think we have ever had such a clear statement from the Attorney General at a juncture like this."[297]

848. Subsequently, Baroness Symons stated that the Government "had gone further than any Government" to put the "advice" into the public arena, and that Lord Goldsmith had "given a clear statement of his opinion".[298]

849. Baroness Symons' statement took place during a debate on the legality of the use of armed force. In closing the debate, Baroness Symons again stated that Lord Goldsmith had published his "advice".[299]

850. As Section 5 explains, the Written Answer was not Lord Goldsmith's advice or his legal opinion.

851. Other points raised during the debate on the legality of the use of armed force are set out in the Box below.

House of Lords debate on the legality of the use of armed force, 17 March 2003

The House of Lords debated the legality of the use of armed force on the evening of 17 March.

Opening the debate, Lord Goodhart (Liberal Democrat) set out his view of the legality of the use of force in Iraq without the specific authority of a further resolution of the Security Council. Commenting on the summary of Lord Goldsmith's legal advice to the Government he stated:

> "… we should have liked to see much more detail of what must have been a lengthy opinion … All we have seen is the baldly stated summary. We also regret that the … Attorney General has not given us the opportunity to ask questions and to hear his answers.
> "The Attorney General's opinion reaches a highly questionable conclusion, which is based on a dubious interpretation of deliberately ambiguous wording.
>
> "Both the United States and British Ambassadors to the United Nations when resolution 1441 was adopted said that it contained no automaticity. I believe that there was a clear understanding that resolution 1441 did not confer a right of action without referring back to the Security Council. Unless there had been such an understanding, it would have been difficult if not impossible to get resolution 1441 through the Security Council.
> "A final decision on the use of armed force requires judgement as to the seriousness of the breaches by Iraq, the effectiveness of the inspection system and whether the breaches could be corrected by means short of war. Those are difficult decisions. The Attorney General is arguing that the Security Council has delegated those decisions to the United Kingdom and the United States of America – in effect, to the US alone. I do not believe that that is the kind of decision that the Security Council could, or would, delegate to any one member, however powerful. A decision to use armed force under Article 42 in full scale war is the most solemn decision that the Security Council can ever take. The idea that vague and ambiguous words in those [299] House of Lords, Official Report, 17 March 2003, column 1117.

> resolutions can be read as implying a delegation to the United States, with or without the United Kingdom, to take these decisions verges on the absurd."[300]

A range of views was expressed by speakers during the ensuing debate.

Lord Mayhew (Conservative) described the United Nations as "a relatively new jurisdiction".[301] The world was far from having "an article or precedent" for every situation it faced. As a result, there would often be arguments "which it would take years to litigate in any international court to an authoritative conclusion". He concluded that UN member states "must sometimes have the courage to act when the law may not be explicitly cut and dried and to bear the heavy duty themselves for doing what they conscientiously believe to be necessary and lawful."

Lord Mayhew stated that, because the cease-fire established under resolution 687 was conditional, it had left resolution 678 undischarged: "in force, but … placed in abeyance or suspension provided Iraq fulfilled its obligations and continued to fulfil the conditions". Because Iraq had never complied with those conditions, resolution 678 was no longer in abeyance, but available. Those who refused to agree a further resolution were entitled to make that choice, but it could not have the effect of a veto on the operation of resolution 678.

Lord Hannay, a former UK Permanent Representative to the United Nations, stated that resolution 1441 had not, on its own, provided authority for the use of force in the event of non-compliance because it had not needed to.[302] The authority already existed in resolution 687. That there had been Iraqi non-compliance since resolution 687 was "surely not seriously in doubt". That there had been some limited compliance was not the point. Unfortunately, the Security Council had "fallen prey to divided counsels". The purpose of the draft second resolution had been political, not legal: "to draw a line under the phase on non-compliance with Security Council resolution 1441 and to signal that serious consequences were now imminent."

Lord Hannay concluded that military action by the UK, the US and other allies:

> "… does not herald either a new doctrine bypassing the system laid down in the UN Charter, nor the flouting of international law. In fact, it is far less daring than was the decision by NATO to use force against Yugoslavia in the case of Kosovo …"

Lord Howell (Conservative) stated that the question of legality "ought to have been settled long before we reached the point at which the troops are going into action".[303] There was "no doubt" that the case for intervention had been "poorly put forward", adding greatly to tensions.

Lord Lloyd of Berwick, a former Law Lord, stated that he found it "impossible as presently advised" to accept the argument offered by Lord Goldsmith in his Written Answer to Baroness Ramsey.[304]

Responding to points raised during the debate, Baroness Symons set out the Government's position, including by reference to previous occasions since 1991 when force had been used in Iraq.[305] She stated that resolution 1441:

> "… provided for any failure by Iraq to be 'considered' by the Security Council under paragraph 12. That consideration has taken place regularly since the adoption of resolution 1441. It is plain from UNMOVIC statements … that Iraq has not complied, as required, with its disarmament obligations. Whatever other differences there may be on the Security Council, no member of the Council has questioned that conclusion. It follows that Iraq has not taken the final opportunity offered and remains in material breach …"

MR COOK'S RESIGNATION STATEMENT, 17 MARCH 2003

852. In a statement later that evening, Mr Cook set out his doubts about the degree to which Saddam Hussein posed a "clear and present danger" and his concerns that the UK was being "pushed too quickly into conflict" by the US without the support of the UN and in the face of hostility from many of the UK's traditional allies.

853. Mr Cook set out the reasons why he could not "support a war without international agreement or domestic support" and why, in order to vote against military action in the House of Commons the following day, he had resigned from the Government.[306]

854. Mr Cook applauded the "heroic efforts" of Mr Blair and those of Mr Straw in seeking to secure a second resolution, but pointed out:

> "… the very intensity of those attempts underlines how important it was to succeed. Now that those attempts have failed, we cannot pretend that getting a second resolution was of no importance.
> "France has been at the receiving end of bucket-loads of commentary in recent days. It is not France alone that wants more time for inspections … We delude ourselves if we think that the degree of international hostility is all the result of President Chirac. The reality is that Britain is being asked to embark on a war without agreement in any of the international bodies of which we are a leading partner …
> "To end up in such diplomatic weakness is a serious reverse. Only a year ago, we and the United States were part of a coalition against terrorism that was wider and more diverse than I would ever have imagined possible. History will be astonished at the diplomatic miscalculations that led so quickly to the disintegration of that powerful coalition. The US can afford to go it alone … Our interests are best protected not by > unilateral action but by multilateral agreement and a world governed by rules. Yet tonight the international partnerships most important to us are weakened … Those are heavy casualties in a war in which a shot has yet to be fired."

855. Dismissing any parallels with the action in Kosovo in 1999, where there had been multilateral support and the need to respond to an urgent and compelling humanitarian crisis, Mr Cook stated:

> "Our difficulty in getting support this time is that neither the international community nor the British public is persuaded that there is an urgent and compelling reason for this military action in Iraq.
> "The threshold for war should always be high. None of us can predict the death toll of civilians …"

856. Mr Cook continued:

> "Nor is it fair to accuse those of us who want longer for inspections of not having an alternative strategy … Over the past decade that strategy [of containment] had destroyed more weapons than in the Gulf War, dismantled Iraq's nuclear weapons programme and halted Saddam's medium and long range missile programmes."

Iraq's military strength was now less than half its size in 1991; and, "Ironically" it was "only because Iraq's military forces" were "so weak that we can even contemplate its invasion".

857. Mr Cook questioned the threat posed by Iraq:

> "Iraq probably has no weapons of mass destruction in the commonly understood sense of the term – namely a credible device capable of being delivered against a strategic city target. It probably … has biological toxins and battlefield chemical munitions, but it has had them since the 1980s when US companies sold Saddam anthrax agents and the then British government approved chemical and munitions factories. Why is it now so urgent that we should take military action to disarm a military capacity that has been there for twenty years, and which we helped to create? Why is it necessary to resort to war this week, while Saddam's ambition to complete his weapons programme is blocked by the presence of UN inspectors?"

858. Drawing attention to the lack of action in the face of Israel's refusal to comply with resolution 242 (1967) demanding its withdrawal from the Occupied Territories, Mr Cook warned of the "strong sense of injustice throughout the Muslim world" as a result of the perception that there was "one rule for the allies of the US and another rule for the rest". He added:

> "Nor is our credibility helped by the appearance that our partners in Washington are less interested in disarmament than they are in regime change in Iraq. That explains why any evidence that inspections may be showing progress is greeted in Washington not with satisfaction but with consternation: it reduces the case for war."

859. Mr Cook concluded that the British people:

"… do not doubt that Saddam is a brutal dictator, but they are not persuaded that he is a clear and present danger to Britain. They want inspections to be given a chance, and they suspect that they are being pushed too quickly into conflict by a US Administration with an agenda of its own. Above all they are uneasy at Britain going out on a limb on a military adventure without a broader international coalition and against the hostility of many of our traditional allies."

860. Mr Cook's account of his view of the September dossier and the briefing he was given in February 2003 by Mr Scarlett are addressed in Sections 4.2 and 4.3 respectively.

Ms Short's letter, 18 March 2003

Ms Short sent a letter to colleagues in the Parliamentary Labour Party the following morning, explaining her reasons for deciding to support the Government.[307] She wrote that there had been "a number of important developments over the last week", including:

> "Firstly, the Attorney General has made clear that military action would be legal under international law. Other lawyers have expressed contrary opinions. But for the UK Government, the civil service and the military, it is the view of the Attorney General that matters and this is unequivocal."

President Bush's ultimatum to Saddam Hussein, 17 March 2003

861. President Bush issued an ultimatum giving Saddam Hussein 48 hours to leave Iraq.

862. The British Embassy Washington reported that the US media had:

"… recognised the Azores outcome as the beginning of the end game, and declared the diplomatic process dead even before we announced the end in the Security Council … Both the Washington Post and the New York Times referred to the US and its allies 'going through the motions'."[308]

863. The Embassy wrote that US commentators were:

"… already apportioning blame for the Administration's failure to muster international support …

"The longer-term fallout from almost six months of activity at the UN would probably only be clear once the war is over. But the media has already gone into analysis mode. One of the larger issues is whither US/UN relations. Powell said today that the UN would survive, but was equally clear that the UNSC had failed a crucial test … the Administration hawks who cautioned Bush against the UN route last summer are sourcing stories making their opposition at that time clear."

864. The Embassy also reported that US public support for war had risen to its highest level since November 2001, "though support would drop to 47 percent without a second resolution". Mr Blair's role had "won fulsome praise from some unexpected quarters".

865. Secretary Powell announced in his morning press conference on 17 March that President Bush would issue an ultimatum during his address to the nation that evening calling for Saddam and his cohorts to leave Iraq.[309]

866. In an "Address to the Nation" at 8pm Eastern Standard Time on 17 March, President Bush stated that "the final days of decision" had been reached and issued an ultimatum giving Saddam Hussein and his sons 48 hours to leave Iraq.[310]

867. President Bush stated that the world had "engaged in 12 years of diplomacy" and "sent hundreds of weapons inspectors to oversee the disarmament of Iraq" but:

"Our good faith has not been returned.

"The Iraqi regime has used diplomacy as a ploy to gain time and advantage … Peaceful efforts to disarm the Iraqi regime have failed … because we are not dealing with peaceful men.

"Intelligence gathered by this and other governments leaves no doubt that the Iraqi regime continues to possess and conceal some of the most lethal weapons ever devised …

"The regime has a history of reckless aggression … It has a deep hatred of America and our friends. And it has aided, trained and harbored terrorists, including operatives of Al Qaida.

"The danger is clear: using chemical, biological or, one day, nuclear weapons, obtained with the help of Iraq, the terrorists could fulfill their stated ambitions and kill hundreds of thousands of innocent people …

"… Before the day of horror can come, before it is too late to act, this danger will be removed.

"The United States of America has the sovereign authority to use force in assuring its own national security. That duty falls to me …

[310] The White House, 17 March 2003, President says Saddam Hussein must leave within 48 hours.

> "Recognizing the threat to our country, the United States Congress voted overwhelmingly last year to support the use of force against Iraq. America tried to work with the United Nations to address this threat because we wanted to resolve this issue peacefully. We believe in the mission of the United Nations. One reason the UN was founded … was to confront aggressive dictators, actively and early …
> "In the case of Iraq, the Security Council did act, in the early 1990s. Under resolutions 678 and 687 – both still in effect – the United States and our allies are authorized to use force in ridding Iraq of weapons of mass destruction. This is not a question of authority, it is a question of will."

868. President Bush continued that he had "urged the nations of the world to unite and bring an end to this danger" and the Security Council had unanimously passed resolution 1441. But:

> "… no nation could possibly claim that Iraq has disarmed. And it will not disarm as long as Saddam holds power as required … some permanent members of the Security Council have publicly announced that they will veto any resolution that compels the disarmament of Iraq. These governments share our assessment of the danger, but not our resolve to meet it. Many nations … do have the resolve and fortitude to act against this threat to peace … The United Nations Security Council has not lived up to its responsibilities, so we will rise to ours."

869. Issuing the ultimatum, President Bush stated:

> "In recent days, some governments in the Middle East have been doing their part. They have delivered public and private messages urging the dictator to leave Iraq, so that disarmament can proceed peacefully. He has thus far refused. All the decades of deceit and cruelty have now reached an end. Saddam Hussein and his sons must leave Iraq within 48 hours. Their refusal to do so will result in military conflict …"

870. In a message to Iraqis, President Bush stated:

> "If we must begin a military campaign, it will be directed against the lawless men who rule your country and not against you … The day of your liberation is near.
> "… It is not too late for the Iraqi military to act with honor and protect your country by permitting the peaceful entry of Coalition forces to eliminate weapons of mass destruction …"

871. President Bush explicitly warned all Iraqis against destroying oil wells or using weapons of mass destruction: "War crimes will be prosecuted. War criminals will be punished."

872. President Bush acknowledged that military action could expose the US and its allies to an increased possibility of attack and that additional security measures had been put in place. He concluded:

> "We are now acting because the risk of inaction would be greater … Saddam Hussein and his terrorist allies could choose the moment of deadly conflict when they are strongest. We choose to meet that threat now …
> "… a policy of appeasement could bring destruction of a kind never before seen on this earth.
> "… responding to such enemies only after they have struck first is not self-defense, it is suicide. The security of the world requires disarming Saddam Hussein now.
> "As we enforce the just demands of the world, we will also honor the deepest commitments of our country. Unlike Saddam Hussein, we believe the Iraqi people are deserving and capable of human liberty. And when the dictator has departed, they can set an example to all the Middle East of a vital and peaceful and self-governing nation.
> "The United States, with other countries, will work to advance liberty and peace in that region. Our goal will not be achieved overnight, but it can come over time. The power and appeal of human liberty is felt in every life and every land. And the greatest power of freedom is to overcome hatred and violence and turn … to the pursuits of peace.
> "That is the future we choose. Free nations have a duty to defend our people by uniting against the violent. And tonight, as we have done before, America and our allies accept that responsibility."

873. The British Embassy Washington reported that President Bush "looked nervous but the message was uncompromising. Only a complete climb down by Saddam can now prevent war."[311]

874. A later telegram reported that a White House spokesman had "amplified" the President's statement and said that, if Saddam Hussein were to comply with the deadline and go into exile, US troops would still enter Iraq in order to pursue and disarm WMD; and that he hoped the international community would consider prosecuting Saddam Hussein for war crimes even in the case of exile.[312]

875. The Embassy also reported that "some 66 percent of Americans told Gallup that they supported Bush's intention to attack if Saddam did not leave within 48 hours"; and that "around 68 percent … agreed that the US had done everything possible to solve the crisis diplomatically". A "vocal minority, including the Democratic … leadership" did not support President Bush.

876. Separately, the Embassy reported that President Bush had decided to publish the names of nine Iraqis who were regarded as either war criminals or having decisive command and control responsibilities.[313]

877. Mr Naji Sabri, the Iraqi Foreign Minister, rejected the US ultimatum.[314]

878. On the morning of 17 March, Mr Campbell had written to Mr Bartlett setting out the planned timetable for announcements, and commenting that: "By tonight, things will be pretty febrile."[315]

879. Mr Campbell predicted that the debate in Parliament the following day would be difficult: "the rebellion looks bigger than last time". He warned Mr Bartlett of the potential that:

> "If our MPs wake up to 'Bush tells Saddam: go into exile or face war' we'll hold most of our people. If they wake up to 'Bush: we're at war' with the ultimatum drowned out, with no mention of humanitarian, or MEPP etc, we'll be in trouble. It'll be hard for the President to win people back for us, but he could push some of our wobblers over the edge."

880. Mr Blair wrote in his memoir that the ultimatum had the UK's "changes all taken on board", and that it was "balanced not bellicose", "strongly supportive of the Iraqi people"; "And, critically for me, it played up the Middle East Peace Process."[316]

AUSTRALIA COMMITS TROOPS

881. In response to a formal request from President Bush, "shortly after 0600 local time", for Australia to participate in any military intervention in Iraq should Saddam Hussein not respond to the ultimatum and an "immediate" meeting of the Australian Cabinet, Mr Howard announced that a decision had been taken to commit Australian troops, and that:

> "… the Government strongly believed the decision taken was right, it was legal, it was directed towards the protection of the Australian national interest."[317]

882. Mr Howard also stated that the Iraq issue was one of morality and not just legality. He agreed to table immediately in Parliament the text of the legal advice to the Australian Government which he said was consistent with the advice given to the British Government by Lord Goldsmith.

PRESIDENT CHIRAC'S STATEMENT

883. President Chirac maintained his position that the UN route had not been exhausted and the Security Council should explicitly authorise the use of force. The US was taking unilateral action against the will of the international community.

884. Sir John Holmes reported on 17 March that France was taking UK "criticism on the chin for the moment", and was saying that it would be ready to help in the post-conflict period, "but the greater the UN role, the easier it will be for them".[318] Senior advisers to Mr de Villepin and Mr Jean-Pierre Raffarin, the French Prime Minister, understood the UK position but had "made clear that they regretted nothing, and believed that they had acted perfectly consistently throughout". Mr de Villepin's "clear view was that France should not stoop to respond to our criticism, but the Elysée were less calm".

885. Sir John concluded:

> "The French shifted a little as we approached the wire. Villepin's acceptance of our six tests when he spoke to you [Straw] … was particularly interesting, given his previous sharp public rejection. But all this was far too little, far too late: positioning rather than a genuine effort at agreement. The French know they are now cast as scapegoats but, at least for the time being, seem to be determined to maintain a dignified silence, on the assumption that once war begins we will all have an interest in coming together at the UN to handle the aftermath."

886. The Elysée issued a statement early on 18 March stating that the US ultimatum was a unilateral decision going against the will of the international community who wanted to pursue Iraqi disarmament in accordance with resolution 1441.[319] It stated:

> "… only the Security Council is authorised to legitimise the use of force. France appeals to the responsibility of all to see that international legality is respected. To disregard the legitimacy of the UN, to favour force over the law, would be to take on a heavy responsibility."

887. President Chirac issued a recorded speech later that morning which reiterated that statement and made a number of other comments, including:

> "France's action has been inspired by the primacy of international law …
> "… France considers the use of force is a last resort when all other options have been exhausted. France's stance is shared by the great majority of the international community.

> "The latest discussions clearly showed that the Security Council was not disposed in the current circumstances to sanction a rush to war.
> "The United States has just given Iraq an ultimatum. Whether it is a question … of the necessary disarming of Iraq or the desirable change of regime in that country, there is no justification here for a unilateral decision to resort to war.
> "However events develop in the near future, this ultimatum calls into question the notion we have of international relations. It commits the future of a people, the future of a region, and the stability of the world.
> "It is a grave decision at a time when the disarmament of Iraq is under way and the inspections have proved they were a credible alternative for disarming that country.
> "It is also a decision which compromises – for the future – the methods of peacefully resolving crises linked to the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. Iraq does not today represent an immediate threat such as to justify an immediate war."[320]

888. Sir John Holmes commented that President Chirac's statement continued to emphasise France's position "as on the side of the majority", but that his description of regime change as "desirable" might be "significant".[321] President Chirac "could have been more categorical on the legal authority and used the language of condemnation". Sir John concluded that President Chirac had "kept his options open for co-operation over the day after".

889. Reporting after the start of the conflict, Sir John Holmes offered the view that President Chirac had consistently disagreed with UK policy on Iraq on sanctions and military action.[322] French policy had been driven by his personal convictions. President Chirac had never believed that Saddam Hussein was "really a danger to us" and France had disagreed with UK policy on sanctions and military action. France had:

> "… only ever agreed with great reluctance to each step to ratchet up the pressure on Saddam while accepting that only our military pressure had made him [Saddam] co-operate … [T]hey believe they have been consistent and that their opposition to the use of force will in the end be vindicated."

890. Sir John wrote that it was hard to be sure of the exact moment when France resolved to take on some of their closest allies and veto action if necessary. The "present hard line was inherent in the Franco-German position in late January" but Sir John's view was that President Chirac had begun to see the attractions of a veto during February and his confidence in a Russian veto increased after Mr Ivanov's visit to Paris on 5 March. The crucial element had been the realisation shortly after that visit, “under pressure from the Chileans and Mexicans”, that there was little chance of persuading the “swing six” to abstain “unless France was … ready to say she would veto”.

MR BLAIR’S CONVERSATION WITH PRESIDENT BUSH, 18 MARCH 2003

891. Mr Blair spoke to President Bush at 1830 on 18 March.[323] Mr Blair said that he was starting to win the political argument in the UK; and that the opinion polls were moving in his favour. They agreed to keep in touch “on a daily basis” and considered meeting in Washington the following week. Mr Blair said that he was “keen to follow up in some detail some of the issues raised in the Azores”.

892. On 18 March, Sir David Manning wrote to Dr Rice, formally confirming the UK’s agreement to US use of Diego Garcia and RAF Fairford for “operations to enforce compliance by Iraq with the obligations on Weapons of Mass Destruction laid down in UNSCR 1441 and previous relevant resolutions”.[324]

CDS’ DIRECTIVE FOR MILITARY OPERATIONS

893. Adm Boyce’s Directive to Lieutenant General John Reith, the UK Commander Joint Operations for Operation TELIC, was issued at 2300 on 18 March. Operations would not begin before 1800 the following day.[325]

894. The military plan and arrangements for the command and control of the military operation are addressed in Sections 6.2 and 8.

DEBATE IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, 18 MARCH 2003

895. Debates on Iraq took place in both the House of Commons and the House of Lords on 18 March 2003.

896. The Government tabled a motion inviting the House of Commons to:

- note its decisions of 25 November 2002 and 26 February 2003;
- recognise that Iraq’s weapons of mass destruction and long-range missiles, and its continuing non-compliance with Security Council resolutions, pose a threat to international peace and security;
- note that in the 130 days since resolution 1441 was adopted Iraq had not co-operated actively, unconditionally and immediately with the weapons inspectors, and had rejected the final opportunity to comply and is in further material breach of its obligations under successive mandatory UN Security Council resolutions;

- regret that despite a sustained diplomatic effort by Her Majesty's Government it had not proved possible to secure a second resolution in the UN because one Permanent Member of the Security Council made plain in public its intention to use its veto whatever the circumstances;
- note the opinion of the Attorney General that, Iraq having failed to comply and Iraq being at the time of resolution 1441 and continuing to be in material breach, the authority to use force under resolution 1441 has revived and so continued that day;
- believe that the United Kingdom must uphold the authority of the United Nations as set out in resolution 1441 and many resolutions preceding it, and therefore support the decision of Her Majesty's Government that the United Kingdom should use all means necessary to ensure the disarmament of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction;
- offer wholehearted support to the men and women of Her Majesty's Armed Forces on duty in the Middle East;
- in the event of military action require that, on an urgent basis, the United Kingdom should seek a new Security Council resolution that would affirm Iraq's territorial integrity, ensure rapid delivery of humanitarian relief, allow for the earliest possible lifting of UN sanctions, an international reconstruction programme, and the use of all oil revenues for the benefit of the Iraqi people and endorse an appropriate post-conflict administration for Iraq, leading to a representative government which upholds human rights and the rule of law for all Iraqis;
- welcome the imminent publication of the Quartet's Road Map as a significant step to bringing a just and lasting peace settlement between Israelis and Palestinians and for the wider Middle East region, and endorse the role of Her Majesty's Government in actively working for peace between Israel and Palestine."[326]

897. In his statement opening the debate, Mr Blair set out his position on the need for military action.[327]

898. Mr Blair told the House it faced a "tough choice" between standing down British troops and turning back, and holding firm to "the course we have set"; and that he believed "passionately" in the latter. That mattered because the outcome would not just determine the fate of the Iraqi regime and the Iraqi people, but would:

> "… determine the way in which Britain and the world confront the central security threat of the 21st century, the development of the United Nations, the relationship > between Europe and the United States, the relations within the European Union and the way in which the United States engages with the rest of the world. So it could hardly be more important. It will determine the pattern of international politics for the next generation."

899. Mr Blair rehearsed the Government's position on Iraq's past pursuit and use of weapons of mass destruction; its failures to comply with the obligations imposed by the UN Security Council between 1991 and 1998; Iraq's repeated declarations which proved to be false; and the "large quantities of weapons of mass destruction" which were "unaccounted for". He described UNSCOM's final report (in January 1999) as "a withering indictment of Saddam's lies, deception and obstruction" in which "large quantities of weapons of mass destruction" were "unaccounted for".

900. Addressing Saddam Hussein's claims that Iraq had no weapons of mass destruction, Mr Blair stated that "after seven years of obstruction and non-compliance" before the inspectors left in 1998, "we are asked to believe" he had "voluntarily decided to do what he had consistently refused to do under coercion". Mr Blair also stated:

> "We are asked now seriously to accept that in the last few years – contrary to all history, contrary to all intelligence – Saddam decided unilaterally to destroy those weapons. I say that such a claim is palpably absurd."

901. Resolution 1441 required "full, unconditional and immediate compliance". The first step was a full and final declaration of all Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. Mr Blair stated that he would not address the events that had taken place since the declaration "as the House is familiar with them", but "all members" of the Security Council "accepted" that the Iraq declaration (of 7 December 2002) was false. That was:

> "… in itself … a material breach. Iraq has taken some steps in co-operation but no one disputes that it is not fully co-operating. Iraq continues to deny that it has any weapons of mass destruction, although no serious intelligence service anywhere in the world believes it."

902. Mr Blair cited the UNMOVIC "clusters" document issued on 7 March as "a remarkable document", detailing "all the unanswered questions about Iraq's weapons of mass destruction", listing "29 different areas in which the inspectors have been unable to obtain information".

903. Describing the activity in the Security Council since 7 March, Mr Blair argued that, "had we meant what we said in resolution 1441", the Security Council should have convened when UNMOVIC published the "clusters" document on 7 March, and "condemned Iraq as in material breach". Saddam Hussein was "playing the same old games in the same old way". There were "minor concessions", but there had been "no fundamental change of heart or mind".

904. Referring to the draft resolution tabled by the UK, US and France on 7 March, Mr Blair added:

> "… we could have asked for the second resolution then and there, because it was justified. Instead, we laid down an ultimatum calling on Saddam to come into line with resolution 1441, or be in material breach."

905. That was "not an unreasonable proposition, but still countries hesitated", asking how full co-operation would be judged. The UK had "worked on a further compromise", consulting the inspectors to draw up "five tests, based on" the "clusters" document. The inspectors had "added another test: that Saddam should publicly call on the Iraqis to co-operate with them". Saddam would have been given a specified time to fulfil all six tests to show full co-operation. If he did so, "the inspectors could then set out a forward work programme that would extend over a period of time to make sure that disarmament happened". If, however, Saddam had failed to meet the tests, "action would follow".

906. Mr Blair told the House of Commons that:

> "Last Monday [10 March], we were getting very close … We very nearly had the majority agreement …
>
> "… there were debates about the length of the ultimatum, but the basic construct was gathering support. Then … France said it would veto a second resolution whatever the circumstances. Then France denounced the six tests. Later that day, Iraq rejected them. Still we continued to negotiate …
> "Last Friday, France said it could not accept any resolution with an ultimatum in it. On Monday [17 March], we made final efforts to secure agreement. However, the fact is that France remains utterly opposed to anything which lays down an ultimatum authorising action in the event of non-compliance by Saddam."

907. Mr Blair added:

> "Those on the Security Council opposed to us say that they want Saddam to disarm but they will not countenance any new resolution which authorises force in the event of non-compliance. That is their position – no to any ultimatum and no to any resolution that stipulates that failure to comply will lead to military action. So we must demand that Saddam disarms, but relinquish any concept of a threat if he does not."

908. Mr Blair stated that Saddam Hussein had allowed the inspectors into Iraq after four years of refusal because of:

> "… the threat of force … It is the imminence of force. The only persuasive power to which he responds is 250,000 allied troops on his doorstep. However when that fact is so obvious, we are told that any resolution that authorises force in the event of non-compliance will be vetoed – not just opposed, but vetoed and blocked."

909. Mr Blair added:

> "The tragedy is that had such a resolution ensued and had the UN come together and united – and if other troops had gone there, not just British and American troops – Saddam Hussein might have complied. But the moment we proposed the benchmarks and canvassed support for an ultimatum, there was immediate recourse to the language of the veto. The choice was not action now or a postponement of action; the choice was action or no action at all."

910. Asked what he meant by an unreasonable veto, Mr Blair responded:

> "In resolution 1441, we said that it was Saddam's final opportunity and that he had to comply. That was agreed by all members of the Security Council. What is surely unreasonable is for a country to come forward now, at the very point when we might reach agreement and when we are – not unreasonably – saying that he must comply with the UN, after all these months … on the basis of six tests or action will follow. For that country to say that it will veto such a resolution in all circumstances is what I would call unreasonable."

911. Mr Blair stated:

> "The tragedy is that the world has to learn the lesson all over again that weakness in the face of a threat from a tyrant is the surest way not to peace but … to conflict … we have been victims of our own desire to placate the implacable, to persuade towards reason the utterly unreasonable, and to hope that there was some genuine intent to do good in a regime whose mind is in fact evil."

912. In response to a suggestion that the diplomatic process should be continued for a little longer, Mr Blair responded:

> "We could have had more time if the compromise proposal that we put forward had been accepted … unless the threat of action was made, it was unlikely that Saddam would meet the tests.
> "… the problem with diplomacy was that it came to an end after the position of France was made public – and repeated in a private conversation – and it said it would block, by veto, any resolution that contained an ultimatum … the French were not prepared to change their position. I am not prepared to carry on waiting and delaying, with our troops in place in difficult circumstances, when that country has made it clear it has a fixed position and will not change."

913. Questioned whether it was he, not the French, Russians and Chinese, who had changed position and about his statement – that the only circumstances in which he would go to war without a second resolution was if the inspectors concluded that there had been no more progress, which they had not; if there were a majority on the Security Council, which there was not; and if there was an unreasonable veto from one country, when three Permanent Members were opposed to his policy – Mr Blair replied:

> "… resolution 1441 … stated in terms … that if Iraq continued in material breach, defined as not co-operating fully, immediately and unconditionally, serious consequences would follow. All we are asking for in the second resolution is the clear ultimatum that if Saddam continues to fail to co-operate, force would be used. The French position is that France will vote no, whatever the circumstances. Those are not my words, but those of the French President. I find it sad that at this point in time he cannot support us in the position we have set out, which is the only sure way to disarm Saddam."

914. Addressing the conclusion which "any tyrannical regime" might take from the "world's diplomatic dance with Saddam Hussein" over the previous 12 years, Mr Blair stated that such a conclusion would be:

> "That our capacity to pass firm resolutions was only matched by our feebleness in implementing them. That is why this indulgence has to stop – because it is dangerous: dangerous if such regimes disbelieve us; dangerous if they think they can use our weakness … and dangerous because one day they will mistake our innate revulsion against war for permanent incapacity, when in fact, if pushed to the limit, we will act. But when we act, after years of pretence, the action will have to be harder, bigger, more total in its impact. It is true that Iraq is not the only country with weapons of mass destruction, but … to back away from this confrontation now, and future conflicts will be infinitely worse and more devastating in their effects.
> "… any fair observer does not really dispute that Iraq is in breach of resolution 1441 or that it implies action in such circumstances. The real problem is that, underneath, people dispute that Iraq is a threat, dispute the link between terrorism and weapons of mass destruction, and dispute, in other words, the whole basis of our assertion that the two together constitute a fundamental assault on our way of life."

915. Arguing that the time had come to act, Mr Blair set out why he believed, in the context of "an ever more interdependent" world where the threat was "chaos and disorder", Iraq posed a threat that was "so serious and why we must tackle it".

916. In his view, there were:

> "… two begetters of chaos: tyrannical regimes with weapons of mass destruction and extreme terrorist groups who profess a perverted and false sense of Islam."

917. Mr Blair set out his concerns about:

- proliferators of nuclear equipment or expertise;
- "dictatorships with highly repressive regimes" who were "desperately trying to acquire" chemical, biological or "particularly, nuclear weapons capability"; some of those were “a short time away from having a serviceable nuclear weapon”, and that activity was increasing, not diminishing; and

- the possibility of terrorist groups obtaining and using weapons of mass destruction, including a “radiological bomb”.

918. Mr Blair stated that tyrannical regimes with weapons of mass destruction and terrorist groups had very different motives and different origins and he accepted “fully” that the association between the two was:

> “… loose – but it is hardening. The possibility of the two coming together – of terrorist groups in possession of weapons of mass destruction or even of a so-called dirty radiological bomb – is now in my judgement, a real and present danger to Britain and its national security.”

919. Addressing the effects of chemical and biological agents, Mr Blair stated that Iraq was “not the only part of this threat”. But it was “the test of whether we treat the threat seriously”. Mr Blair added that, faced with the threat:

> “… the world should unite. The UN should be the focus both of diplomacy and of action. That is what [resolution] 1441 said … to break it now, and to will the ends but not the means, would do more damage in the long term to the UN than any other single course that we could pursue. To fall back into the lassitude of the last 12 years; to talk, to discuss, to debate but never to act; to declare our will but not to enforce it; and to continue with strong language but with weak intentions – that is the worst course imaginable. If we pursue that course, when the threat returns, from Iraq or elsewhere, who will then believe us? What price our credibility with the next tyrant?”

920. Mr Blair stated:

> “… there will in any event be no sound future for the United Nations – no guarantee against the repetition of these events – unless we recognise the urgent need for a political agenda we can unite upon.
> “What we have witnessed here is the consequence of Europe and the United States dividing from each other … the paralysis of the UN has been born out of the division that there is.”

921. Mr Blair stated that there was a risk of the world being divided into rival poles of power “with the US and its allies in one corner and France, Germany, Russia and their allies in the other”. That would be “profoundly dangerous”. There was “resentment of US dominance” and “fear of US unilateralism”.

922. Reflecting the strategy he had adopted, Mr Blair stated that the way to deal with the US was "not rivalry, but partnership". Europe should have said to the US in September 2002:

> "We understand your strategic anxiety over terrorism and weapons of mass destruction and we will help you meet it. We will mean what we say in any resolution we pass and will back it with action if Saddam fails to disarm voluntarily."

923. In return, Europe should have asked:

> "… that the US should indeed choose the UN path and you [the US] should recognise the fundamental overriding importance of restarting the Middle East Peace Process, which we will hold you to.
> "That would have been the right and responsible way for Europe and America to treat each other … and it is a tragedy that it has not happened …"

924. Mr Blair stated that "what happens after any conflict in Iraq" was of "critical significance". There was a chance to unify around the United Nations and a UN resolution:

> "… should provide for the proper governance of Iraq … protect totally the territorial integrity of Iraq. And that … oil revenues … should be put in a trust fund for the Iraqi people administered through the UN."

925. Mr Blair set out the abuses of Saddam Hussein's regime and stated that his removal was the "only true hope" for the Iraqi people.

926. Concluding his speech, Mr Blair stated:

> "If this House now demands that … British troops are pulled back … what then? … Saddam … will feel strengthened beyond measure … other states … will take it that the will confronting them is decaying and feeble …
>
>
> "… In this dilemma, no choice is perfect, no choice is ideal, but on this decision hangs the fate of many things … To retreat now … would put at hazard all that we hold dearest. To turn the United Nations back into a talking shop; to stifle the first steps of progress in the Middle East; to leave the Iraqi people to the mercy of events over which we would have relinquished all power to influence for the better …
> "This is not the time to falter. This is the time … to give a lead: to show that we will stand up for what we know to be right; to show that we will confront the tyrannies and dictatorships … to show, at the moment of decision that we have the courage to do the right thing."

927. In his speech, Mr Duncan Smith stated that the official Opposition would support the Government because it was acting "in the national interest".[328] Iraq posed a threat to the safety and stability of the Middle East and Saddam Hussein had "the means, the mentality and the motive to pose a direct threat to our national security".

928. Other points made by Mr Duncan Smith included:

- Saddam Hussein was "in complete breach of all his obligations to the United Kingdom and to the international community".
- He had "absolutely no intention whatsoever of relinquishing the weapons" he had developed.
- The threat from Iraq's "arsenal to British citizens at home and abroad" could not "simply be contained. Whether in the hands of his regime or in the hands of the terrorists to whom he would give his weapons, they pose a clear danger to British citizens."
- Saddam Hussein's "last hope" was "to string along the international community for as long as possible", and to delay action until the autumn, and, "in the meantime", his "prevarication and games" would "split the international community and wreck the UN".
- There were "pressing questions" about the arrangements for dealing with the humanitarian consequences of military action.
- If "decisive action" had been taken earlier, "we would not now stand on the verge of war".

929. Mr Duncan Smith concluded that, if the House of Commons voted to give Saddam Hussein:

> "… yet another chance, the moment will pass, our concentration will falter, our energy and focus will disperse and our nerve will fail, with disastrous consequences …
> "… We should stand firm, act and show that we have learned from past failures …"

930. The Speaker selected a cross-party amendment to the Government motion, moved by Mr Peter Kilfoyle (Labour), which stated that the House:

> "… believes that the case for war against Iraq has not yet been established, especially given the absence of specific United Nations authorisation; but, in the event that hostilities do commence, pledges its total support for the British forces engaged in the Middle East …"[329]

931. In his speech supporting the amendment, Mr Kilfoyle argued that military action would be "illegal, immoral and illogical". Saddam Hussein had been contained; there was no evidence provided of links with Al Qaida; he did not have the wherewithal to attack the UK directly; and there had been "an awful lot of scaremongering". The Government's "impatience" would "reap a whirlwind".[330]

932. In his speech, Mr Kennedy stated that he did "not believe that the case for war" had been established, but he acknowledged that the Government deserved credit for persuading a "reluctant" US "to go down the UN route" and for emphasising the primary need for a "meaningful" MEPP.[331] He also drew attention to Mr Annan's remarks the previous day, expressing concern about the legitimacy of action without the support of the Security Council.

933. Mr Kennedy concluded by drawing attention to the number of people who had expressed concern about the "doctrine of regime change", were "wary of the motives" of the US Administration, and "did not like to see Britain separated from its natural international allies".

934. More than fifty backbench MPs spoke in the debate, offering a wide range of views about the prospect of military action.

935. In his speech closing the debate, Mr Straw drew attention to the importance of a just and lasting settlement of the dispute between Israel and Palestine, which was, "as important for the future stability of the region as the disarmament of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction".[332]

936. In relation to Iraq, Mr Straw drew attention to the recommendations of the Select Committee on International Development, including the need for a new UN Security Council resolution "to provide proper authority for reconstruction and redevelopment work, and, in addition, a proper mandate for any Government who are to operate within the territory of Iraq once Saddam Hussein is removed".

937. Mr Straw stated that the House of Commons had never before had the opportunity to vote on a substantive motion for its explicit support for the use of the Armed Forces. That placed "a heavy responsibility" on each member of the House.

938. Mr Straw added that the choice was "not easy". He had "worked for months for a peaceful resolution of the crisis", and he was as certain as he could be "that the Government's course of action was right".

939. Mr Straw also stated:

- "… no one, either today or in New York in the four Security Council meetings that I attended, has … claim[ed] that Saddam Hussein has fulfilled the full and immediate compliance that was required of him."

- There was “no other alternative” to seeking the exile of Saddam Hussein and, if that failed, “his disarmament by force”.
- Containment “failed when the inspectors had to leave in 1998”. Three Permanent Members of the Security Council had failed to support resolution 1284 (1999) which had been an attempt to offer Iraq “a new way to peaceful disarmament while containing the threat”. Iraq had said no. The inspectors were not allowed to return; sanctions were eroded, “and containment was left weaker than ever”.
- The strategy encapsulated in resolution 1441 (2002) was “for the active disarmament of the regime, backed by a credible threat of force”.
- There was “no automaticity about the use of force”; “it was entirely conditional on Saddam Hussein’s compliance or otherwise with the resolution”.
- “We also said – to our five permanent colleagues that if the only issue between us and them over the ultimatum was more time than the 10 days we had allowed, of course we could negotiate more time. But no country … has been prepared to say how much more time should be allowed before time runs out. None of them is prepared to issue an ultimatum. In reality, they are not asking for more time. They are asking for time without end.”
- Saddam Hussein would not disarm peacefully, so the choice was “either to leave Saddam where he is, armed and emboldened, an even bigger threat to his country, his region and international peace and security, or we disarm him by force”.

940. Mr Straw concluded:

> “… of course there will be consequences if the House approves the Government motion. Our forces will almost certainly be involved in military action. Some will be killed; so, too, will innocent Iraqi civilians, but far fewer Iraqis in the future will be maimed, tortured or killed by the Saddam regime. The Iraqi people will begin to enjoy the freedom and prosperity that should be theirs. The world will become a safer place, and, above all, the essential authority of the United Nations will have been upheld.”

941. The amendment to the Government motion was defeated by 396 to 217 votes.

942. The Government motion was approved by 412 to 149 votes.

943. Mr Blair did not argue that Iraq posed an imminent threat. He stated that the threat which Saddam Hussein’s arsenal posed to “British citizens at home and abroad” could not be contained, and that in the hands of the Iraqi regime or in the hands of the terrorists to whom Saddam Hussein “would give his weapons”, they posed “a clear danger to British citizens”.

944. It was the ingrained belief of the UK Government and the intelligence community that Saddam Hussein’s regime retained chemical and biological warfare capabilities, was determined to preserve and if possible enhance its capabilities, including at some point in the future a nuclear capability, and was pursuing an active and successful policy of deception and concealment. That, and the JIC Assessments of whether and in what circumstances Iraq might use those capabilities, is addressed in Section 4.

945. Iraq's capability was judged to be limited and its chemical and biological weapons did not pose a direct or imminent threat to the UK. Iraq was judged to be most likely to use its weapons as a last resort in response to a military attack which threatened the survival of the regime.

946. Mr Blair's statements on the risk of terrorists willing and able to use weapons of mass destruction being able to obtain them from Iraq are addressed in Section 7.

947. Saddam Hussein's regime had the potential to proliferate material and know-how to terrorist groups, but it was not judged likely to do so.

948. Mr Blair's and Mr Straw's statements claimed that the UK Government was acting on behalf of the international community "to uphold the authority of the Security Council".

949. The Charter of the United Nations vests responsibility for the maintenance of peace and security in the Security Council.

950. On 18 March, the majority of the Security Council's members were not persuaded that the inspections process, and the diplomatic efforts surrounding it, had reached the end of the road. They did not agree that the time had come to terminate inspections and resort to force.

951. In the absence of a majority in the Security Council in support of military action at that point, the UK was undermining the authority of the Security Council.

DEBATE IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS, 18 MARCH 2003

952. Lord Williams of Mostyn set out the Government's position in the House of Lords, stating: "Ours is a stark choice: we stand our troops down and turn back or we hold firm to the course that we have set. We must hold firm."[333]

953. Lord Strathclyde (Conservative) agreed that "to turn about now would be to court incalculable future danger in the face of the greater emerging threat to our future security".[334]

954. Baroness Williams (Liberal Democrat), referring to Mr Cook's resignation statement on 17 March, commented that there was "more than one set of opinions about how effective are the weapons of mass destruction in Iraq … As so often in this argument, we look at a profound ambiguity, which people interpret in different ways."[335]

955. Addressing the failure to secure a second resolution, Baroness Williams added:

> "Much of the blame has been passed over to France. France has been seriously misinterpreted, not least by our own tabloid newspapers … I am told by the French Embassy … that France indicated it would veto a second resolution even if there were nine members of the Security Council supporting it, but made absolutely plain this was a judgement about timelines, not about Iraq failing to comply with Security Council resolutions. In other words – surely, it is not too complex a thought for us to understand – France believes that timelines for the inspectors were unacceptably short … [and] would have supported the resolution if in its view the inspectors indicated that there was no longer sufficient compliance with their work to enable them to complete it in a satisfactory manner.
> "Without the second resolution the legitimacy of our actions will continue to be disputed."

956. In her concluding remarks, Baroness Symons highlighted "the breadth of agreement [during the debate] that the Iraqi regime is evil, cruel and has palpably failed to disarm and meet a series of UN obligations placed on it".[336]

957. Baroness Symons responded to a number of questions raised during the debate, including on:

- The threat from WMD. Iraq had "thousands of chemical and biological bombs". The 150 weapons inspectors "simply will not find the weapons of mass destruction in a country the size of France".
- The exhaustion of possibilities for a negotiated solution. France's position on the second resolution meant that negotiation was now "beyond our reach".
- The legality of military action. Divisions of legal opinion in international law were "nothing new". The Attorney General had had access to all information and had delivered a clear view.
- The legal position of those engaged in conflict. Military action would take full account of requirements and obligations of international law.
- Whether military action was the right response. The Iraqi people would be liberated from a life of tyranny and repression and it was necessary for the UN to face up to its responsibilities. It was the mission of the UK's Armed Forces to "enforce the will of the United Nations and the international community".

Events of 19 and 20 March 2003

958. Mr de Villepin telephoned Mr Straw on 19 March with a message for Mr Blair from President Chirac.[337] The President had been "shocked and hurt" by Mr Blair's statements to Parliament. They had been unnecessary. President Chirac understood the pressures that the UK Government was under, but such statements were not acceptable from an ally and an EU partner. Nor were they in accordance with reality.

959. Mr Straw rebutted the comments. He and Mr Blair had felt their comments were justified by the circumstances; not to solve domestic problems but to explain the reality of the situation to which France had contributed. The UK felt that, after resolution 1441, "France had made a strategic choice not to follow through".

960. Mr de Villepin responded that what he had heard from London and Washington did not "link with the truth". He concluded that the statements from the UK Government had shown no courage.

961. Mr Straw concluded that "he knew a great deal about courage: the Prime Minister had shown great courage".

962. The first Ad Hoc Meeting on Iraq (also known as the "War Cabinet") took place at 8.30am on 19 March.

963. Mr Straw informed the meeting that he had received "an official complaint" from Mr de Villepin "about the British representation of the French position in respect of Iraq". He also set out the need to explain the UK's position to other countries and to publicise the international support for the Coalition.[338]

964. The discussion on the importance of a UN resolution covering the post-conflict phase is addressed in Section 6.5.

965. Advice on military issues is addressed in Section 8.

966. Subsequently, Mr Hoon and Adm Boyce briefed Mr Blair on the military preparations.[339]

967. A JIC Note issued on 19 March, 'Saddam: the Beginning of the End', stated that intelligence showed the Iraqi regime was making final preparations for war.[340] Saddam Hussein had rejected US demands for his exile and the US had:

> "… now made clear that even a last-minute change of mind by Saddam would not stop the Coalition from moving against Iraq's WMD."

968. The Note added that the JIC continued to judge that Saddam Hussein's scope for "extreme and unpredictable action is increasing as the prospect of an attack approaches". The JIC view on the possible use of CBW is set out in Section 4.3.

969. Sir David Manning spoke to Dr Rice at noon.[341]

970. Sir David told Dr Rice that the French had "launched a fierce public attack" on the UK.

971. Sir David and Dr Rice also discussed the meeting of the Security Council and the need to rebuild relationships. Sir David said that Dr Blix's work programme provided "further confirmation of how little Saddam had done to fulfil his disarmament obligations". The UK was in favour of a continuing role for UNMOVIC; it would be "important to have UNMOVIC available to provide independent verification when we found WMD".

972. Mr Blair and President Bush spoke at 12.40pm on 19 March.[342] They discussed the military plans and timetable. Mr Blair said that he had "reviewed the military plans and was confident that they would work". Post-conflict issues would be the focus of conversation when they met. A full-day meeting was envisaged to cover the ground. Mr Blair suggested that the discussions might include bringing in allies who had opposed military action and co-ordinating a communications strategy.

973. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries:

> "As Bush said … other leaders would look at what he [Blair] did, and the power with which he did it, and really learn lessons from it. 'Landslide' he [Bush] said, referring to the Road Map publication as 'genius'. He referred back to what he called 'the cojones conference' at Camp David. 'You showed cojones, you never blinked. A leader who leads will win and you are a real leader.' He said the object is regime change … TB felt that the next stage after winning the war would be to work out the geopolitical fallout and repair some of the divisions. Bush said Condi had this line that we should 'punish the French, ignore the Germans and forgive the Russians', which was pretty glib. TB didn't comment at the time but later said he didn't agree. We should try to build bridges with all of them. We finally got Bush to agree there was no point TB going to the US at the moment, that we should wait until the fighting starts …
> "… Bush said that the Iraqis would now be 'shredding documents like crazy'… the Road Map would be published today when Abu Mazen was confirmed …"[343]

SECURITY COUNCIL DEBATE, 19 MARCH 2003

975. Although there had been unanimous support for a rigorous inspections and monitoring regime backed by the threat of military force as the means to disarm Iraq when resolution 1441 was adopted, there was no such consensus in the Security Council in March 2003.

976. In the Security Council debate on 19 March, the majority of members of the Security Council, including China, France and Russia, made clear that they thought the goal of disarming Iraq could be achieved by peaceful means and emphasised the primary responsibility of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security.

977. The Security Council held an open debate on Iraq on 19 March. The Foreign Ministers of France, Germany, Guinea, Russia and Syria attended.[345]

978. Dr Blix stated that UNMOVIC's draft work programme had been presented to the Security Council on 17 March in response to the wishes of its members, but, "on the very same day", UNMOVIC had been "constrained together with other United Nations units to order the withdrawal of all our inspectors and other international staff from Iraq".

979. Dr Blix stated that he felt:

> "… sadness that three and a half months of work … have not brought the assurances needed about the absence of weapons of mass destruction or other proscribed items in Iraq, that no more time is available for inspections and that armed action now seems imminent."

He was relieved that there had been full Iraqi co-operation on the withdrawal of UN staff.

980. Dr Blix stated that the inspectors had "worked broadly" but it was "evidently possible for the Council to single out a few issues for resolution within a specific time". The draft programme selected "12 key tasks" where progress "could have an impact on the Council's assessment of co-operation of Iraq under resolution 1284 (1999)". But, whatever approach was followed, the results would depend on Iraq's active co-operation. Since his last report to the Security Council [on 7 March], Iraq had sent several more letters on unresolved issues. Those efforts by Iraq "should be acknowledged", but UNMOVIC's experts had "found, so far, that, in substance, only limited new information has been provided that will help to resolve remaining questions".

[345] UN Security Council, '4721st Meeting Wednesday 19 March 2003' (S/PV.4721).

981. Dr Blix said that the draft work programme "would seem to have only limited practical relevance in the current situation". It was "evidently for the Council to consider the next steps". He hoped the Council would "be aware" that it had "in UNMOVIC staff a unique body of international experts"; that "no other international organisation has trained inspectors in the field of biological weapons and missiles"; and that, "With increasing attention being devoted to proliferation of these weapons [of mass destruction], this capability may be valuable to the Council".

982. Mr Gustavo Zlauvinen, International Atomic Energy Agency representative to the UN, said that the Agency had transmitted its work programme, which was "self-explanatory", to the Council that morning. Dr ElBaradei would be "available any time in the future to discuss … the work programme should the Council decide to do so".

983. Mr Joschka Fischer, the German Vice Chancellor and Foreign Minister, stated that the world was "facing an imminent war in Iraq". The Security Council could not "remain silent" and its task "must be to safeguard its function and preserve its relevance". Developments had "brought the work of the United Nations on the ground to a standstill" and were "cause for the deepest concern". The draft work programme "with its realistic description of unresolved disarmament issues" provided "clear and convincing guidelines on how to disarm Iraq peacefully within a short space of time". He wanted "to stress" that it was "possible to disarm Iraq peacefully by upholding those demands with tight deadlines". Peaceful means had "not been exhausted" and Germany "emphatically rejects the impending war".

984. Mr Fischer deeply regretted that "considerable efforts to disarm Iraq using peaceful means" seemed to have little chance of success. France, Germany and Russia had "put forward proposals for a more efficient inspections regime consisting of clear disarmament steps with deadlines, most recently on 15 March", and other members of the Council had also "submitted constructive proposals until the final hours of the negotiations".

985. Mr Fischer stated:

> "During the last few days, we have moved significantly closer to our common objective: that of effectively countering the risk posed by Iraqi weapons of mass destruction with complete and comprehensive arms control. Especially in recent weeks, substantial progress was made in disarmament. The scrapping of the Al Samoud missiles made headway … And the regime in Baghdad is beginning, under pressure, to clear up the unanswered questions on VX and anthrax."

986. Mr Fischer continued:

> "Iraq's readiness to co-operate was unsatisfactory. It was hesitant and slow. The Council agrees on that. But can this seriously be regarded as grounds for war…?

> "There is no doubt that, particularly in recent weeks, Baghdad has begun to co-operate more. The information Iraq has provided … are steps in the right direction. Baghdad is meeting more and more of the demands contained in the Security Council resolutions. But why should we … especially now – abandon our plans to disarm Iraq by peaceful means?
> "The majority of Security Council members believe that there are no grounds now for breaking off the disarmament process …"

987. Mr Fischer made three points:

- The "myth" that the Security Council had "failed" must be countered. It had "made available the instruments to disarm Iraq peacefully". The Security Council was "not responsible" for what happened outside the United Nations.
- "… clearly, under the current circumstances the policy of military intervention has no credibility. It does not have the support of our people. It would not have taken much to safeguard the unity of the Security Council. There is no basis in the United Nations Charter for regime change by military means."
- The inspection regime should be preserved and the work programme endorsed because both would be needed after military action.

988. Mr Fischer concluded that Germany was "convinced that the United Nations and the Security Council must continue to play the central role in the Iraq conflict". That was "crucial to world order and must continue to be the case in the future". The United Nations was "the key institution for the preservation of peace and stability and for the peaceful reconciliation of interests". There was "no substitute for its functions as a guardian of peace".

989. Mr Fischer also argued that an "effective international non-proliferation and disarmament regime" continued to be needed. The instruments developed in the Iraq process could be used to make the world a safer place. But the UN was the "only appropriate framework" for that: "No one can seriously believe that disarmament wars are the way forward." Europe had experienced the horrors of war "too often": "It can only be the very last resort when all peaceful alternatives really have been exhausted." Germany had:

> "… accepted the necessity of war on two occasions … because all peaceful alternatives had proved unsuccessful.
> "Germany fought side by side with its allies in Kosovo. It did likewise in Afghanistan.
> "Today, however, we in Germany do not believe that there is no alternative to military force. To the contrary, we feel that Iraq can be disarmed using peaceful means."

990. Mr de Villepin said that for France "war can only be a last resort". He stated that the inspectors' work programmes reminded the Council that there was "still a clear and credible prospect for disarming Iraq peacefully" with a "realistic timetable". Inspections were "producing tangible results".

991. Mr de Villepin stated that a choice was being made "between two visions of the world"; between "those who choose to use force and think that they can resolve the world's complexity through swift preventive action"; and those who choose "resolute action and a long-term approach". He warned:

> "… in today's world, to ensure our security, we must take into account the manifold crises and many dimensions, including the cultural and religious ones. Nothing enduring in international relations can be built without dialogue and respect for the other, without strictly abiding by principles, especially for democracies that must set the example. To ignore that is to run the risk of misunderstanding, radicalisation and spiralling violence. That is especially true in the Middle East, an area of fractures and ancient conflicts, where stability must be a major objective for us."

992. Mr de Villepin added:

> "To those who think that the scourge of terrorism will be eradicated through what is done in Iraq, we say that they run the risk of failing … An outbreak of force in such an unstable area can only exacerbate the tensions and fractures on which terrorists feed."

993. Subsequently, Mr de Villepin stated:

> "… terrorism is fuelled by organised crime networks; it cleaves to the contours of lawless areas; it thrives on regional crises; it garners support from the divisions in the world; and it uses all available resources, from the most rudimentary … to whatever weapons of mass destruction it can manage to acquire."

994. Mr de Villepin called for the international community to "intensify" the fight against terrorism; for a "new impetus" in the fight against proliferation of weapons of mass destruction; and to "recover the initiative in regional conflicts" and in particular the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

995. In Iraq, the international community should "remain mobilised" to "dress the wounds of war" and to "build peace". No State could "claim the necessary legitimacy" for the latter; the "legal and moral authority" could "stem only from the United Nations", which should also "establish a framework for the country's economic reconstruction". Action should be guided by "respect for the unity and territorial integrity of Iraq, and the preservation of its sovereignty".

996. Mr de Villepin concluded:

> "In a world where the threats are asymmetrical, where the weak defy the strong, the power of conviction, the capacity to persuade and the ability to change hearts counts as much as the number of military divisions …

> "Given this new world, it is imperative that the international community's action be guided by principles.
> "The first is respect for law. The keystone of international order, it must apply under all circumstances, but even more so when it is a question of taking the gravest decision: to use force. Only on that condition can force be legitimate, and only on that condition can it restore order and peace.
> "Next is the defence of freedom and justice. We must not compromise on what is at the core of our values. We shall be listened to and heeded only if we are inspired by the very ideals of the United Nations.
>
> "Last is the spirit of dialogue and tolerance …
> "… Never has the United Nations been so necessary. It is up to this body to muster the resolve to meet these challenges, because the United Nations is the place where international law and legitimacy are founded and because it speaks on behalf of peoples.
> "To the clash of arms … the international community … must respond …"

997. Mr Ivanov stated that, by unanimously adopting resolution 1441 (2002), the Security Council had taken upon itself "the serious responsibility of completing the process of Iraq's disarmament". The reports from UNMOVIC and the IAEA showed "convincingly that the international inspectors have succeeded in achieving tangible results". As a result of the unity of the international community and the joint pressure on the Iraqi authorities, "including a military presence in the region", Baghdad had "fulfilled virtually every condition set by the inspectors" and had "not put up any kind of serious obstacle to their activities". If the international inspectors were "given the opportunity to continue their work", they had "everything they need to complete the process of Baghdad's peaceful disarmament".

998. Mr Ivanov questioned the "the right to use force against Iraq outside the Charter of the United Nations" and the authority for "the violent overthrow of the leadership of a sovereign State".

999. Mr Ivanov concluded that President Putin had extended "solidarity and support" to President Bush after the attacks on 11 September 2001, and:

> "If today we really had indisputable facts demonstrating that there was a direct threat from the territory of Iraq to the security of the United States of America, then Russia, without any hesitation, would be prepared to use the entire arsenal of measures provided under the United Nations Charter to eliminate such a threat. However, the Security Council today is not in possession of such facts. That is why we prefer a political settlement, relying on the activities of UNMOVIC and the IAEA, which enjoy the full trust of the international community."

1000. Mr Farouk al-Sharaa, the Syrian Foreign Minister, reminded the Council of the "most important commitment" in the United Nations Charter "to practice tolerance and live together in peace with one another as good neighbours, and to unite our strength to maintain international peace and security". He questioned whether the US "and its ally, the United Kingdom" could absolve themselves of the responsibility for the difficulties of finding constructive solutions for the problems in Iraq and Palestine. He suggested that a "war of aggression" was about to be unleashed which was "unfair and unjustified" and would "come back to haunt those who have advocated and promoted it, instead of enhancing their status in history".

1001. Drawing attention to Israel's rejection of international inspection and supervision, Mr al-Shara' stated that Syria had supported resolution 1441 because of its:

> "… belief in supporting the international will to find a peaceful solution to the Iraqi crisis and to eliminate Iraqi weapons of mass destruction through peaceful means."

1002. Mr al-Shara' said that "the majority of the members of the Council rejected the idea of adopting a draft resolution authorising the use of force". He expressed "extreme regret and concern at attempts by some to call into question the role of the Security Council in particular, and the United Nations in general, simply because they did not succeed in imposing their will and positions on the Council and the United Nations". He was highly critical of those who had "reneged" on resolution 1441, alleging that the objective was not to disarm Iraq "but to occupy it and usurp its natural resources". He questioned whether Iraq represented a threat to the US, pointing out that Al Qaida had active or sleeper cells in more than 150 countries.

1003. Mr al-Shara' concluded that the "letter and the spirit" of the ultimatum issued by the US led Syria to conclude that the objective was "the removal or the bringing to justice of an individual or a group of individuals". Syria urged "those concerned to shut down the machinery of war" and to spare the lives of:

> "… millions of innocent Iraqis as well as the lives of their new oppressors who are marching thousands of miles … holding up the banner of liberation like a myth. Many people – including many Americans – have stood against the foreign occupier in defence of liberty and independence. That is the logic of history … that will continue …"

1004. Mr Akram stated that Pakistan had "consistently advocated a peaceful solution". He stressed "that every possible avenue should be exhausted to secure a peaceful solution, and that the use of force must be the very last resort". Pakistan believed that the programme of work identified by Dr Blix "could have provided a useful basis for the completion of the disarmament process … if Iraq's full and unconditional co-operation could have been assured and obtained in time". Members of the Security Council had been separated by "honest differences". Once military action began, the duties:

> "… of the Security Council to restore peace and security, to contain conflict, to prevent the suffering of the Iraqi people and others in the region, to ensure the territorial integrity of Iraq and its neighbours and to ensure the stability of this sensitive region … will not end; they will become more acute."

1005. Mr Zinser deplored "the path of war", referring to the UN Charter and the "principles" which Mexico had learned from history for the "peaceful settlement of disputes and disarmament". He described the inspections regime for Iraq as "the most robust, dynamic and effective effort at peaceful disarmament that has ever been attempted" and stated that Mexico was "convinced that … the United Nations could have brought about the peaceful disarmament of Iraq".

1006. Ambassador Negroponte stated that the consideration of the draft programmes was "incompatible with Iraq's non-compliance with resolution 1441 (2002) and the current reality on the ground"; the work programme was "predicated on the assumption that Iraq will provide immediate, unconditional and active co-operation". That had:

> "… been manifestly lacking. No realistic programme of work or outline of key unresolved issues can be developed … while Iraq fails to co-operate fully, actively and unconditionally, nor can it be developed absent sound information on Iraqi programmes since 1998 and all other information that is lacking."

1007. Ambassador Negroponte added that the draft work programmes and:

> "… the paper on key remaining disarmament tasks make clear the multitude of important issues that Iraq has avoided addressing. These are the kinds of documents that we would have been able to discuss if Iraq had met the requirements of resolution 1441 (2002), but they cannot now lead us to the results that this Council demanded: the immediate peaceful disarmament of Iraq.
> "Under current circumstances we have no choice but to set this work aside for the time being … we do not exclude the possibility that it may prove useful to return to these documents at some point in the future."

1008. Ambassador Negroponte stated that the US had committed "significant resources … across all relevant United States Government agencies and in support of United Nations efforts to anticipate likely requirements and to be prepared to administer necessary relief as quickly as possible".

1009. Mr Belinga Eboutou stated that "the peaceful disarmament of Iraq by means of inspections" had ended. The UNMOVIC draft work programme "would have been a good basis for work" but "much remained to be done" and his delegation did "not see how the inspectors would have achieved their heavy task in the absence of full, active and unconditional co-operation".

1010. Mr Arias said Saddam Hussein was responsible for the suspension of inspections:

> "Through his ongoing policy of deceit, concealment and delaying tactics, he has decided to openly opt for the path of confrontation, contravening the interests of his people and the demands of the Security Council."

The draft resolution tabled by the US, UK and Spain was "designed to ratchet up the pressure on the Iraqi regime" and had "in fact, offered Saddam Hussein another opportunity".

1011. Mr Arias stated that resolution1441 recognised that Iraq's non-compliance with the Council's resolutions constituted a threat to international peace and security; that the Council had met "many times to examine successive reports of the inspectors". Iraq had "still not complied with the will of the international community as had been demanded … Therefore, peace and security continue unassured."

1012. Mr Juan Gabriel Valdés, Chilean Permanent Representative to the UN, stated that Chile had been convinced that "the inspections programme – strengthened, zealous and investigative, carried to its logical conclusion and accompanied by growing and persistent military pressure – was capable of achieving … the peaceful disarmament of Iraq." The Council:

> "… needed to make clear to the regime of Saddam Hussein that the United Nations would move towards the disarmament of Iraq at any cost. The Council should have cultivated its internal unity …
> "That was not possible. We fear that the consequences will be serious for humanity. The Iraqi regime never understood the dimension of its lethargy and did not appreciate the gravity of the punishment to which it was exposing its own people … the Council was unable to find … the flexibility needed to set deadlines and to define a path of collective action that would have enabled it to shoulder the responsibilities entrusted to it by the Charter of the United Nations. Today, every one of us must assume his part of the responsibility."

1013. Mr Valdés continued that it was "not the time for recriminations"; and that nothing could be more serious than suspending the inspections process which "could create doubts concerning the validity of this instrument". He concluded:

> "The Security Council … must now work tirelessly, inspired by the objective of preserving life and restoring peace. Perhaps if we do everything that we can and save as many lives as we can, the millions of people in the world who have now lost faith in our capacity to make the world a civilised place may again lend their inspiration to our tasks."

1014. Mr Helder Lucas, Angolan Deputy Permanent Representative to the UN, deplored the "fact that the inspectors were unable to complete their task of disarming Iraq of its weapons of mass destruction. Angola also deplored the "fact that Iraq was unable to seize the last opportunity afforded to it by the Security Council". Angola [had] made repeated pleas to Iraq to co-operate fully and honestly with the United Nations in complying with the Council resolutions relating to its unconditional disarmament – particularly resolution 1441 (2002) – and to convince the international community as a whole that it was making genuine and determined efforts to disarm. The use of force should be a last resort; and that the decision "should be within the United Nations framework in order to count on the international community's full support"; that Angola had "advocated the principle of safeguarding the Security Council's primacy as the most appropriate mechanism for regulating crisis situations and for imposing international law through compliance with its resolutions"; and that it had "defended the necessity" of Council unity.

1015. Mr Wang stated that the work programme, "if implemented" would "surely make the inspections more organised, and more targeted" and would "help enhance" their effectiveness. He added that:

> "In the light of recent progress made in the inspections, we believe that it is possible to achieve the goal of disarming Iraq through peaceful means. We should not put an end to the road to peaceful disarmament."

He expressed China's "utmost regret and disappointment" about a situation where war might break out at any minute. China would do all it could to avert war.

1016. Mr Wang concluded:

> "The Council bears the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. No matter what the circumstances may be, the Council must shoulder its responsibility …"

1017. Mr Tafrov stated that inspections were "truly effective only with … full and active co-operation on the part of the country and Government concerned". He stated that Bulgaria sincerely regretted that efforts to disarm Iraq peacefully had "not yielded the desired results"; and confirmed that "since all the political possibilities" had "been exhausted", Bulgaria's position was that Iraq had "failed to seize its last chance".

1018. Sir Jeremy Greenstock underlined:

> "… the United Kingdom's deep regret that it has not been possible for the Council to find an agreed way forward on Iraq. The United Kingdom tried as hard as any member of the Security Council to achieve that.
> "… we should not forget what brought us to this point: the fundamental failure of Iraq to disarm in the face of 12 years of demands, pressure and pleas from the Security Council and … virtually the whole international community. If Iraq had made a genuine effort … to close outstanding issues of substance at any time in the past decade, particularly after resolution 1441 (2002) afforded it the final opportunity to do so, and if Iraq had respected the United Nations, we would not be where we are.

> "I repeat what British Ministers have made clear: any action which the United Kingdom has to take in this matter will be in accordance with international law and based on relevant resolutions of the Security Council."

1019. Sir Jeremy stated that the UN had a central role to play "on Iraq and on the wider issues associated with it" and he hoped that "with the active contribution of the Secretary-General", rapid progress could be made "on this crucial area". Ms Short was in New York to discuss humanitarian issues.

1020. Sir Jeremy concluded that the UK continued "to see an important role" for UNMOVIC and the IAEA "in verifying the disarmament of Iraq and in carrying out longer term monitoring". He commended the inspectors for their "professional work" and noted the work programmes and key tasks, but: "Equally" he noted that "without a co-operating Iraqi government … it would never be possible to be confident of the key tasks or of making progress against them". The programmes should be kept under review but a "more definitive" programme would be "possible when there is an administration in Iraq which is prepared to co-operate fully, actively and unconditionally and when there is a secure situation on the ground".

1021. Mr François Lounceny Fall, President of the Security Council and the Guinean Foreign Minister, deeply regretted that the Security Council had not been able to arrive at a common position. Guinea believed "in the possibility of safeguarding peace and attaining our common objective: the complete disarmament of Iraq". If armed conflict was "inevitable", "appropriate steps … to spare the civilian population and limit the destruction of the economic and social infrastructure" were "desirable". He was determined "to work together with other members to continue dialogue" which was "the only way to restore unity". That was "the very basis of the credibility of the Security Council" and was "more than ever necessary in order to enable it effectively to carry out its mission of preserving international peace and security".

1022. Mr Aldouri expressed his "appreciation" for the efforts made by Council members to find a peaceful solution to the "current crisis", which had been "created by the United States, the United Kingdom and Spain, with the intention of launching a hostile war against Iraq and occupying it under the pretext of the presence in Iraq of weapons of mass destruction". There had been "three or four discordant voices calling for war". Many other voices "responding to the international community and human conscience, as well as to the principles of truth, justice and the Charter of the United Nations" had called for peace.

> "For the record, and for the sake of historical accuracy, as well as to reassure every State that has recently made active efforts to maintain peace and to prevent war, we would like to reiterate that Iraq no longer possesses weapons of mass destruction. The presence of such weapons has been relegated to the past. Iraq decided in 1991 to destroy the weapons it had produced. That action stemmed from the conviction > underlying Iraq's policy to rid itself of such weapons. Proof of this … lies in the failure by the United States and Britain to prove any allegation that Iraq has possessed such weapons in recent years, and especially during the period following the adoption of resolution 1441 (2002)."

1024. Mr Aldouri stated that the inspectors had "refuted all the misleading information that was presented" by the US and UK; and that the inspectors had "proved that information to be false", including the information that Secretary Powell had "worked so arduously to put before the Council as damning evidence". The US and the UK had failed to "provide even a shred of evidence".

1025. Mr Aldouri added that, when the US and the UK:

> "… realised that the world was beginning to understand the truth, namely, that Iraq was free of weapons of mass destruction, those countries decided to expose their real goals and intentions … to occupy Iraq and to control its oil wells … The coming days will prove the reality of that truth. But by then it will be too late."

1026. Mr Aldouri stated that Iraq welcomed the work programme presented by Dr Blix and would "do its utmost to complete those tasks as soon as possible and to answer every question raised in the report". Iraq had finalised two "important" reports, on anthrax and unmanned planes, which would be handed over to UNMOVIC. He warned that the already "dire humanitarian situation", which was "due to an unjust embargo", would deteriorate further:

> "Electricity, potable water, sewage treatment, communications and other essential needs … will be affected or, as was the case in 1991, destroyed. That will lead to a real humanitarian catastrophe …
> "The direct humanitarian effects of the military attack will mean tens of thousands of casualties and the complete destruction of the country's infrastructure."

1027. Mr Aldouri dismissed the offers of millions of dollars of aid from the US and the UK and the commitment to rebuild the infrastructure that would be destroyed. He regretted the withdrawal of all UN agencies, the suspension of the Oil-for-Food programme and the withdrawal of its entire international staff "in record time". That was "truly astonishing"; and the "decision to withdraw the inspectors so swiftly" paved the way for the US and UK to "carry out acts of military aggression … much faster than was expected".

1028. Mr Aldouri concluded by reaffirming that Iraq would "continue to work with the Security Council to make the truth known" that Iraq was "free of weapons of mass destruction". Iraq hoped that the Council would "continue to search for a peaceful solution to the crisis, ensure that the work of the inspectors continues and resume the Oil-for-Food programme".

1029. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported:

> "Even at the precipice of war, Aldouri maintains Iraq has no WMD."[346]

1030. Mr Annan stated that he shared "the regrets expressed by many members of the Council" that it had "not been possible to reach a common position".[347] It was "a sad day for the United Nations and the international community". He knew that "millions of people around the world" shared that "sense of disappointment" and were "deeply alarmed by the prospect of imminent war".

1031. Mr Annan added that it was the "plight of the Iraqi people" that was now his "most immediate concern". In the short term, a conflict could "make things worse – perhaps much worse". The members of the Council should agree to "do everything we can to mitigate this imminent disaster".

1032. Mr Annan explicitly pointed out that:

> "Under international law, the responsibility for protecting civilians in conflict falls on the 'belligerents'. In any area under military occupation, responsibility for the welfare of the population falls on the Occupying Power."

1033. Mr Annan added that: "Without in any way assuming or diminishing that ultimate responsibility", the UN would do "whatever we can to help". There would be an appeal for more funds to finance relief operations and decisions by the Council would be needed to adjust the Oil-for-Food programme.

1034. Mr Annan concluded by expressing:

> "… the hope that the effort to relieve the sufferings of the Iraqi people and to rehabilitate their society after so much destruction may yet be the task around which the unity of the Council can be rebuilt."

1035. Sir Jeremy Greenstock commented that France, Russia, Germany and Syria had been "most forthright in underlining that peaceful disarmament would have been possible"; and that most delegations had underlined "the importance of re-establishing Council unity". He concluded:

> "The day went as well as could have been expected with no real recrimination. While there was a lot of regret and gloom about the political state we had reached, there was just as much focus on the way forward and humanitarian efforts. Many will have wondered why Ministers were there at all."[348]

1036. In his memoir, Mr Annan wrote:

> "The decision by the United States and its allies to proceed with the invasion of Iraq without Security Council authorisation was a defeat for all of us who had sought to ensure that Iraq's defiance of the United Nations was met by a unified and effective response. But it was a vindication, too, of principle over power. Members of the Council, including close allies and neighbours of the United States, had insisted on the prerogative of the United Nations Security Council to decide under international law whether a member state was in material breach of the Council's resolutions, and what the consequences should be."[349]

MILITARY OPERATIONS BEGIN

1037. Shortly before midnight on 19 March, the US informed Sir David Manning that there was to be a change to the plan and US air strikes would be launched at 0300 GMT on 20 March.[350]

1038. Early on the morning of 20 March, US forces crossed into Iraq and seized the port area of Umm Qasr.[351]

1039. Mr Straw told the Cabinet on 20 March that inspections had not produced the disarmament of Iraq and that Dr Blix had told the Security Council on 19 March that Iraq had "failed to produce assurance of its disarmament".[352]

1040. Mr Blair concluded that the Government:

> "… should lose no opportunity to propagate the reason, at every level and as widely as possible, why we had arrived at a diplomatic impasse, and why it was necessary to take action against Iraq. France had not been prepared to accept that Iraq's failure to comply with its obligations should lead to the use of force to achieve compliance."[353]

1041. The invasion of Iraq is addressed in Section 8. The continuing discussions about the planning and preparations for a post-conflict Iraq and the UK's role in that are addressed in Section 6.5.

Mr Blair's "Address to the Nation", 20 March 2003

In an "Address to the Nation" on 20 March, announcing that UK forces were taking part in military action, Mr Blair stated that the world faced a:

> "… new threat: of disorder and chaos born either of brutal states like Iraq, armed with weapons of mass destruction; or of extreme terrorist groups. Both hate our way of life, our freedom, our democracy.
> "My fear, deeply held, based in part on the intelligence that I see is that these threats come together and deliver catastrophe to our country and world.
> "Some say if we act, we become a target. The truth is all nations are targets …
>
> "Should terrorists obtain these weapons now being manufactured and traded round the world, the damage they could inflict to our economies, our security, to world peace, would be beyond our most vivid imagination.
> "My judgement, as Prime Minister, is that this threat is real, growing and of an entirely different nature to any conventional threat to our security that Britain has faced before.
> "For 12 years, the world has tried to disarm Saddam … UN weapons inspectors say vast amounts of chemical and biological poisons, such as anthrax, VX nerve agent, and mustard gas remain unaccounted for in Iraq.
>
> "So our choice is clear: back down and leave Saddam hugely strengthened; or proceed to disarm him by force. Retreat might give us a moment of respite but years of repentance at our weakness would I believe follow.
>
> "It is true that Saddam is not the only threat. But it is true also … that the best way to deal with future threats peacefully, is to deal with present threats with resolve.
>
> "Removing Saddam will be a blessing to the Iraqi people …
>
> "Our commitment to the post-Saddam humanitarian effort will be total. We shall help Iraq move towards democracy …
>
> "But these challenges and others that confront us … require a world of order and stability. Dictators like Saddam, terrorist groups like Al Qaida threaten the very existence of such a world.
>
> "That is why I have asked our troops to go into action tonight …"[354]

[354] The National Archives, 20 March 2003, Prime Minister's Address to the Nation.

1042. On 20 March, Ambassador William S. Farish, the US Ambassador to the UK, sent a letter congratulating Mr Blair on his success in the House of Commons debate and vote on 18 March.[355]

1043. Thanking Ambassador Farish, Mr Blair responded that he believed:

> "… the action the American and British Armed Forces are taking in Iraq will make our two countries safer and Iraq a better place for its people. I think this view is increasingly supported by British and international opinion. It is the right thing to do. I am pleased to be working so closely with President Bush on this …"[356]

SECTION 4

IRAQ'S WEAPONS OF MASS DESTRUCTION

Introduction

1. Section 4 addresses:

- how the Joint Intelligence Committee's (JIC) Assessments of Iraq's chemical, biological, nuclear and ballistic missile capabilities, and the intent of Saddam Hussein's regime to retain, produce, use or proliferate such weapons, evolved between 2000 and the invasion of Iraq in March 2003;
- the robustness of the evidence base on which those judgements were made;
- other advice given to Ministers on Iraq's capabilities and intent;
- the way in which the intelligence and Assessments were used:
  - within Government to underpin policy decisions; and
  - in public statements and material presented to Parliament to underpin the Government position that urgent action was needed to secure the disarmament of Iraq;
- the search for weapons, materials and evidence of prohibited programmes after the conflict; and
- the background to and findings of the four previous Inquiries into aspects of the issues covered in this Section.

2. In doing so, the Inquiry has drawn on the JIC Assessments addressing these issues produced between 2000 and 2005, which are being published alongside this Report.

3. The roles of the JIC, the Cabinet Office Assessments Staff and the Secret Intelligence Service (SIS), and the priority given to collection of intelligence on Iraq, are set out in Section 2.

4. As well as documents provided by the Government and the oral evidence it was given, the Inquiry has drawn on other authoritative accounts including:

- reports to the United Nations Security Council by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), the UN Special Commission (UNSCOM) and the UN Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC); and
- various reports of the Iraq Survey Group (ISG) published in 2003 to 2005.

5. Section 1.1 describes Iraq's chemical, biological, nuclear and ballistic missile programmes after the 1991 Gulf Conflict and the international community's attempts to disarm Iraq – through a series of UN Security Council resolutions, a UN inspection and monitoring regime and a policy of containment supported by limited military action – and Iraq's responses. That Section also sets out, from information available in open sources, the evolution of the JIC's Assessments of Iraq's capabilities between 1990 and December 1998.

6. Section 1.2 addresses the UK's Iraq strategy between September 2000 and September 2001.

7. The wider context of the development of UK strategy and options for Iraq after the attacks on the US on 11 September 2001 (9/11) is addressed in Section 3, including the judgement that Iraq was not involved in 9/11, the absence of evidence of links between Iraq and Al Qaida (AQ), and the potential consequences of military action for the threat to the UK and UK interests from international terrorism.

Previous Inquiries

8. Aspects of the UK Government's actions in relation to its assessment of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction (WMD), and the way in which intelligence information was deployed in support of the case for urgent action to disarm Iraq, have already been addressed by four previous Inquiries.

9. The terms of reference for each of those Inquiries, which were narrower than those of the Iraq Inquiry, are set out below.

10. The report of the House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee (FAC), The Decision to go to War in Iraq (HC 813), was published on 7 July 2003.[1] It sought to "establish whether the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO), within the Government as a whole, presented accurate and complete information to Parliament in the period leading up to military action in Iraq, particularly in respect of weapons of mass destruction".

11. The report of the Intelligence and Security Committee (ISC), Iraqi Weapons of Mass Destruction – Intelligence and Assessments (Cm 5972), was published in September 2003.[2] The ISC stated that it had "looked at the supporting intelligence in critical areas to ensure that the [JIC] Assessments reflected the intelligence correctly".

12. The Report of the Inquiry into the Circumstances Surrounding the Death of Dr David L Kelly CMG by Lord Hutton (The Hutton Inquiry, HC 247), was published on 28 January 2004.[3]

[3] Report of the Inquiry into the Circumstances Surrounding the Death of Dr David L Kelly CMG by Lord Hutton ["The Hutton Inquiry"], 28 January 2004, HC 247.

13. The Inquiry was established by Lord Falconer of Thororton, the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, on 18 July 2003:

> "urgently to conduct an investigation into the circumstances surrounding the death of Dr Kelly."[4]

14. Lord Hutton's interpretation of his terms of reference is set out in his report.[5]

15. Lord Hutton concluded that the "allegations attacking the integrity of the Government", broadcast on the BBC Today programme on 29 May 2003, that:

- "the Government probably knew, before it decided to put it in its dossier ... that the statement was wrong that the Iraqi military were able to deploy weapons of mass destruction within 45 minutes of a decision to do so"; and
- that No.10 had "ordered the dossier to be sexed up"

had to be considered under his terms of reference, because it was those allegations that had drawn Dr Kelly into the controversy about the broadcasts.

16. Lord Hutton explicitly determined that two other areas fell outside his terms of reference.

17. First, Lord Hutton stated that the question of "whether, if approved by the Joint Intelligence Committee and believed by the Government to be reliable, the intelligence contained in the dossier was nevertheless unreliable" was a "separate issue".

18. Secondly, Lord Hutton wrote that he had carefully considered "the view expressed by a number of public figures and commentators" that his "terms of reference required or, at least, entitled" him to consider:

> "... whether the intelligence in relation to weapons of mass destruction set out in the dossier published by the Government on 24 September 2002 was of sufficient strength and reliability to justify the Government in deciding that Iraq under Saddam Hussein posed such a threat to the safety and interests of the United Kingdom that military action should be taken against that country."

19. Lord Hutton "concluded that a question of such wide import, which would involve the consideration of a wide range of evidence" did not fall within his terms of reference.

20. The Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction by a Committee of Privy Counsellors chaired by Lord Butler of Brockwell (The Butler Report, HC 898), was published on 14 July 2004.[6]

[6] Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction ["The Butler Report"], 14 July 2004, HC 898.

21. The Butler Review was established by Mr Blair in February 2004 to:

> "investigate the intelligence coverage available in respect of WMD programmes in countries of concern and on the global trade in WMD, taking into account what is now known about these programmes;
> "as part of this work, to investigate the accuracy of intelligence on Iraqi WMD up to March 2003, and to examine any discrepancies between the intelligence gathered, evaluated and used by the Government before the conflict, and between that intelligence and what has been discovered by the Iraq Survey Group since the end of the conflict; and to make recommendations to the Prime Minister for the future on the gathering, evaluation and use of intelligence on WMD, in the light of the difficulties of operating in countries of concern."[7]

22. The Butler Report stated that, in assessing the intelligence on Iraq's nuclear, biological, chemical and ballistic missile capabilities to establish whether there were "any detectable systemic issues" which might have affected the JIC Assessments in the period before March 2003 and whether Assessments made at the time of the 1990 to 1991 Gulf Conflict "had a lasting impact which was reflected in JIC Assessments made in 2002 and 2003", it had addressed "three broad questions":

- What was the quality of the intelligence and other evidence, and the assessments made of it, about the strategic intent of the Iraqi regime to pursue ... programmes in contravention of its obligations under ... resolution 687?
- What was the quality of the intelligence or other evidence, and the assessments made of it, about Iraq seeking to sustain and develop its indigenous knowledge, skills and materiel base which would provide it with a 'break-out' capability ...?
- What was the quality of the intelligence or other evidence, and the assessments made of it, about Iraqi production or possession of prohibited ... agents and weapons ...?"[8]

23. Sir John Chilcot was a member of the Butler Review.

24. The Iraq Inquiry has drawn in its work on both the evidence offered to those Inquiries, where available, and their analyses and conclusions, but the judgements in this Report are the Inquiry's own.

Definition of weapons of mass destruction

25. The term "weapons of mass destruction" originated as an umbrella concept covering weapons with the capability to cause indiscriminate loss of life and wide-scale destruction.

---

[7] House of Commons, Official Report, 3 February 2004, column 625.
[8] Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction ["The Butler Report"], 14 July 2004, HC 898, paragraphs 152-153.

26. The first official definition was provided by the UN Commission for Conventional Armaments in 1948 which defined weapons of mass destruction as "atomic explosive devices, radioactive material weapons, lethal chemical and biological weapons, and any weapons developed in the future which have characteristics comparable in destructive effect to those of the atomic bomb or other weapons mentioned above".[9] This definition has been used in successive UN resolutions dealing with disarmament.

27. The Butler Report pointed out that there was "a considerable and long-standing academic debate about the proper interpretation of the phrase 'weapons of mass destruction'" which had been "used so variously as to confuse rather than enlighten readers".[10] The Butler Report avoided the use of the term WMD wherever possible. Where it was used, for example when quoting documents or evidence, the Butler Report interpreted it in the light of the obligations imposed by the UN Security Council after the 1990 to 1991 Gulf Conflict to address the threat posed by Iraq and to control Iraq's military capabilities, including weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missiles in resolution 687 (1991) (see Section 1.1).

28. The Inquiry shares the view expressed in the Butler Report but recognises that the term has gained common currency and may, therefore, appear in the analysis that follows as a shorthand description of weapons that would not fall within the original definition.

29. All nuclear, chemical and biological weapons are frequently characterised as weapons of mass destruction, and radiological devices have been included more recently.

30. The Butler Report defined radiological weapons as those employing "conventional, typically high-explosive means to distribute radioactive material".[11]

31. Systems that fall within the definition of WMD may cause limited casualties within a finite area; for example attacks such as the use of the chemical agent sarin in the Tokyo underground. On the other hand, as the attacks on the US on 11 September 2001 demonstrated, mass casualties that have a strategic impact can be produced in other ways.

32. Mr Tim Dowse, Head of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) Non-Proliferation Department from January 2001 to November 2003, told the Inquiry that "efforts to restrain the spread of ballistic missiles" tended to be "associated with" weapons of mass destruction because they provided a means of delivery against which it was difficult to defend and which was regarded as "quite destabilising".[12]

33. Nuclear, chemical and biological weapons are all subject to arms control regimes:

- the 1968 Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, which entered into force in 1970, requires non-nuclear weapons states to agree not to seek to acquire nuclear weapons; and
- the 1975 Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention (BTWC)[13] and the 1997 Chemical Weapons Convention (CWC) prohibit the development, production and stockpiling of the respective sets of weapons.

34. Iraq signed the BTWC in 1972, but did not ratify it. It did not sign the CWC until 2009. One important difference between the two conventions is that the BTWC has no effective enforcement mechanisms while the CWC does.

35. Iraq has never been a member of the Missile Technology Control Regime (MTCR).[14]

[13] The BTWC reaffirms the 1925 Geneva Protocol, which prohibits use of biological and toxin weapons.
[14] The MTCR was established in 1987 to prevent the proliferation of unmanned systems capable of delivering weapons of mass destruction. It is an informal and voluntary association that seeks members' adherence to common export policy guidelines (the MTCR Guidelines) applied to a common list of controlled goods.

Introduction and key findings

1. This Section addresses:

- the evolution of the assessment of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction (WMD) capabilities before Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush at Crawford in early April 2002; and
- how the information was used within Government and in public, including the preparation between February and July 2002 of a document for publication, initially on WMD programmes of concern in four countries and subsequently on Iraq.

2. The development of UK strategy on Iraq before the attacks on the US in September 2001 is addressed in Section 1.2; the development of UK strategy and options after 9/11 is addressed in Section 3.

3. The development of the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) Assessments of Iraq's WMD programmes from late July onwards, and the resumption of work on the dossier after Mr Blair's press conference in Sedgefield on 3 September, are addressed in Section 4.2.

Key findings

- The ingrained belief that Saddam Hussein's regime retained chemical and biological warfare capabilities, was determined to preserve and if possible enhance its capabilities, including at some point in the future a nuclear capability, and was pursuing an active policy of deception and concealment, had underpinned UK policy towards Iraq since the Gulf Conflict ended in 1991.
- Iraq's chemical, biological and ballistic missile programmes were seen as a threat to international peace and security in the Middle East, but overall, the threat from Iraq was viewed as less serious than that from other key countries of concern – Iran, Libya and North Korea.
- The Assessments issued by the JIC reflected the uncertainties within the intelligence community about the detail of Iraq's activities.
- The statements prepared for, and used by, the UK Government in public from late 2001 onwards, conveyed more certainty than the JIC Assessments about Iraq's proscribed activities and the potential threat they posed.
- The tendency to refer in public statements only to Iraq's "weapons of mass destruction" was likely to have created the impression that Iraq posed a greater threat than the detailed JIC Assessments would have supported.
- There was nothing in the JIC Assessments issued before July 2002 that would have raised any questions in policy-makers' minds about the core construct of Iraq's capabilities and intent. Indeed, from May 2001 onwards, the perception conveyed was that Iraqi activity could have increased since the departure of the weapons inspectors, funded by Iraq's growing illicit income from circumventing the sanctions regime.

- In the light of sensitivities about their content and significance, publication of documents on 'Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction', 'Weapons Inspections' and 'Abuse of Human Rights' was postponed until the policy on Iraq was clearer.

The UK's assessment of Iraq's WMD capabilities pre-9/11

The legacy of the 1990s

4. The conviction that Iraq had retained elements of its prohibited nuclear, chemical, biological and ballistic missile programmes was the fundamental tenet of UK policy towards Iraq throughout the 1990s.

5. When Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait in August 1991, Iraq had deployable stocks of chemical and biological weapons, was developing long-range missiles and had an active nuclear programme.

6. Saddam Hussein had used chemical weapons during the 1980s, in breach of international law, both against the Kurds and during the war with Iran. He did not, however, use them during the 1991 Gulf Conflict.

7. After the 1991 Conflict, the UN Security Council sought to contain Iraq's military capability and restore international peace and security. On 3 April 1991, the UN Security Council adopted resolution 687 imposing a wide range of obligations on Iraq. The obligations in relation to "weapons of mass destruction" are summarised in the Box below.

Resolution 687 (1991): Iraq's WMD obligations

Section C of resolution 687 invited Iraq (operative paragraph (OP) 7) to reaffirm unconditionally its obligations under the 1925 Geneva Protocol and to ratify the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention (BTWC).

The Security Council decided (OP8) that "Iraq shall unconditionally accept the destruction, removal or rendering harmless, under international supervision", of all:

- "chemical and biological weapons";
- "stocks of agents";
- "related sub-systems and components";
- "research, development, support and manufacturing facilities";
- "ballistic missiles with a range greater than one hundred and fifty kilometres";
- "related major parts"; and
- "repair and production facilities".

Iraq was required (OP9) to submit, within 15 days, "a declaration of the locations, amounts and types of all items" specified in OP8, and agree to urgent on-site inspection.

The Council decided (OP10) that "Iraq shall unconditionally undertake not to use, develop, construct or acquire any of the items specified" in OPs 8 and 9.

Iraq was invited (OP11) "to reaffirm unconditionally its obligations under the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons of 1 July 1968".

The Council decided (OP12) that "Iraq shall unconditionally agree not to acquire or develop nuclear weapons or nuclear-weapons-useable material, or any sub-systems or components or any research, development, support or manufacturing facilities related to" nuclear weapons.

The resolution also made provision for on-site inspection, destruction and removal of prohibited material and future monitoring and verification.

8. Containment of the threat from Iraq, and in particular its WMD capability, was a continuing foreign policy concern throughout the 1990s and frequently required active consideration of difficult and controversial issues, including significant military action.

9. The difficulties encountered by UN inspectors in pursuing the remit in resolution 687 and subsequent UN resolutions, and the decision in December 1998 to withdraw UN inspectors and to launch US and UK military action against Iraqi facilities, Operation Desert Fox, are addressed in Section 1.1.

10. In his statement to Parliament following Operation Desert Fox, Mr Blair said that the objectives were "clear and simple: to degrade the ability of Saddam Hussein to build and use weapons of mass destruction".[1]

11. The impact of Operation Desert Fox is addressed later in this Section.

12. A Joint Memorandum produced by the Foreign and Defence Secretaries for the Defence and Overseas Policy Committee (DOP) in May 1999 described policy towards Iraq as "in the short term, to reduce the threat Saddam poses to the region, including by eliminating his weapons of mass destruction (WMD) programmes".[2]

13. A summary of the evolution of the JIC Assessments of Iraq's capabilities between 1990 and December 1998 is in Section 1.1. The Butler Report concluded that it had been "left with four strong impressions" from its analysis of those Assessments:

- … effective – but not demonstrably complete – work carried out by the IAEA and UNSCOM to supervise the dismantlement of Iraq's nuclear, biological and chemical weapons programmes, together with those missile programmes prohibited under United Nations Security Council resolution 687.
- … a progressive reduction in JIC estimates of Iraq's indigenous capabilities in the period to 1994/95.

[1] House of Commons, Official Report, 17 December 1998, column 1097.
[2] Joint Memorandum by the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and the Secretary of State for Defence, 17 May 1999, 'Iraq: Future Strategy'.

- … growing suspicions and concerns underlying JIC Assessments between 1995 and 1998 of Iraq's chemical, biological and ballistic missile capabilities, which were exacerbated and reinforced by Iraqi prevarication, concealment and deception."[3]

14. The Butler Report added that it had detected "signs that this context led to the JIC making its estimates of Iraqi capabilities on an over-cautious or worst case basis" but that was "not always declared as such".

15. The Butler Report also concluded that there were "differences in the quality of the assessments carried out by the JIC" and contrasted the quality of the JIC Assessments of Iraq's nuclear capability during that time with those on chemical and biological weapons.[4]

16. On nuclear capabilities, the Butler Report stated that it had:

> "… been impressed by intelligence assessments … They were generally thorough; drew fully on both open and secret material; brought together human and technical intelligence; offered a view where appropriate on the quality of the underlying intelligence sources; were balanced and measured; identified explicitly those areas where previous assessments had been wrong, and the reasons why, to correct the record; and at each significant stage included consideration of alternative hypotheses and scenarios, and provided an explanation of the consequences were any to arise, to aid readers' understanding."

17. In relation to the Assessments on chemical and biological weapons, the Butler Report recognised that assessments were:

> "… intrinsically more difficult, and that analysis draws on different intelligence techniques. We are conscious in particular that, because chemical and biological weapons programmes can draw heavily on 'dual use' materials, it is easier for a proliferating state to keep its programmes covert. The intelligence community will also have had in mind that Iraq had used its chemical weapons in the past, and was engaged in a sustained programme to try to deceive United Nations inspectors and to conceal from them evidence of its prohibited programmes. Even so, we have found JIC Assessments in these areas less assured. Our impression is that they were less complete, especially in their considerations of alternative hypotheses; used a different 'burden of proof' in testing Iraqi declarations; and hence inclined towards over-cautious or worst case estimates, carrying with them a greater sense of suspicion and an accompanying propensity to disbelieve."

[4] Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction ["The Butler Report"], 14 July 2004, HC 898, paragraphs 208-209.

18. After its withdrawal from Iraq, the UN Special Commission (UNSCOM) produced two reports on 25 January 1999, one on the disarmament of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction and one on monitoring and verification, which were formally circulated to the Security Council on 29 January.[5]

19. The report on disarmament described the work of UNSCOM since 1991 and its methodology and set out "material balances" for proscribed missiles and chemical and biological weapons in three detailed annexes. It also included an annex "on actions by Iraq to obstruct disarmament".

20. In March 1999, the Amorim panel made a series of recommendations for changing the regime of inspection.[6]

21. After prolonged debate, resolution 1284, adopted on 17 December 1999, welcomed the reports of the three panels chaired by Mr Celso Amorim, which had been subject to "comprehensive consideration" by the Council, and stressed the "importance of a comprehensive approach to the full implementation of all relevant Security Council resolutions … and the need for Iraqi compliance with those resolutions".[7]

22. The resolution replaced UNSCOM with the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC), which would operate as the Amorim panel recommended, to provide "a reinforced system of ongoing monitoring and verification, which will implement the plan approved by the Council in resolution 715 (1991) and address unresolved disarmament issues".

23. There were significant differences about the interpretation of the resolution and the way ahead. As a result, China, France, Malaysia and Russia abstained in the vote, but there was no veto.[8]

JIC ASSESSMENT, 19 APRIL 2000: 'IRAQ: CHEMICAL AND BIOLOGICAL WEAPONS PROGRAMMES'

24. In April 2000, the JIC judged that it was likely that Iraq was continuing to develop offensive biological and chemical warfare capabilities.

---

[5] UN Security Council, 29 January 1999, 'Letter dated 25 January 1999 from the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission established by the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 9 (b) (i) of Security Council resolution 687 (1991) addressed to the President of the Security Council' (S/1999/94).

[7] UN Security Council resolution 1284 (1999).
[8] UN Security Council, '4084th Meeting Friday 17 December 1999' (S/PV.4084).

25. On 19 April 2000, the JIC produced a substantial Assessment of Iraq's chemical and biological weapons programmes.[9]

26. In its Key Judgements, the JIC stated:

- Our picture is limited. But it is likely that Iraq is continuing to develop its offensive chemical warfare (CW) and biological warfare (BW) capabilities.
- There is clear evidence of continuing Iraq biological warfare activity, including BW related research and the production of BW agent. Iraq seems to be exploring the use of mobile facilities to give its BW activities greater security. But we have no evidence for Iraq filling weapons with biological agent since the Gulf War.
- There is less evidence of continuing Iraqi chemical warfare activity, including advances in binary weapons development and the reconstruction of suspect civil chemical production facilities. There is no evidence of Iraq filling weapons with chemical agent since the Gulf War.
- The chances of detecting any production of biological warfare agent, or small scale production of chemical agent, with or without UN inspections, would be slim. But we would expect to detect evidence of the production of large quantities of chemical agent, with or without UN inspectors."

27. The Assessment stated that Iraq's doctrine for offensive chemical and biological warfare remained "unclear". It had used chemical weapons for internal repression and against Iran in the 1980s and the JIC judged that it "would be prepared to use such weapons again in similar circumstances, and, in extremis, in defence of the regime". The JIC warned that since the departure of UNSCOM in December 1998, its picture was "limited" and had been "further reduced". Iraqi officials were "well practised in concealing such programmes". Increased procurement of dual use equipment and materials could not be linked to chemical and biological warfare programmes. There were indications of continuing progress. The JIC did not know if those were "accelerating"; but the departure of the inspectors had removed "a constraint".

28. In relation to Iraq's chemical warfare activity, the Assessment stated:

- Iraq "could have hidden dual use precursor chemicals and production equipment" and the JIC continued "to assess that even with UNMOVIC and other UN controls, Iraq could produce mustard agent within weeks of a decision to do so. Iraq could produce limited quantities of nerve agent within months of such a decision."
- Procurement activities "which could be associated with a chemical weapons programme" had "continued", including efforts to procure dual use chemicals, and attempts to procure crop spraying aircraft and protective suits.

---

[9] JIC Assessment, 19 April 2000, 'Iraq: Chemical and Biological Weapons Programmes'.

- Facilities "formerly associated with Iraq's chemical warfare programme at … Habbaniyah" were "being reconstructed". There were signs of "renewed activities" but "no firm evidence" that activity was "chemical weapons related, or of the precursor plant which would be needed to produce CW agent".
- Iraq was "restoring its civil chemical production capability, including pesticides" and the JIC assessed that "would help any revival of its CW programme".
- Iraq "could be modifying bombs […] aerial bombs, procured in the 1980s, for delivery of chemical warfare agents […] a significant advance in Iraqi development of a binary type munition".
- The JIC judged that Iraq was "likely to be continuing to develop" its knowledge of chemical weapons "and other aspects of its CW capabilities".

29. In relation to Iraq's biological warfare activity, the Assessment stated:

- Iraq had "never revealed" the full extent of its offensive biological warfare programme to UNSCOM although it had admitted to "laboratory work on a range of BW agents" and that anthrax spores, botulinum toxin and aflatoxin were "produced in bulk". Bombs and missile warheads had been "filled with these agents immediately prior to the Gulf War". Iraq had "yet to make a credible 'Full, Final and Complete Declaration' of BW activity required by the UN", and its claims that it had "terminated its programme at the end of the Gulf War" had "failed to convince" the UN.
- The JIC assessed that Iraq was "likely to have concealed BW production equipment, agent stocks and weapons".
- The JIC continued "to assess that, even without procurement from abroad, Iraq has retained sufficient expertise, equipment and materials to produce BW agents within weeks using its legitimate biotechnology facilities".
- Iraq had been "trying to procure dual use materials and equipment which could be used for a BW programme", but it was "impossible to determine" whether the procurement was for a BW programme.
- There were indications that, contrary to its claims to have terminated the BW programme at the end of the Gulf War, during the last decade, Iraq had continued to conduct research on a range of biological agents using personnel known to have been connected with the programme before 1991.
- "A recent piece of liaison intelligence reported that Iraq had started to produce biological agent in 'mobile production centres'."
- "According to an Iraqi defector, planning for the project had begun in 1995 under Dr Rihab Taha … known to have played a central role in Iraq's BW programme." There were "reportedly six mobile production centres, with one under construction. As of March 1999, three of these were fully functional and work was under way to enable the production of five unspecified BW agents. At one of these sites, some 20-30 tonnes of primary product were reportedly manufactured over four months."

- The JIC assessed that those quantities of agent "could produce significant casualties".

30. The Assessment stated:

> "Iraq seems to be exploring the use of mobile facilities to give its biological warfare activities greater security. The Iraqis had mobile … facilities for filling chemical weapons at the time of the Gulf War. We know that senior Iraqis have told UNSCOM that the use of mobile facilities was considered during the planning of their one dedicated BW facility. But we have no other evidence for BW mobile production centres. We judge that it would be technically feasible for Iraq to produce 20-30 tonnes of … BW agent … We have no evidence for Iraq filling weapons with biological agent since the Gulf War. But for practical reasons, advance stockpiling of some BW agents is less likely than for CW agents.
> "In the light of this and other evidence of Iraqi illicit procurement of dual use equipment and materials, we judge that Iraq is likely to be continuing to develop its BW capabilities."

31. The Butler Report stated that the Key Judgement on Iraq's biological warfare activities was based on two new strands of evidence, and was somewhat more firmly expressed than the subsequent analysis in the Assessment might bear.

32. Considering the Assessment in 2004, the Butler Report stated that the firmer assessment (that there was "clear evidence" of continuing BW activity) in the Key Judgement:

> "… was based on two new strands of evidence. The first was intelligence reports on aspects of Iraqi research and development activities in 1997/1998. The second, and more significant, was new intelligence from a liaison service received a few days before the production of the JIC Assessment on the use by Iraq of mobile facilities to produce biological agent."

33. The Butler Report stated that the language in the Assessment on mobile laboratories:

> "… was appropriate for a new source whose reporting had not by then been validated although the Key Judgement was somewhat more firmly expressed than the subsequent analysis in the Assessment might bear."[10]

34. Sir John Scarlett, Chairman of the JIC from September 2001 to July 2004, told the Inquiry that the first report on mobile laboratories came through "in early 2000" and was "reflected … if only briefly" in the Assessment in April 2000.[11]

35. Mr Julian Miller, Chief of the Assessments Staff from September 2001 to November 2003, told the Inquiry that the reporting on mobile laboratories, which had been received "through liaison channels":

> "… appeared to tie in with some understandings that the British experts had of previous interest in use of mobile facilities. So it wasn't seen as being inherently implausible."[12]

JIC ASSESSMENT, 1 DECEMBER 2000

36. As part of the inter-departmental review of policy on Iraq in late 2000, the JIC judged that:

- It was likely that Iraq had a limited residual WMD and prohibited long-range missile capability.
- Since the departure of inspectors, the pace and scope of Iraq's missile research and development programme had increased.
- Without sanctions and UN monitoring, Iraq would accelerate its WMD and missile programmes.

37. A JIC Assessment of the prospects for Iraq co-operating with resolution 1284 (1999) on 1 November 2000, judged that Saddam Hussein's "ambitions to rebuild … weapons of mass destruction programmes" would "make him hostile to intrusive inspections or any other constraints likely to be effective".[13]

38. In December 2000, at the request of the Cabinet Office Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec), the JIC produced an Assessment of Iraq's capability to threaten its neighbours with conventional forces and weapons of mass destruction, and an analysis of how changes in the sanctions regime might affect those judgements, to inform the inter-departmental policy review on Iraq.[14]

39. The review of policy on Iraq, which began in 2000 and was intended to inform discussions with the new US Administration, is addressed in Section 1.2.

40. In its Key Judgements on WMD, the JIC stated:

- Iraq has probably concealed a handful of 650km range ballistic missiles that could reach Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and even Israel, as well as some chemical and biological agent. But even if Saddam Hussein has such weapons, he is unlikely to use them except in extremis, in order to preserve his regime or as a final gesture of defiance.
- Without economic sanctions but with effective UN monitoring, Iraq could develop though not produce longer range missiles. Although its ability to rebuild dedicated chemical weapons or large scale biological weapons production capabilities would be constrained, it would be able to use civil industry to produce chemical and biological agents. UN monitoring would, however, act as a deterrent to Iraqi development of its nuclear ambitions.

- Without both economic sanctions and UN monitoring, Iraq would accelerate its WMD and missile programmes. It could produce new 650km range missiles within a year. But it would take at least five years to make a crude nuclear device and a further two to manufacture a nuclear warhead for missiles."

41. The conclusions on Iraq's WMD are set out in the Box below.

JIC Assessment, 1 December 2000: 'Iraq's Military Capabilities'

The residual threat from WMD

Assessing whether there was a "residual threat" from Iraq's WMD, the JIC stated that "most of [its] ballistic missiles, chemical weapons and nuclear programme have been destroyed". Iraq had claimed to have destroyed its biological weapons capability but that could not be confirmed. It was "likely" that Iraq had a "residual WMD and missile capability":

- a "handful of ageing SCUD-derived missiles with a range of up to 650km" [the Al Hussein] were "probably disassembled and concealed". Those "could be re-assembled quickly ['within weeks'] and used (albeit with limited accuracy) against targets in Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, and even Israel";
- "some chemical and biological agent may be concealed, possibly weaponised";
- Iraq had "developed a missile with a range of 150km [the Al Samoud], which is permitted under UN controls. Although not fully operational, this could reach Kuwait and Saudi Arabia"; and
- Iraq was "converting the L-29 jet trainer aircraft into a crude remotely piloted vehicle which could carry an explosive, chemical or biological weapon to Kuwait and against other targets in the northern Gulf".

Prospects for the future

The JIC stated that "in the absence of UN inspectors", since December 1998, Iraq had:

- "… increased the pace and scope of its missile research and development programmes. Series production" of the Al Samoud missile "could begin within months". A "longer range version (up to 200km)" was "being worked on".
- There was "no evidence" of a revival in the Al Hussein programme.
- "According to intelligence preliminary work" was "under way on another missile with a possible range of over 700km".
- Intelligence suggested "some biological and chemical warfare activity". Iraq was "rebuilding its civil chemical industry, including facilities formerly associated with chemical weapons".

- The JIC judged that "Iraq may already be producing biological agent and could produce a small number of chemical weapons within weeks of a decision to do so"; and, "were economic sanctions lifted", Iraq could "build a large scale production capability within a few years".
- The same was "probably true for biological weapons".
- There was "little evidence of nuclear weapons research": but, "as in all areas of WMD", Iraq retained "expertise" and was "trying to buy dual-use materials".

The JIC judged that Saddam Hussein would "seek to re-establish all his WMD and missile programmes":

"• effective UNMOVIC and IAEA monitoring would act as a deterrent and constraint to his ambitions, in particular on the nuclear and longer range missile programmes. But it would be less effective in monitoring Iraq's development of chemical and biological weapons, which could be more easily concealed;

- without economic sanctions but with effective UN monitoring, Iraq could conduct research and development on longer range missiles. It could not, however, put them into production. Its ability to rebuild a dedicated chemical weapons or large scale biological weapons production capability would be constrained. But Iraq could use its restored civil chemical industry and existing biotechnology industry to produce chemical and biological agent. Effective UN monitoring would act as a deterrent to Iraqi development of its nuclear ambitions;
- without either economic sanctions or an effective UN monitoring presence, Iraq would significantly increase its procurement and accelerate its WMD and missile programmes. Iraq could begin to produce a small number of new … Al Hussein missiles within a year. We would be less likely to detect progress in other areas. It would take Iraq at least five years to make a crude nuclear device and a further two years to manufacture a nuclear warhead for missiles."

The Assessment stated if economic sanctions were lifted, military sanctions would remain in place for some time. If they were eventually lifted "both Saddam Hussein and any likely successor" were "likely to give high priority" to restoring military capability, "including WMD".

How sanctions and UN monitoring had affected the development of Iraq's WMD and ballistic missile programmes, and how the progressive lifting of both would affect the future of Iraq's WMD capability against its neighbours, was examined in more detail in an Annex to the Assessment. That included:

Ballistic missile capability

- The JIC judged that, following the Gulf War, Iraq had "probably concealed components and a small number of … Al Hussein missiles".
- Since 1991, Iraq had "expanded its liquid propellant expertise with the Al Samoud missile". Development of the missile had "accelerated over the past year as a result of increased funding and Saddam Hussein's personal interest" and "Iraq had also been working on extending its range to at least 200km". Iraq believed that "with further imports, they could complete development work for this version within 6 months". Iraq was "also expanding a number of sites associated with its solid fuel missile programme". "Preliminary work" was "under way on the 150km Ababil-100". Iraq "would continue with the development" of that missile and "the longer range solid propellant project".

- "Series production of Al Samoud could begin within months. A longer range version might be developed over the same period."
- Iraq "could assemble a number of Al Hussein missiles for deployment within weeks".
- "Without trade sanctions and UN monitoring, Iraq could produce a small number of new Al Hussein missiles within a year."

Chemical warfare programmes

- "All known CW production facilities and dedicated precursor plants were disassembled or destroyed during the Gulf Conflict or subsequently under UNSCOM supervision"; but "agents, munitions, warheads, precursor chemicals and production equipment" could have been concealed from UN inspectors.
- Sanctions and monitoring had slowed "reconstruction of some of the facilities formerly associated with" Iraq's CW programme.
- While there was "no firm evidence of a chemical warfare programme", Iraq had "continued to acquire dual use chemicals and conduct research". That "and intelligence of research into weaponising aerial bombs suggests that some chemical warfare activity continues".
- Iraq "could produce small but significant amounts of mustard agent within weeks of a decision to do so. It could produce nerve agent within months … It could also produce small numbers of CW munitions and missile warheads."
- "Were trade sanctions lifted, and in the absence of UNMOVIC, Iraq could re-establish a large scale production capability within a few years."

Biological warfare programme

- Iraq "claimed to have … destroyed all … materials and weapons" related to its biological warfare programme, but the JIC judged that it might "retain hidden production equipment, stocks of agent and even biological weapons".
- Sanctions had "slowed but not prevented imports of dual use equipment that could be used in a BW programme".
- Iraq still had "sufficient expertise, equipment and material to produce BW without procurement from abroad. It could use legitimate civil or dedicated BW facilities, including mobile laboratories, for this work."

Nuclear weapons programme

- Iraq had "retained the scientific cadre associated with nuclear weapons work. Iraqi entities, some formerly associated with its nuclear programme, seek dual use equipment that could be used in association with a centrifuge programme. Unconfirmed intelligence indicates Iraqi interest in acquiring uranium and continuing nuclear weapons related research after the Gulf War. None of the intelligence acquired since the war is 'smoking gun' evidence. But it remains suspicious and seems indicative of attempts to retain a cadre of expertise, which will decline over time without international access."

- Iraq still lacked "fissile material and the infrastructure to make it".
- If Iraq were "able to acquire sufficient fissile [material] for a weapon or centrifuges and feed material from outside Iraq", the time periods to manufacture a crude nuclear weapon and a nuclear warhead could, "with foreign assistance", be "significantly shortened, with or without current controls".

42. The JIC's conclusions in relation to Iraq's threat to its neighbours are set out in Section 1.2.

43. The Butler Report stated that the intelligence supporting the judgements on Iraq's research and development programmes for ballistic missiles "came from a range of sources", and was "substantial".[15]

44. Addressing the intelligence underpinning the Assessment on Iraq's nuclear activities, the Butler Report stated:

- Intelligence had detected a visit of Iraqi officials to Niger in 1999,[16] and some details had subsequently been confirmed by Iraq. The purpose of the visit was not immediately known but, in the circumstances, including Iraq's previous purchases of uranium ore from Niger, the JIC judged that the purchase of uranium ore could have been the subject of discussions and noted that unconfirmed intelligence indicated Iraqi interest in acquiring uranium.[17]
- "There was further and separate intelligence that in 1999 the Iraqi regime had also made inquiries about the purchase of uranium ore in the Democratic Republic of Congo."[18]
- The description of the intelligence underpinning the statement on Iraq's interest in acquiring uranium from Africa was "represented correctly by the JIC".[19]
- The statements in the Assessment about Iraqi attempts to procure dual use equipment that could be used in association with a centrifuge programme fairly represented the intelligence.[20]

JIC ASSESSMENT, 9 FEBRUARY 2001: 'LONG RANGE BALLISTIC MISSILE THREAT'

45. In February 2001, the JIC assessed that Iraq was covertly working on long range missile systems, but it would be unable to achieve an operational capability while sanctions remained effective.

46. Based on one recent intelligence report, the JIC suggested for the first time that Iraq might have assembled "up to 20" Al Hussein missiles.

47. The JIC issued an updated Assessment of the "long range ballistic missile intentions and capabilities of North Korea, Iran, Iraq and Libya and their likely development over the next 10-15 years" on 9 February 2001.[21] Those four countries were the only states currently developing long range ballistic missiles (with ranges over 1,000km) which were of concern to the UK.

48. The Assessment stated that North Korea was the main proliferator of ballistic missile technology. It also stated that Iran was developing long range missiles as part of what was judged to be a regional policy to deter other actors, including Iraq.

49. In its Key Judgements relevant to Iraq, the JIC stated:

- At present, none of them intends to attack the UK and only North Korea has a clear intent to develop a capability to reach the US. But their intentions could change quickly. Our assessments must therefore concentrate on capabilities, including both worst case engineering judgements and best estimates of the likely timeframes of their acquisition of usable … missiles.
- Iraq is covertly developing ballistic missiles that are beyond the 150km range permitted … It could also be in the early stages of developing a two stage system with a possible range of 2,000km. If successful, this would significantly increase the threat Saddam poses in the region and could, in the longer term, be developed to become a threat to the UK and US. At present, however, Iraq's missile programmes are constrained by sanctions. While they remain effective, it is unlikely that Iraq could achieve an operational long range capability."

50. The JIC Assessment stated:

- Iraq was "known to want a capability to target Israel and Iran, and would like to acquire a capability to reach the rest of the Gulf"; and its "strategic objectives" would "probably remain the same whether or not the current Government remains in power".
- The JIC did "not know" whether an Iraqi Government "would aim to target Western Europe or the US, but it would be a credible deterrent objective for Saddam".

---

[21] JIC Assessment, 9 February 2001, 'Long Range Ballistic Missile Threat'.

- Any acquisition of long range missiles "would significantly increase Saddam's threat to the region and could, in the longer term, become a threat to the UK and US".
- In the absence of the UN monitors, Iraq had "increased the pace and scope of its missile programmes".
- The programmes were "at an early stage of development" and, while the embargo remained effective, it was "improbable that Iraq could produce an operational long range capability".
- The JIC knew that Iraq had "retained key components of disassembled 650km range Al Hussein missiles. Recent intelligence suggests that they may have assembled up to 20 of these missiles."
- Iraq had used its permitted programmes "to develop the expertise it acquired on longer range systems before the Gulf War".
- Intelligence indicated that "Iraq may be working on a two stage solid propellant missile capable of delivering a payload to a range of some 2000km.
- Iraq had "yet to develop successfully even its current short range solid propellant system".
- The JIC assessed that "Were sanctions lifted … Iraq could produce a missile that could reach Europe, and possibly the UK within about six years and one capable of reaching the US within ten years." Those timeframes "could be shortened if Iraq received significant external assistance or was able to buy North Korean missile kits".
- Iraq was "technically capable of arming a missile with a conventional, chemical or biological warhead".
- The JIC judged it would take Iraq "at least seven years after the lifting of sanctions to produce a nuclear warhead".
- The JIC could not yet "assess" what the payload would need to be for a nuclear warhead on a missile which would be able to reach the UK, or whether Iraq would "be able to develop the 500kg nuclear payload needed [for a missile] to reach the US in that time".

51. The Butler Report stated that the JIC appeared to have based its judgement about Iraq's possession of Al Hussein missiles on its long-standing view on Iraq's concealment activities and three pieces of intelligence from three separate sources.[22] The figure of "up to 20" missiles, which was used in all subsequent JIC Assessments and Government statements, was provided by one of those sources who was in a position to report authoritatively and reported reliably. He was, however, passing on the comments of a sub-source who reported only once and whom the Secret Intelligence Service (SIS) was not able to contact after the conflict.

52. The need for a revised set of controls for Iraq's WMD and military programmes was agreed by No.10 in March 2001.

53. An FCO initiative seeking more information publicly to explain policy on Iraq seems not to have been pursued.

54. Sir John Sawers, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs from 1999 to 2001, told the Inquiry that, during the first meeting of Mr Blair and President Bush at Camp David on 23 February 2001 (see Section 1.2), Mr Colin Powell, US Secretary of State, had:

> "… made clear that he was most concerned about Iraqi activities on chemical and biological weapons. There was a range of dual use goods here that should be properly controlled and should be subject to sanctions but the wider range of trade sanctions should be removed."[23]

55. The record of the Camp David meeting stated that the US and UK agreed on the need for a policy which was more widely supported in the Middle East region.[24] As a result of the policy of the previous 10 years, Iraq was not as large a threat as it could have been (including to Kuwait); but Saddam was still pursuing WMD (he had done little on the nuclear side).

56. The revised policy framework for Iraq, issued by No.10 on 7 March 2001, began:

> "A revised set of controls [on Iraq] would be introduced as soon as possible, focused on Iraq's WMD and military programmes."[25]

57. Mr Tim Dowse, Head of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) Non-Proliferation Department from January 2001 to November 2003, told the Inquiry that the FCO Board expressed an interest in early 2001 in drawing on intelligence and unclassified material to put more into the public domain to explain policy on Iraq.[26]

58. The UK Government has been unable to identify any documents relating to this issue.[27]

59. On 25 April, Mr Dowse asked Mr Peter Ricketts, Chairman of the JIC from September 2000 to September 2001, for his help.[28] Mr Dowse wrote that there was "growing frustration" in the FCO that:

> "… while we continue publicly to emphasise our concerns about the rebuilding of Iraqi WMD (and indeed the current UK/US review of policy looks like putting even more emphasis on this angle), the lines we have to deploy are based entirely on pre-Desert Fox material and are showing signs of too much recycling. Requests earlier this year from the Foreign Secretary and the FCO Policy Advisory Board for more up-to-date material received no response."

60. A Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) review of the intelligence had produced "somewhat disappointing results".

61. Mr Dowse added that he understood the difficulties, but wrote:

> "… it may be that there really is no more we can say and that we will have to rely on clever re-packaging. But our material compares unfavourably with fuller and fresher briefings […] … I wonder whether it might be worth a meeting to go over the possibilities, on the lines of the exercise the Cabinet Office co-ordinated just before Desert Fox, which produced an 'unclassified JIC paper' and a note for MPs, journalists etc?"

62. The UK Government has been unable to identify any response to this minute.[29]

JIC ASSESSMENT, 10 MAY 2001

63. An Assessment issued on 10 May 2001, examining the UK's ability to identify Iraq's WMD facilities and the impact of military action, marked a shift in the JIC's perception of Iraq's intentions and activities.

64. The JIC acknowledged that the evidence base for its judgements on developments since December 1998 was "patchy", but stated that Iraq was "becoming bolder" in conducting prohibited activities.

65. At the request of the MOD, a further JIC Assessment examining "what we know of Iraq's WMD programmes, their future direction, our level of confidence in the intelligence, our confidence in being able to identify the location of Iraq's WMD facilities accurately and the potential impact of direct military action against them", was produced on 10 May 2001.[30]

[30] JIC Assessment, 10 May 2001, 'Iraqi WMD Programmes: Status and Vulnerability'.

66. The JIC noted that its "knowledge of developments" in Iraq's WMD and ballistic missile programmes since December 1998 was "patchy", but that "intelligence gives grounds for concern and suggests that Iraq is becoming bolder in conducting activities prohibited by UNSCR [UN Security Council resolution] 687".

67. The JIC knew "most about Iraq's ballistic missile programme", where there had been "a step change in progress" over the previous two years. It knew that Iraq was "developing longer range systems possibly up to 2,000km", and had "good intelligence on research and development facilities" but did "not know where the longer range missiles will be built".

68. The JIC had "no clear intelligence on Iraq's nuclear programme". There was "evidence of increased activity at Iraq's only remaining nuclear facility and a growing number of reports on possible nuclear related procurement".

69. The JIC judged but could not confirm that Iraq was "conducting nuclear related research and development into the enrichment of uranium and could have longer term plans to produce enriched uranium for a weapon. If successful, this could reduce the time needed to develop a nuclear warhead once sanctions were lifted."

70. The JIC continued to assess that "while sanctions remain in place, Iraq cannot indigenously develop and produce nuclear weapons. Were sanctions lifted, it would take Iraq at least five years to produce a nuclear device and a further two to produce a warhead."

71. The JIC had "good intelligence of Iraq's former chemical and biological warfare (CBW) facilities, their limited reconstruction and civil production". That suggested "a continuing research and development programme". There was "additional unconfirmed but credible intelligence of weapons filling". But the JIC could not "confirm that specific sites" were "being used for CBW related activity".

72. In the main body of the Assessment, the JIC:

- judged that intelligence reports reflected "a continuing chemical warfare programme, including research and development, together with the possible production and weaponisation of agent";
- stated that the picture of Iraq's BW programme was "unclear"; and
- stated that Iraq's CBW capability was "not new", but represented "the most immediate Iraqi threat".

73. Other key points in the Assessment are set out in the Box below.

JIC Assessment, 10 May 2001: 'Iraqi WMD Programmes: Status and Vulnerability'

- Intelligence on Iraqi WMD was "difficult to obtain and to verify".
- "Little of the intelligence is, however, sufficiently clear to identify the exact status and ultimate objectives of these programmes. Intelligence is clearest on Iraq's missile facilities and associated activities."
- "Because of the need for raw materials and components from abroad, sanctions remain an obstacle to the development of all Iraq's WMD programmes."

Iraq's ballistic missile programme

- There was "reliable intelligence of Iraq's current short range ballistic missile programmes" and "a growing body of evidence that Iraq intends to develop missiles well beyond its permitted range of 150km". That "would represent a step change in Saddam Hussein's military capabilities".
- "An injection of an additional [US]$20 million and political pressure from Saddam Hussein" appeared "to have accelerated progress over the past year". That included:
  - "work on extending the range of the Al Samoud missile to 200-300km – production could start within the year";
  - "work on a further missile engine test stand with the capacity for much larger engines than the Al Samoud, including SCUD";
  - the intelligence was "less clear on longer term missile objectives";
  - "… tests on pairs of solid propellant motor cases. These are at a very early stage of development, but if combined in a missile, they could have a range of up to 2,000km with a 500kg payload. Developed individually into missiles, using the same payload, they could achieve a range of between 700-1,200km."
- The JIC assessed that both the Al Samoud and its extended range version "could deliver a conventional, chemical or biological warhead".
- The JIC did "not know the location of some 20 reassembled 650km range Al Hussein missiles".
- "Apart from the construction of a large test stand", there was "nothing to indicate plans to produce new SCUD type missiles".
- The JIC did "not know enough about the possible 2,000km range missile to judge a timescale for its completion".

Chemical warfare programmes

- The JIC had "good intelligence of Iraq's former CW associated facilities"; intelligence of "other related CW activity, including possible weaponisation" was "less clear".
- The JIC did "not know the location of pre-Gulf War CW related stocks or where Iraq may have filled weapons. Such stocks would enable Iraq to use its chemical industry to produce significant amounts of mustard gas within weeks of a decision to do so, and nerve agents within months."

Biological warfare programme

- The JIC had "good intelligence of one facility that could be used to support BW agent production. Other Intelligence which points to the possible research and production of BW agent is unconfirmed."
- Iraq retained "equipment and materials to produce BW" and it had "a number of delivery options"; but there was "currently little evidence of BW activity at facilities formerly associated with Iraq's BW programme".
- The Assessment pointed to additional intelligence on "Iraqi attempts to recruit new scientists by people formerly associated with Iraq's BW programme to work on BW related research, including genetic engineering"; "liaison reports of at least six mobile Iraqi BW production facilities for a number of unidentified agents"; and "evidence of increased activity at a former BW associated plant in Amariyah".
- The JIC continued to judge that "Iraq could produce BW agent within weeks of a decision to do so".

Iraq's nuclear programme

- Iraq had "recalled its nuclear scientists in 1998". It had made "efforts … since 1998 to procure items that could be used in a uranium enrichment programme using centrifuges".

Those included: "aluminium pipes [tubes]" and "other dual use items".

Vulnerability of Iraq's WMD programme

In relation to direct military action, the JIC judged that: "Although some WMD facilities could be destroyed by direct military action, this would be unlikely to have a significant overall impact on Iraq's WMD programmes". This was because:

- we do not know where all ballistic missile development is taking place. There would be some impact on Iraq's permitted missile development programme, but military action would at best only delay the development of prohibited longer range missiles;
- although targeting of Iraq's remaining nuclear facility might have some impact on its nuclear programme, it would be unlikely to eliminate all nuclear activity, some of which may be taking place at other sites;
- because much of Iraq's CBW activity can be conducted in legitimate civil research facilities, Iraq's CBW programme is likely to be unaffected by action against known suspect sites."

The Assessment stated that "targeting of suspected chemical or biological facilities would be portrayed as attacks on the civil infrastructure and would in any case have limited or no impact on Iraq's ability to produce and weaponise chemical or biological agent".

The Assessment concluded:

> "… our ability to constrain Iraqi development of its WMD through other means is limited. The development of Iraq's WMD has been helped in recent years by the absence of UN inspectors, the increase in illegal border trade and hard currency available to Iraq. There have been an increasing number of > […] reports on orders for illegal imports of missile related components and missile related components and materials […] Because of the need for raw materials and components from abroad, sanctions remain an obstacle to the development of all Iraq's WMD programmes."

74. Under a heading "Implications", the JIC observed:

> "This Assessment underlines the importance of pursuing vigorously work on the proposed UN controlled goods list, which would help sustain effective controls on Iraqi WMD development."

75. The Butler Report commented that the Assessment "signalled a clear change in the JIC's perception".[31]

76. The Butler Report considered that the JIC judgements on Iraq's ballistic missile programmes were "well-founded and properly expressed".[32]

77. Mr Miller told the Inquiry that the intelligence on the ballistic missile programme was "fuller, and in retrospect, proved to be more reliable".[33] There was reliable reporting on missile production at one site. Separate reporting about the retention of Al Hussein missiles came from a source that was "characterised as regular and reliable".

78. Mr Miller added that the report on the retention of the Al Hussein missiles was from "a year or two previously", and that there was "a rather longer standing view that their disposal hadn't been properly accounted for".[34]

79. In relation to the judgement that Iraq was "conducting nuclear related research and development into the enrichment of uranium and could have longer term plans to produce enriched uranium for a weapon", the Butler Report stated it:

> "… was based on two human intelligence reports, both from new sources and neither speaking from direct, current experience. Unusually in the nuclear field, we conclude that those reports were given more weight in the JIC Assessment than they could reasonably bear."[35]

80. Mr Miller told the Inquiry that there was "limited" new intelligence underpinning the Assessment on the nuclear programme. There was an SIS report that scientists had been recalled to work on the programme in 1998 and other reports on Iraq's attempts to procure aluminium tubes and magnets.[36]

81. The Butler Report stated that the judgements on Iraq's CW programme:

> "appear to have been based on three main pieces of evidence:
> - A single report from a new source who reported details of a project three years ago to integrate … VX into rocket artillery warheads and the subsequent filling of 60 warheads.
> - A further single report from a new source, passing on the comments of a subsource that he had been part of a project to produce the nerve agent VX in the period to 1998, again three years earlier.
> - Intelligence pointing to the restoration of a facility formerly used for production of chemical agent precursors and on shipments to the plant, although there was no positive evidence that precursors had been produced.
> "A further report from a liaison service on the establishment of a group of chemical experts to work on the production of chemical agent using mobile facilities appears to have been discounted by the JIC."[37]

82. The Butler Report concluded that the Assessment "reflected these reports fairly"; the intelligence "applied mainly to historical (as opposed to current) activity and, even so, was by no means conclusive".[38]

83. Mr Miller told the Inquiry:

- There was a new, UK human source at that time, "giving an account of weaponisation of … VX in the mid- to late 1990s".
- There was "another new source, with older reporting, about production in the earlier 1990s".
- The reporting on VX "seemed to be reports to which we should pay serious attention" from "people who would have been in a position to know", although one of them was "a new source".
- Chemical production had been mentioned in the reporting "through liaison on mobile laboratories … The view at the time by the technical experts was that if there were mobile facilities … they were more likely to have a role in filling chemical munitions than the production of chemical agents."[39]

84. In relation to reports of the recruitment of new scientists to work on BW research and activity at a facility formerly associated with BW, the Butler Report stated that the "additional intelligence" identified "came from human intelligence and imagery". It concluded that, "although the human intelligence was recording events that had taken place some time previously", it had been fairly reflected by the JIC.[40]

85. Sir John Scarlett told the Inquiry that the May 2001 Assessment had drawn "on two big assessments" in 2000 and provided "a sort of starting point". By that time:

- "… there was heightened concern … about possible nuclear-related procurement and longer-term plans to enrich uranium."
- "Iraq was assessed to retain some stocks of chemical … agents and weapons, but there were no details on locations or quantities. But there was a lot of attention being paid to the reconstruction of … facilities which had been used in the past for chemical agent production."
- There was "clear evidence of continuing biological warfare activity … [T]he intelligence about mobile production laboratories … was taken seriously. And … there was a lot of emphasis on the capability of Iraq's … industry to start production of agents very quickly if a decision was taken to do that."
- If Iraq "were to extend" the range of permitted ballistic missiles and then "design longer range missiles, that was given a lot of prominence in the assessment as a step change in the progress they were making".[41]

86. Sir John subsequently added that the Assessment was:

> "… a fairly firm judgement based on limited intelligence, but taking account of a lot of other issues, including past behaviour … not just in terms of use but also of deception and concealment and so on."[42]

Wider concerns about proliferation and terrorist use of WMD

87. The perception of the threat posed by Iraq's WMD programmes should be seen in the context of wider concerns about the proliferation of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons and their delivery systems, particularly ballistic missiles. By 2000 this was regarded as a major threat.

88. The Butler Report examined the background to the concerns about the nuclear, chemical, biological and ballistic missile programmes of Libya, Iran, North Korea and Iraq, and the state of knowledge about global trade and potential sources of proliferation. It also reviewed the intelligence available on the possibility that terrorist groups might seek to use such weapons.

[42] Public hearing, 8 December 2009, page 42.

89. The possibility that terrorist groups might seek to use unconventional weapons was, until the mid-1990s, considered unlikely.

90. The Butler Review reported that JIC Assessments during the 1980s considered the possibility that terrorist groups might seek to use unconventional weapons as "remote".[43]

91. In June 1989, the JIC stated:

> "We have no intelligence that any terrorist group makes CBW agents, possesses any such agents or is currently contemplating attacks using CBW agents or other toxic chemicals. The use of CBW agents by terrorists would generate widespread fear and could cause large numbers of casualties … The mere threat of such use could be sufficient to cause panic.
>
> "A terrorist would need only small quantities of CW agents. The simpler ones could in principle be made by anyone with a knowledge of A-level chemistry using readily obtainable materials. We believe that terrorist organisations could also readily obtain and handle without insurmountable difficulty, suitable bacteria, viruses and certain toxins.
> "Although CBW proliferation undoubtedly increases the risk that CBW agents could be stolen … or even supplied to terrorists by state sponsors … this prospect must be viewed against a background where many suitable agents can be manufactured in small quantities using easily available materials. So far as terrorism is concerned, proliferation (if it comes about) may not necessarily be much affected by the actions of States with the relevant capability."[44]

92. In July, the JIC stated:

> "We believe that even the most sophisticated and well-organised terrorist group is highly unlikely to be able to steal and then detonate a nuclear weapon within the foreseeable future … At present the most feasible terrorist nuclear incident would probably be a credible hoax …"[45]

93. In April 1992, the JIC considered the technical options for terrorist attacks using chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear weapons, but emphasised the perceived difficulties, stating that terrorist groups might:

> "… be deterred by the danger to their own members, or by the risk of alienating the public and especially their own supporters. They may also fear that an attack would cause international outrage leading to determined efforts on an international scale to bring them to book. By contrast, conventional weapons are cheaper, easier to procure, and offer equal or greater effectiveness against traditional targets …"[46]

94. In the context of reports of fissile material being available on the black market, the JIC concluded in April 1994 that it was:

"… extremely unlikely that a terrorist group could produce even a crude nuclear device; nor is there any evidence that any group has contemplated the use of nuclear weapons. A more plausible scenario might be the dispersal of radioactive materials …

"We believe that terrorists would not be able to acquire or deploy a nuclear weapon; radiological attacks are … unlikely."[47]

95. The Assessment also stated:

"Attacks involving chemical or biological agents are also unlikely …"

96. In an Assessment in July 1996, responding to a G7 declaration that special attention should be paid to the threat of the use of nuclear, biological and chemical materials for terrorist purposes, the JIC stated:

"There is no indication of any terrorist or other group showing interest in the use of nuclear, biological or chemical (NBC) materials against the UK. For a number of reasons, conventional weapons are likely to remain more attractive for terrorist purposes. But last year's nerve agent attack in Tokyo [the use of sarin by the Aum Shinrikyo sect in the Tokyo underground in March 1995] will have heightened interest and, with ever more NBC information publicly available, hoaxes threatening NBC use are likely to become more difficult to assess."[48]

97. After Usama Bin Laden returned to Afghanistan, evidence accumulated of his interest in chemical and biological materials.

98. Usama Bin Laden had first become known as a high-profile supporter of Islamist extremism when fighting the Soviet forces in Afghanistan in the 1980s.[49]

99. He founded the international terrorist group known as Al Qaida in 1989, "dedicated to opposing 'un-Islamic' governments in Muslim countries with force and violence". He was based in Afghanistan and Pakistan from 1989 to 1991, when he moved to Sudan. Usama Bin Laden returned to Afghanistan in 1996.

100. In response to the presence of the US in the Arabian Peninsula and its "continuing aggression against the Iraqi people", Usama Bin Laden and others issued a "fatwa" in February 1998 stating that it was "an individual duty for every Muslim" to "kill the Americans and their allies – civilian and military".[50]

101. In November 1998, the JIC stated that Usama Bin Laden had:

> "… a long-standing interest in the potential use of CBR [chemical, biological and radiological] materials, and recent intelligence suggests his ideas about toxic materials are maturing and being developed in more detail … There is also secret reporting that he may have obtained some CB material – and that he is interested in nuclear materials. We assess that he lacks the expertise or facilities even to begin making a nuclear weapon, but he might seek to make a radiological device."[51]

102. In an interview with the BBC and the London-published Arabic newspaper Asharq Al-Awsat in December 1998, following Operation Desert Fox, Usama Bin Laden stated that "The British and American people loudly declared their support for their leaders' decision to attack Iraq", and that made it "the duty of Muslims to confront fight and kill" citizens of the two countries.[52]

103. BBC News reported that Usama Bin Laden had stated that it was the duty of Muslims to "get rid of all the Americans and all of the Jews out of the land of Islam".

104. In 1999, the JIC revised its position, concluding that some terrorists were no longer reluctant to cause mass casualties. The risk of a terrorist incident using chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear material had increased, but most terrorists would "continue to favour conventional weapons".

105. Following receipt of further intelligence, the JIC stated in June 1999:

> "Most of UBL's [Usama Bin Laden's] planned attacks would use conventional weapons. But he continues to seek chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear material and to develop a capability for its terrorist use. There is insufficient evidence to conclude that he has yet acquired radiological or nuclear material. In contrast, we now assess that his followers have access to some unspecified chemical or biological material. Some have received basic training in its use against individuals or in confined spaces.
> "In April a leading Egyptian terrorist … told an Egyptian court that UBL had CB 'weapons' which he could use against US or Israeli targets."[53]

[53] Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction ["The Butler Report"], 14 July 2004, HC 898, paragraph 118.

106. In July 1999, the JIC changed one of the key assumptions underpinning previous assessments, concluding that some terrorists were no longer reluctant to cause mass casualties:

> "Over the 1990s there has been a significant increase in the quantity and quality of intelligence that some terrorists are interested in CBRN – and particularly in chemical and biological materials – as weapons. The risk of a CBRN terrorist incident has risen, albeit from a low base. In part this increase reflects the rise of Islamic extremism and ethnic hatred as terrorist motivations: some of the terrorists … are less constrained by considerations such as public support, casualties among innocent bystanders, and the prospect of retaliation. It may also reflect the increasing availability of information about making and using CB materials … [S]ociety's vulnerability to terrorist attack from CB or radiological materials is high, exacerbated by the lack of a tried and tested CB counter-terrorist response in some countries."[54]

107. In addition, the JIC assessed that Usama Bin Laden had successfully acquired non-conventional weapons:

> "… It has become clear that Usama Bin Laden has been seeking CBRN materials … His wealth permits him to fund procurement, training and experimentation to an extent unmatched by other terrorists … Given the quantity and quality of intelligence about his interests in CB materials, the length of time he has sought them, and the relative ease with which they can be made, we assess that he has by now acquired or made at least modest quantities of CB materials – even if their exact nature and effectiveness are unclear. The significance of his possession of CB materials is that, in contrast to other terrorists interested in CB, he wishes to target US, British and other interests worldwide. There is also intelligence on training in the use of chemicals as weapons in a terrorist camp in Afghanistan, although it is not yet clear if this is under Bin Laden's auspices … Bin Laden's attacks remain more likely to employ conventional weapons than CB materials."[55]

108. The JIC retained its conclusion that:

> "… the indications of terrorist interest in CBRN materials have yet to be matched by a comparable amount of evidence about possession and intent to use CBRN. Most terrorists continue to favour conventional weapons, as easier to use, more reliable, safer and more controllable than CBRN materials."[56]

109. Security Council resolution 1267 (1999) noted the US indictment of Usama Bin Laden and deplored the fact that the Taliban continued to provide him with a safe haven "to operate a network of terrorist training camps … and to use Afghanistan as a base from which to sponsor international terrorist operations".[57]

110. The resolution:

- insisted that the Taliban authorities should "comply promptly" with previous resolutions "and in particular cease the provision of sanctuary and training for international terrorists and their organisations …";
- demanded that the Taliban turn over Usama Bin Laden to a country where he could be "effectively brought to justice"; and
- decided to impose sanctions on the Taliban.

111. In January 2000, the JIC stated that :

> "UBL retains his interest in obtaining chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear (CBRN) materials and expertise. In autumn 1999 there was intelligence that he had recruited … chemicals specialists … Our assessment remains that UBL has some toxic chemical or biological materials, and an understanding of their utility … But we have yet to see hard intelligence that he possesses genuine nuclear material."[58]

112. By August 2000, the JIC concluded that, although other Islamist extremist groups had an interest in non-conventional weapons, Usama Bin Laden posed the most severe threat.[59]

113. Addressing the terrorist threat from unconventional weapons in January 2001, the JIC stated:

> "The actual threat does not match the media hype. Almost all the available intelligence refers to terrorist interest in CB materials, rather than to specific attack plans. There is no credible intelligence that any terrorist except UBL has the capability or serious intent to explore the use of weapons-grade materials – nor, except for Chechen extremists, radiological material. Terrorists interested in CB are generally those least constrained by public opinion … [T]he risks of attacks using toxic materials have always been greater overseas.
> "UBL has sought CBRN materials for use as terrorist weapons … From his public statements and interviews it is clear that he believes it is legitimate to use them as weapons …

> "In 1999 he sought equipment for a chemical weapons lab in Afghanistan, and claimed already to have … experts working there."[60]

114. In 2001, Iran, North Korea and Libya were "probably of greater concern than Iraq" in terms of nuclear and missile proliferation.

115. By early 2000, intelligence had revealed that AQ Khan, who directed Pakistan's nuclear programme, was discussing the sale of nuclear technology to countries of concern, and that he was at the centre of an international proliferation network.[61]

116. Sir William Ehrman, FCO Director International Security from 2000 to October 2002, told the Inquiry that, at the beginning of the century, the nuclear programmes of concern in Libya, Iran and North Korea were "maturing".[62]

117. Sir William confirmed that, in terms of nuclear and missile proliferation, Iran, North Korea and Libya were "probably of greater concern than Iraq".[63]

118. Mr Dowse told the Inquiry that:

> "… by 2001 … various international regimes had clearly delayed and obstructed proliferation, but we were extremely concerned that in some specific cases determined proliferators were making progress. We were concerned about Iran … Libya … Iraq … North Korea … and we had also begun to get information about the activities of AQ Khan in Pakistan who was offering nuclear assistance for weapons programmes covertly to a number of countries, notably Libya.
> "So we had a sense that … the international non-proliferation regimes were important but not sufficient …"[64]

119. Mr Dowse added that there was particular concern about nuclear weapons and concerns about the impact of biological weapons. But it was "often quite difficult to see" how the latter "would be easily usable in an inter-state conflict".

120. Lord Wilson of Dinton, the Cabinet Secretary from January 1998 to September 2002, described AQ Khan's activities as:

> "One of the most chilling developments in my time … truly chilling and hugely worrying."[65]

121. Following the 9/11 attacks, the JIC assessed on 18 September that they had set a new benchmark for terrorist atrocity, and that terrorists seeking comparable impact might seek to use chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear devices. But only Islamic extremists such as those who shared Usama Bin Laden's agenda had the motivation to pursue attacks with the deliberate aim of causing maximum casualties.

122. The potential threat to UK interests would be higher the more closely the UK was identified with the US.

123. Following a request from Mr Blair for a reassessment of the nature and scale of the threat posed to the UK by terrorism and the contingency plans for dealing with it, the JIC considered whether the scale and nature of the terrorist threat to the UK had changed.[66]

124. The key points made in discussion included:

- The attacks "marked a step change" and: "What had before been only an assessed possibility had now become a fact. A new benchmark had been set, and there could be no going back to the status quo ante."
- "Even if the component parts of those attacks had not been wholly new, their sheer audacity, scale, co-ordination and ambition were novel."
- "The terrorists with creativity and imagination would look for other ways to make as much impact. The draft [Assessment] needed to say more about the threat from chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear terrorism, which it underplayed."
- "The paper needed to include some blue-sky thinking about what the future might hold, but to maintain a sense of proportion."

125. Mr Scarlett concluded that "the draft needed reworking, in terms of both of its structure and framework, and of its detail". A revised version would be circulated for further comment.

126. The Assessment, issued on 18 September, considered whether the attacks of 11 September changed the nature and scale of the terrorist threat to the UK, and the UK's potential vulnerability to major terrorist attack, and "the current and immediately foreseeable threat in terms of the intention and capability of known terrorist groups".[67] The Assessment assumed that there would be "a continuation of the current political circumstances in which the UK is closely identified with the US".

[66] Minutes, 14 September 2001, JIC meeting. As a Director in the Treasury Public Services Directorate responsible for the Defence, Diplomacy and Intelligence Team, Ms Margaret Aldred, the Secretary to the Inquiry, was present at the discussion.
[67] JIC Assessment, 18 September 2001, 'UK Vulnerability to Major Terrorist Attack'.

127. The JIC's Key Judgements included:

- The attacks had "set a new benchmark for terrorist atrocity. The level of destruction and the public impact are unprecedented."
- "Terrorists seeking comparable impact may try to use chemical, biological radiological or nuclear devices …"
- The "potential scope for terrorist attacks" was "very wide": "But in order to assess the threat to the UK, we need to consider both the capabilities and the intentions of the terrorist groups."
- "Only Islamic extremists such as those who shared Usama Bin Laden's agenda currently have the motivation to pursue" attacks "with the deliberate aim of causing maximum casualties". The more closely the UK was identified with the US, "the higher the potential threat" to UK interests "both here and overseas".
- Major attacks like those of 9/11 required considerable planning and were "therefore likely to remain relatively infrequent".

128. Addressing the nature of international terrorist groups, the JIC stated:

> "The word 'groups' can be misleading in the context of Islamic extremist terrorists. There are established groups in different countries, usually working to a national agenda, but the networks associated with UBL are changeable ad hoc groupings of individuals who share his agenda, and who may come together only for a particular operation."

129. The Assessment stated that it was "not yet clear" whether the success of the 9/11 attacks would:

> "… alter how international terrorist groups view the context in which they operate. But it has certainly changed the psychological landscape. What had seemed a remote possibility has become a fact … Copycat attacks could follow. Some terrorists might feel driven to match or exceed the scale of casualties in order to achieve a comparable impact. Or they might seek the same sort of shock, for example by using chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear devices. On the other hand, the sheer horror of the destruction could lead to a backlash against wanton attacks by those who have previously supported terrorists. And if the US successfully mobilises a new coalition of allies to end … UBL's career, some groups, and especially supportive states, might be deterred. But it will be some time before intelligence is able to build up a picture of the actual effect of the 11 September attacks …"

130. Conventional munitions or Improvised Explosive Devices (IEDs), "now including hijacked aircraft", were "the most likely form of attack". But there was a need to take into account the "following potential threats":

- Chemical warfare agents: UBL's group was "assessed to have acquired a limited and unsophisticated chemical capability" and had been "reported at one stage to have seen potential use in assassinations and other attacks in small, confined spaces. But given time they might develop such ideas into plans to cause large numbers of casualties."
- Some biological warfare agents: Intelligence had indicated that "UBL and other Islamic extremists" had "shown an interest in BW agents and their effects".
- Radiological dispersal devices: There was "a considerable body of intelligence relating to trafficking in illicit nuclear materials, and intelligence that UBL possesses a small quantity of uranium. The use of uranium in a radiological dispersal device is extremely ineffective, and does not present anything other than the most minor of radiological hazards."
- Improvised nuclear device: This would be "harder to design and build than a radiological dispersal device. […] Such a device would be large, fragile and probably unreliable. It would need to be delivered by a vehicle or boat, or assembled in situ. […] Acquiring the fissile material (plutonium or highly enriched uranium) would be the major obstacle. No terrorists have the ability to make fissile materials, and we have no evidence that any have acquired enough for a weapon. A terrorist with explosives expertise could detonate a nuclear weapon acquired from a nuclear-armed state, although it is unlikely to give its intended yield, if any." There was "no credible intelligence to suggest that UBL or any other terrorist had acquired a nuclear device from the former Soviet Union".

131. The Assessment stated that the forms of possible attack from those threats were:

> "… not new in themselves. We assessed in 1990 that Iraq could use chemical and biological agents in covert attacks on western countries as well as in conflict. But the 11 September attacks highlight the risk that extremist groups might turn to these means of attack in order to maximise death and disruption. Unlike states – in most circumstances – such terrorists cannot be deterred by the prospect of retaliation.
> "Terrorists have already shown they can cause mass casualties by conventional means … The difficulties in making or using chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear weapons (CBRN), though by no means insurmountable, may make those options less attractive to them. But CW and especially BW agents have the potential to produce casualties in excess of those seen in New York. Hence any use, or threat of use … would generate a degree of terror and panic out of proportion to the low probability of a successful major attack."

132. Addressing who might have the capability and intent to threaten the UK, the Assessment stated that Islamist extremists had the "motivation to attack the West" and their means of operation made them "particularly difficult to identify and disrupt". The US was "their main target". Most Islamic extremists had not targeted the UK "to date", but "the UK, France, Israel and 'the West' generally" were a "second rank in their list of priorities".

133. The JIC judged that Hizballah, Hamas and Palestinian groups did not "currently intend to target UK interests". That "could change if the situation in the Middle East deteriorates further", but only Hizballah's External Security Organisation had capability to "carry out significant attacks".

134. Addressing the potential threat from Usama Bin Laden, the Assessment stated:

> "In the context of UBL's jihad, casualties and destruction could be an end in themselves as much as a means to an end.[68] He has no interest in negotiation and there is no indication that he can be deterred. Further major attacks by those who share his agenda cannot be ruled out, and may be more likely if UBL himself is killed and/or the US retaliates against Afghanistan. While his focus remains on the US and the Gulf, he has the capability to mount operations against the UK."

135. The Assessment concluded:

> "Further attacks in the near future are possible … Nor should we conclude from the volume of intelligence on Islamic extremists' aspirations that we necessarily face an escalating spiral of increasingly frequent attacks. Many will be disrupted … Major attacks on anything like the scale seen in New York are likely to remain relatively infrequent. But the capacity to undertake them demonstrably exists."

136. After 9/11, concerns in the UK about the risks of nuclear, biological, chemical and ballistic missile proliferation intensified.

137. In a speech addressing the Assembly on Terrorism on 1 October, Mr Kofi Annan, the UN Secretary-General, stated that, after the attacks of 9/11, "no one can dispute the nature of the terrorist threat, nor the need to meet it with a global response".[69] He added that that would require:

> "… Member States to live up to their responsibilities under international law. They must deal firmly with the reality of armed groups and other non-State actors who refuse to respect common principles of human dignity.
> "It is hard to imagine how the tragedy of 11 September could have been worse. Yet, the truth is that a single attack involving a nuclear or biological weapon could have killed millions … The greatest danger arises from a non-State group – or even an individual – acquiring and using a nuclear, biological, or chemical weapon. Such a weapon could be delivered without the need for any missile or any other sophisticated delivery system."

[68] "UBL's stated objective is to secure US withdrawal from the Middle East or, failing that, to provoke a reaction which would further demonise the US in the eyes of Muslims and destabilise moderate Arab states that he perceives as un-Islamic."
[69] UN Press Release, 1 October 2001, Secretary-General, Addressing Assembly on Terrorism, Calls for 'Immediate Far-Reaching Changes' in UN Response to Terror.

138. Sir John Scarlett told the Inquiry that there had been "serious concern" in the autumn of 2001 about the availability of fissile material "especially from the former Soviet Union", but he and Mr Miller both confirmed that there was no specific intelligence about potential supply to Iraq.[70]

139. Sir David Manning, Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser and Head of the Cabinet Office Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec) from 2001 to August 2003, told the Inquiry that his American interlocutors were "very concerned about what was going on in North Korea".[71]

140. Sir David also told the Inquiry that finds in Afghanistan had refocused attention on WMD and proliferation. There was pressure to deal with the Libyan programme and concerns about Iran and AQ Khan (in Pakistan).[72]

141. The Butler Review described how, in early 2002:

> "For the small group of policy-makers with access to the most sensitive JIC Assessments, there were increasing concerns about proliferation … It [the JIC] was also reporting on the evidence found, as a result of military operations in Afghanistan, of Usama Bin Laden's efforts to seek unconventional weapons. Finally senior policy-makers were also pre-occupied with the crisis between India and Pakistan and the nuclear risks which that posed."[73]

142. The Butler Review concluded that those elements "would have contributed to a strong sense of what one witness called a 'creeping tide' of proliferation and growth in the nuclear, biological, chemical and ballistic missile capabilities of countries of concern".[74]

Assessment of Iraq's WMD capability after 9/11

November to December 2001

143. FCO advice to Mr Straw and No.10 on Iraq's nuclear, chemical and biological warfare programmes in early December was, in some instances, couched in more definitive terms than the language used by the JIC and omitted the JIC caveats.

144. Mr Dowse told the Inquiry that, shortly after 9/11, Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary, asked about Iraq's ability to use WMD if it was attacked and that the assessment provided by the FCO drew on the existing JIC papers.[75]

145. Mr Straw was sent copies of the December 2000 and May 2001 JIC Assessments in mid-November.[76] He was told that the Key Judgements were "unchanged" and the JIC would be reviewing its judgements and the "threat of onward proliferation of WMD expertise and technology from Iraq to terrorist groups" later that month.

146. The FCO informed Mr Straw that the main conclusions to be drawn included:

- Iraq "probably" had the capability to strike Israel and other countries "with missiles tipped with chemical and biological warheads".
- It was "highly unlikely" that Iraq possessed a nuclear weapon, but it had "the motive and technology to develop a radiological device".
- UN sanctions had "prevented the reconstruction of Saddam's conventional military machine".

147. The FCO advice also stated:

- Recent intelligence indicated that research and development on nuclear weapons continued and that Iraq was seeking equipment for a uranium enrichment programme.
- Iraq's CBW capabilities were the "greatest concern".
- It was judged that Iraq "was able to conceal large quantities of chemical and biological stocks".

148. The FCO also provided a copy of the "current press lines", including:

- The UK believed the "Baghdad regime" was "still hiding weapons of mass destruction in a range of locations".
- The "Baghdad regime" had "continued to pursue ballistic missile, nuclear, chemical and biological programmes in breach of its UN obligations".
- Iraq had "admitted hiding chemical, biological weapons and missile parts in the desert … caves and railway tunnels".
- The UK believed Iraq still had "chemical and biological agents and the means to deliver them in a range of locations".
- Iraq had admitted producing chemical and biological warfare agents, the effects of which were "horrendous".
- The UK believed the "Baghdad regime" had "recently accelerated its weapons programmes".

---

[76] Minute FCO [junior official] to Dowse and PS [FCO], 13 November 2001, 'Iraqi Capacity to Hit Back'. This mistakenly refers to an assessment in "November" 2000.

149. In support of the last statement the FCO identified:

- continued progress of Iraq's ballistic missile programme and repair of facilities damaged by Operation Desert Fox, and a belief that Iraq was planning to extend the range of its permitted missiles;
- concern about reports of increased nuclear procurement, a view that research and development on a nuclear programme had restarted, and a belief that if sanctions were lifted Iraq could develop a nuclear weapon within five years; and
- a belief that Iraq's biological and chemical weapons programmes were continuing.

150. The JIC Assessment of 28 November judged that:

- Practical co-operation between Iraq and Al Qaida was "unlikely"; and there was no "credible evidence of covert transfers of WMD-related technology and expertise to terrorist groups".
- Iraq was "capable of constructing devices to disperse chemical or biological agent, or radiological material", but there was "no reliable intelligence of any Iraqi intent". If the regime was under serious and imminent threat of collapse, WMD terrorism was possible but, in other circumstances, the threat would be "slight".

151. At the request of the FCO, the JIC assessed Iraq's support for terrorism on 28 November.[77] The Assessment is addressed in Section 3.1.

152. In relation to Iraq's capabilities and the possibility of proliferation to terrorist groups, the JIC Key Judgements stated that Saddam Hussein "would consider":

> "WMD terrorism, if his regime was under serious and imminent threat of collapse. In other circumstances the threat of WMD terrorism is slight, because of the risk of US retaliation."

153. The Assessment concluded that "Iraqi capability and willingness to conduct WMD terrorism" was "not known with any certainty". The JIC judged that Iraq was "capable of constructing devices to disperse chemical or biological agent, or radiological material", but it had "no reliable intelligence of any Iraqi intent. Nor did it have:

> "… any credible evidence of covert transfers of WMD-related technology and expertise to terrorist groups, or of any Iraqi role in the anthrax attacks in the US. Iraq would have to consider the risk of US retaliation … On balance, we judge the threat of Iraqi WMD terrorism is slight, unless the regime was under serious and imminent threat of collapse."

[77] JIC Assessment, 28 November 2001, 'Iraq after September 11 – The Terrorist Threat'.

154. Mr Miller sent "a short note on Iraq's WMD and ballistic missile capability", which drew "heavily" on the JIC Assessment of 10 May, to JIC members on 30 November 2001.[78]

155. Mr Miller described the main points as:

- Iraq "probably has a capability to target a limited number of ballistic missiles against other countries in the Middle East and Gulf regions, particularly Israel".
- It was "possible that such missiles could be armed with chemical or biological warheads, although other conventional options for these weapons, such as aircraft or artillery, are available".
- While Iraq was "judged unlikely to be able to acquire any nuclear capability in the short term", the "construction of a radiological dispersal device" was "technically possible".

156. The UK Government has been unable to find a copy of the note Mr Miller provided.[79]

157. The FCO perspective on Iraq's WMD capabilities and intentions was set out in a letter from Mr Simon McDonald, Mr Straw's Principal Private Secretary, to No.10 on 3 December in response to a request from Mr Blair for a note on options for dealing with Iraq (see Section 3.1).[80]

158. The letter stated:

> "There is real reason for concern about Iraq's WMD programmes, principally CBW and long range missiles. There is evidence of continuing Iraqi attempts to procure nuclear-related materiel. Saddam's history of aggression and use of CW sets Iraq apart from other WMD-armed states."

159. In an Annex addressing Iraq's response to its obligations, the FCO stated that Iraq was:

> "(a) concealing information about large quantities of chemical and biological munitions, agents and precursors. UNSCOM inspectors were unable to account for [material related to chemical weapons] and very large quantities of growth media acquired, on Iraq's own admission, for the production of biological weapons;
> (b) concealing up to 20 long-range Al Hussein missiles;
> (c) actively pursuing chemical and biological weapons and ballistic missiles. The missile-related facilities damaged by Operation Desert Fox in 1998 have been repaired, research continues and new facilities are being constructed. Other former

160. On 4 December, Mr Blair sent President Bush a paper setting out proposals for Phase 2 of the war against terrorism.

161. Mr Blair stated that Iraq was a threat because it had a WMD capability; was acquiring more; had shown its willingness to use it; could export that capability; and was in breach of UN Security Council resolutions.

162. Mr Blair sent President Bush a paper 'The War against Terrorism: The Second Phase*'* on 4 December (see Section 3.1).[81]

163. The paper comprised an overview of the possible approaches to potential terrorist threats in seven countries[82] and a 'Strategy for Confronting Islamic Extremism' in moderate Muslim states.

164. In relation to Iraq, the key points included:

- Iraq was a threat because: "it has WMD capability; is acquiring more; has shown its willingness to use it; and can export that capability". Iraq was in breach of UN Security Council resolutions 687 (1991), 715 (1991) and 1284 (1999) and Saddam Hussein supported certain Palestinian terrorist groups and used terror tactics against Iraqi dissidents.

The decision to produce a dossier covering Iraq, Iran, North Korea and Libya

165. To inform preparations for the meeting between Mr Blair and President Bush in early April 2002, No.10 commissioned a number of papers in February 2002.

166. That included a paper for public consumption setting out the facts on WMD in relation to the key capabilities of countries of concern.

167. In his annual State of the Union Address on 29 January 2002 President Bush described the regimes in North Korea and Iran as "sponsors of terrorism". In relation to Iraq's WMD he stated that Iraq had continued to:

"… flaunt its hostility towards America and to support terror … The Iraqi regime has plotted to develop anthrax, and nerve gas, and nuclear weapons for over a decade.

> "States like these, and their terrorist allies, constitute an axis of evil, arming to threaten the peace of the world. By seeking weapons of mass destruction these regimes pose a grave and growing danger."[83]

168. President Bush's speech prompted a major public debate on both sides of the Atlantic about policy towards Iraq.

169. There were increasing indications that key figures in the US Administration were considering military action to achieve regime change in Iraq and an emphasis on the potential nexus for the fusion of WMD proliferation and terrorism.

170. On 13 February, Sir Christopher Meyer, British Ambassador to the US, advised that the hawks in Washington felt that they had won the argument about the need for military action; and that the US might want to issue an ultimatum on inspections but set the bar so high that Iraq would never comply.[84] The US could want UK endorsement for their vision by mid-March.

171. Mr William Ehrman, FCO Director International Security, reported that a meeting with Sir David Manning "and some others" had discussed Sir Christopher Meyer's telegram "and the question of legal considerations related to military action against WMD proliferation".[85] Mr Ehrman said he had outlined the legal difficulty in trying to argue that WMD development posed an "imminent threat".

172. President Bush's speech, Sir Christopher's telegram and Mr Ehrman's report of the discussion, and the development of UK thinking, are covered in more detail in Section 3.2.

173. Mr Tom McKane, Deputy Head of OD Sec from 1999 to 2002, told the Inquiry that a meeting in No.10 on 19 February (see Section 3.2) had commissioned "a large number of papers … for the meeting between President Bush and Mr Blair at Crawford, Texas, in early April 2002".[86]

174. The request was recorded in Mr McKane's minute of 19 February.[87] The papers included:

- "Iraq A paper analysing the options, the state of play on the UN resolutions, the legal base and the internal dimension – the state of the opposition groups etc."
- "WMD A paper for public consumption setting out the facts on WMD …"

175. Mr Miller commented that the paper on WMD was "intended to be more about capabilities than proliferation".[88]

176. Ms Jane Hamilton-Eddy, one of the Deputy Heads of the Assessments Staff, wrote to the members of the JIC Current Intelligence Group (CIG) on proliferation on 22 February, with a first draft of the WMD paper which concentrated on Iran, Iraq, North Korea and Libya.[89] The draft drew heavily on US published sources.

177. Ms Hamilton-Eddy wrote that the aim was to include "relevant UK intelligence which helps to underpin our assessment". Recipients, "particularly in the agencies", were asked to "determine what additional material might be available".

178. An article appeared in The Observer on 24 February reporting that the Government was planning to publish detailed evidence of Iraq's nuclear capabilities.[90]

179. A "senior No.10 official" was reported to have said that the meeting between Mr Blair and President Bush in April would "finalise Phase Two of the war against terrorism", and "Action against Iraq" would be "at the top of the agenda". As with Usama Bin Laden and the war in Afghanistan, it would be necessary to maintain public and international support for military action against Saddam Hussein. That was a "public persuasion" issue which would be tackled in the same way as the unprecedented "indictment" against Usama Bin Laden published by No.10 in October 2001 (see Section 3.1).

180. The Observer article also suggested that the document would "reveal that Iraq was attempting to amass rudimentary nuclear capabilities" and was "also investigating a way to launch 'dirty' nuclear bombs – unsophisticated devices which would nevertheless wreak havoc if used".

JIC Assessment, 27 February 2002: 'Iraq: Saddam Under the Spotlight'

181. A JIC Assessment issued on 27 February 2002 stated that Iraq continued to pursue its WMD programmes: design work for missiles with ranges greater than the UN limit of 150km was under way and it could produce chemical warfare agents "within weeks" of a decision to do so.

182. The JIC also introduced a new judgement that if it had not already done so, Iraq could produce significant quantities of biological warfare agent within days.

183. The JIC commissioned an Assessment of "Saddam's threat perceptions and internal position: whether he is secure, what opposition he faces and what he is doing to try and avoid the internal and international threats he faces".[91]

184. In its discussion of the draft, the JIC decided that the final Assessment:

> "… needed to say a bit more about Iraq's aspirations and potential in terms of Weapons of Mass Destruction, not least because this was, and would remain, an important area for policy discussions with the US. The Pentagon's views on how soon Iraq might develop a nuclear capability did not quite match the UK's, and it would be useful for Ministers to know the JIC's mind."[92]

185. The Assessment, issued on 27 February, is addressed in detail in Section 3.2.

186. In relation to Iraq's WMD, a Key Judgement stated that Iraq continued:

> "… to pursue its WMD programmes. Design work for missiles with ranges greater than the UN limit of 150km was under way. If it has not already done so, Iraq could produce significant quantities of biological warfare agent within days and chemical warfare agents within weeks of a decision to do so."[93]

187. In relation to Iraq's WMD capabilities, the Assessment stated:

> "… Iraq continues to pursue the development of weapons of mass destruction.
>
> "Though we lack precise data, Iraq has probably reconstituted many of the elements struck during Operation Desert Fox in December 1998.
>
> "Iraq's ballistic missile programme has extensively tested missiles under the 150km UN limit and intelligence indicates that design work for systems with ranges over 1,000km is under way.
> "Iraq is assessed to have hidden 10-20 Al Hussein missiles (range 650km) capable of hitting Israel.
> "Iraq also continues with its chemical and biological warfare (CBW) programmes and, if it has not already done so, could produce significant quantities of BW agent within days and CW agents within weeks of a decision to do so. These can be delivered by a variety of means. Methods of ensuring survivability of CBW production facilities from attack are a high priority.

"Before the [1991] Gulf War intervened, Iraqi plans were well advanced and we judge they were only three years away from possessing a nuclear weapon.

"Were sanctions lifted now, we judge it would take Iraq at least five years to produce a nuclear weapon and a further two to produce a warhead.

"The acquisition of fissile material or significant technical assistance from abroad could significantly shorten this timescale.

"Iraq still has some low grade radioactive material which it could utilise in a radiological dispersal device, but there is no recent intelligence indicating that Iraq is pursuing such a course."

188. The JIC judged:

"… even if inspectors were allowed to return, Iraq would embark on a renewed policy of frustration, involving denial, deception, obstruction and delay. Iraq would be able to conceal from inspectors much of its CBW work and research on longer range missiles, though probably not its missile production facilities."

189. The JIC concluded:

"… if Saddam believed he was unable to deter a US attack to oust his regime, we judge he would go down fighting and could adopt high risk options, such as … using weapons of mass destruction against US forces or Israel."

190. The shortening of the timescale that Iraq would require to produce significant quantities of BW agent from "weeks" in the JIC Assessment of May 2001 to "days" was significant.

191. The Butler Report stated that continuing reports on Iraqi mobile biological agent production facilities, which were received from a liaison service, had had a significant impact on the Assessment.[94] The Butler Review had been told that was "based on a more thorough understanding of the capabilities of the mobile production facilities, and on [the] refurbishment of an Iraqi facility" which had been involved in research and biological agent production before the Gulf Conflict.

192. Other evidence on this point, in the context of the Assessment of 15 March, is addressed later in this Section.

193. Mr Simon Webb, MOD Policy Director, advised Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, that Saddam Hussein was "the strategic centre of gravity" of Iraq's WMD programmes.

---

[94] Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction ["The Butler Report"], 14 July 2004, HC 898, paragraphs 244-245.

194. Mr Webb also advised that Iraq's nuclear programme could move forward more quickly if it obtained fissile material from abroad.

195. Mr Webb, offered advice on the UK approach in response to President Bush's "axis of evil"' speech to Mr Hoon on 27 February (see Section 6.1).[95]

196. Mr Webb recommended that the UK should:

- acknowledge that the three countries identified by President Bush posed increasing risks to international stability; and
- persuade the US to explain why, releasing intelligence in a "road show".

197. Mr Webb also proposed adding Libya to the list of countries of concern.

198. Mr Webb sent Mr Hoon summaries of material on WMD programmes which might be released to European allies and informed him that the JIC was "working further on a public version".

199. In relation to Iraq, Mr Webb wrote:

> "Iraq came close to developing nuclear weapons before the Gulf War, with medium range missiles. The containment policy since then halted her nuclear progress, eg by UN inspection regimes and bombing in 1998. But Saddam has kept trying: we do not currently assess him as having succeeded but the high level of technical capacity that Iraq has sustained means that they could move forward quickly, especially if Saddam could lay his hands on fissile material."

200. Mr Webb added that some of the programmes could be explained:

> "… in regional terms: Iran and Iraq in particular respond to each other's fears. But once the capability exists, it will pose risks not just to each other but to the wider region."

201. Mr Webb also identified the potential risks to deployed forces and UK bases such as Cyprus, as well as the more general interest in stemming the tide of proliferation by using non-military and military options.

202. In the context of using international diplomatic pressure to control the proliferation of WMD, Mr Webb described Saddam Hussein as "the strategic centre of gravity of Iraqi WMD programmes". He added that "unless we tackle some of those cheating on their treaty obligations, the rest of the WMD regime will crumble".

203. The information sent to Mr Hoon about Iraq's ballistic missile and biological warfare programmes reflected the JIC Assessments.

---

[95] Letter Webb to PS/Secretary of State [MOD], 27 February 2002, 'Axis of Evil'.

204. On Iraq's nuclear weapon programmes, Mr Hoon was told:

- Until 1991 Iraq had a massive nuclear weapon project. If the Gulf War had not intervened, it might have produced a crude nuclear device by late 1993.
- It is assessed that Iraq has no capability to manufacture weapons-usable fissile material. However, some dual-use material may still be in the inventory.
- With the departure of the IAEA … in December 1998, Iraq could have recommenced nuclear weapons activity as it retains skilled scientists and weapons design information.
- If sanctions were lifted or became ineffective Iraq could possibly develop its first nuclear weapon – a crude weapon for air-delivery – in 5-7 years; and a further 2-3 years to produce a warhead for missile delivery. These timelines could be shortened if it has procured fissile material from abroad."

205. On Iraq's chemical weapons programme, Mr Hoon was told:

- "We assess that Iraq probably retains a stockpile, which could easily amount to more than 100 tonnes of agent."
- "Iraq has the capability to start the production of significant amounts of mustard agent immediately, and the production of nerve agent within weeks of a decision to do so."

206. In a letter of 27 February, Mr Ehrman questioned what was meant by the description of Saddam Hussein as the centre of gravity of Iraq's WMD programmes, asking whether it was "too sanguine to suggest, if that is the intention, that his removal would necessarily bring them to an end".[96]

207. Mr Ehrman expressed surprise at Mr Webb's assertion that "the bombing in 1998 helped to halt Iraqi progress in developing nuclear weapons", commenting that the FCO understanding was that that was "not among the claims we made at the time".

208. The evidence in Section 1.1 on the dismantling of Iraq's nuclear programme and the objectives of Operation Desert Fox supports Mr Ehrman's point.

209. The UK's understanding of the impact of Desert Fox is set out in the Box below.

Impact of Operation Desert Fox

The JIC assessed in May 2001 that Operation Desert Fox had:

- set back parts of the ballistic missile programme by up to a year;
- not attacked CW facilities;
- damaged the castor oil plant, but there was no known impact on BW capability;

[96] Letter Ehrman to Webb, 27 February 2002, 'Axis of Evil'.

- damaged the aircraft shelters associated with the L-29 trainer, but no aircraft had been destroyed; and
- disrupted security organisations involved in Iraq's WMD, but those connected with concealment were unlikely to have been damaged.[97]

The CIG Assessment of 15 March 2002 stated that a "few high profile sites" associated with Iraq's ballistic missile programme had been targeted in the operation.[98]

The DIS advised in April 2002 that the "direct impact" of Operation Desert Fox on Iraq's CBW capabilities was "very limited, being confined to an attack on a single facility with BW potential, with no attacks at all on CW-related facilities".[99]

The DIS understood:

- "Desert Fox was not intended to eliminate Iraq's ability to regenerate its biological, chemical or nuclear weapons programmes and had minimal effect on this ability."
- Even if the BW facility had been destroyed, "this would not greatly affect Iraq's capability to regenerate its BW programme".
- The Ministry of Industry and Military Industrialisation building, which was presumed among other things to have been "the administrative centre for Iraq's WMD programmes", had "sustained moderate damage".
- The value of the operation "from a WMD perspective" had been the damage to "Iraq's means of delivery". The DIS's internal assessment was that the "ballistic missile programme had been set back by a year, and that damage to some facilities could take up to another year to repair".

Mr Webb told the Inquiry that, after Operation Desert Fox, it had been concluded it was "not effective" and the MOD was "not able to offer any assurance that you would have been able to deal with the WMD problem solely by air power".[100]

Subsequently Mr Webb stated that the operation had "a very useful effect on reducing the capacity of the Iraqi integrated air defence system" which was "posing a threat" to aircraft enforcing the No-Fly Zones.[101]

210. The Assessments Staff produced a revised draft of the dossier on 28 February.

211. Ms Hamilton-Eddy circulated a revised draft paper, 'WMD Programmes of Concern', on 28 February. She wrote that it:

> "… seems to be coming along well. But there are a few areas where … statements need to be backed up with evidence. Iraq continues to look a bit thin."[102]

212. The draft stated that it was "difficult to assess how close" Iraq was to "restoring its WMD capability, since the withdrawal of UN inspectors". The sanctions regime had "hindered" reconstitution efforts, "although we believe these continue unabated".[103]

213. The draft set out descriptions of Iraq's ballistic missile, nuclear and CBW capabilities which provided the basis for subsequent drafts.

214. The version sent to No.10 on 6 March is described later in this Section.

215. On behalf of Mr Webb, Mr Paul Schulte, MOD Director, Proliferation and Arms Control Secretariat, set out a number of concerns about the approach adopted, including that:

- the countries discussed in the paper were too narrow;
- there was a risk it would undermine the principle of not commenting on intelligence; and
- it would lead to questions about the action being taken and criticism of inaction.[104]

216. Mr Webb suggested that the paper should address "only nuclear and missile issues in detail" and limit the "concerns over CBW to a more general statement" given that "In many cases, the arguments … are somewhat thin and unconvincing".

217. The DIS provided detailed comments from the MOD on the draft paper.[105]

218. Most of the comments offered by the DIS on Iraq were incorporated in the draft paper sent to No.10 on 6 March.

219. A DIS document produced on 5 March stated that there was no definitive intelligence on Iraq's concepts for the use of WMD.

220. At the request of Air Marshal Joe French, Chief of Defence Intelligence, the DIS produced a paper on 5 March examining "US military" options for removing Saddam Hussein over the next 12 months.[106]

221. The paper is addressed in Section 6.1.

222. Addressing the possibility of Iraq using WMD, the DIS wrote that it had "no definitive intelligence" on Iraq's concepts for the use of WMD:

> "Iraq did not employ WMD against coalition forces … [in 1991], nor against the subsequent internal uprisings. We judge that Saddam wished to avoid regime-threatening retaliation from the coalition. Hence the use of WMD will be linked to perception of regime survivability. Were the regime in danger of imminent collapse, Saddam might consider use of WMD against internal opposition, US forces or Israel."

223. The paper was sent to Mr Hoon, the Chiefs of Staff, Sir Kevin Tebbit, MOD Permanent Under Secretary (PUS), Mr Webb, Lieutenant General Sir Anthony Pigott, Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff (Commitments), and a small number of other individuals. It was also sent to Mr Scarlett and the Assessments Staff, Mr Tom Dodd, OD Sec, Ms Amanda Tanfield, Head of the Iraq Section in the FCO Middle East Department, and SIS.

224. The paper was subsequently included in the pack of reading material on Iraq for Mr Blair, which was sent to No.10 by Mr Scarlett on 1 August (see Section 3.4).

Public statements by Mr Blair and Mr Straw

225. From late February 2002, Mr Blair and Mr Straw began publicly to argue that Iraq was a threat which had to be dealt with.

226. In a memorandum to the Foreign Affairs Committee (FAC) in June 2003, the FCO stated:

"In the early months of 2002, British Government statements underlined the singular threat posed by Iraq's behaviour."[107]

227. Before the Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting in Australia, Mr Blair gave an interview to the Australian Broadcasting Corporation on 28 February in which he stated that he agreed with President Bush "very strongly that weapons of mass destruction represent a real threat to world stability"; and that: "Those who are engaged in spreading weapons of mass destruction are engaged in an evil trade and it is important that we make sure that we have taken action in respect of it."[108]

228. Mr Blair also stated that: "The accumulation of weapons of mass destruction by Iraq poses a threat, not just to the region but to the wider world." President Bush was "absolutely right to raise it".

229. On 3 March, Mr Blair was reported to have told Channel Nine in Australia that:

"We know they [Iraq] are trying to accumulate … weapons of mass destruction, we know he's prepared to use them. So this is a real issue but how we deal with it, that's a matter we must discuss."[109]

[109] BBC News, 3 March 2002, Blair gives Iraq new warning.

230. Mr Blair was also reported to have argued that the lessons of 9/11 meant that such threats must be tackled; and that "if we don't act we will find out too late the potential for destruction".

231. In an article published on 5 March, Mr Straw stated that if Saddam Hussein refused to co-operate with weapons inspection, he would have to live with the consequences.

232. Mr Straw provided an article, published in The Times on 5 March, stating that:

> "The stalemate between the United Nations and Iraq cannot go on for ever. For more than a decade, Britain and the United States have led the UN's efforts to protect Iraq's neighbours from aggression and protect the world from Iraq's weapons of mass destruction.
>
> "Iraq persistently flouts the authority of the UN Security Council and international law …
>
> "The threat from Iraq is not receding. Unique among the world tyrants, Saddam has both the ruthlessness and capability to employ weapons of mass destruction."[110]

233. In relation to WMD the article stated that, since 1991:

- "… evidence has been building up that the threat from Iraq's weapons programmes is growing once more".
- "Many of the facilities damaged in 1998 … in Operation Desert Fox had been repaired."
- Iraq had "persisted with its chemical and biological weapons programmes" and was "developing ballistic missiles capable of delivering such weapons to targets beyond the 150km limit imposed by the UN".
- There was "evidence of increased efforts to procure nuclear-related material and technology, and that nuclear research and development work [has] begun again".
- Without the controls which had been imposed, "Saddam would have had a nuclear bomb by now".
- Saddam Hussein had "both the ruthlessness and capability to employ weapons of mass destruction".
- The regime had "admitted hiding" WMD.
- Iraq had admitted manufacturing chemical weapons and biological agents: "The destructive potential of these weapons beggars the imagination."

---

[110] The Times, 5 March 2002, Saddam must allow weapons inspectors into Iraq or suffer the consequences.

- The UN weapons inspectors, who had been "denied access to Iraq" could not "account for large quantities of materials used to make these deadly substances".
- "The international community's most pressing demand" was that Iraq should allow UN officials to inspect its weapons programmes.

234. The article concluded:

> "We cannot allow Saddam to hold a gun to the heads of his own people, his neighbours and the world for ever. Intense diplomatic efforts will continue, and I hope they will achieve our aim of removing the threat which Iraq's weapons of mass destruction pose to humanity. But if he refuses to open his weapons programmes to proper international inspection, he will have to live with the consequences.
> "No decisions have been taken, but let no one – especially Saddam – doubt our resolve."

235. In his reply to a debate in Westminster Hall on 6 March, Mr Ben Bradshaw, the Parliamentary Under Secretary for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, stated that the main concern was Iraq's "determination to build weapons of mass destruction and the threat it poses, not just to its neighbours, but to the rest of the world".[111]

236. A briefing paper prepared at Mr Straw's request was sent to members of the Parliamentary Labour Party and to the members of Cabinet. That described Iraq as a threat to the international community and its WMD programmes as "massive".

237. The paper stated that if Iraq's programmes remained unchecked, Iraq could develop a crude nuclear device in about five years.

238. A briefing paper on Iraq, prepared at Mr Straw's request by his Special Adviser, Dr Michael Williams, was issued to the Parliamentary Labour Party (PLP).[112]

239. The paper provided more detail on the arguments for addressing the Iraqi regime as "a demonstrable threat to the stability of the region" which Mr Straw had set out in his article in The Times, including the key elements of the strategy of containment, Iraq's failure to comply with most of the 27 obligations imposed in UN resolutions and criticism of Iraq's "notorious" human rights record.[113]

240. In relation to WMD, the paper stated:

- The Iraqi regime was threat "as a result of its continued development of weapons of mass destruction".

[113] Paper for the Parliamentary Labour Party, 5 March 2002, 'Iraq Briefing'.

- Saddam Hussein's use of chemical weapons against Iraq's people and neighbours made him "unique among modern dictators".
- Saddam Hussein remained "determined to retain and rebuild his Weapons of Mass Destruction (WMD) and threaten the region".
- Iraq had "admitted hiding chemical, biological weapons and missile parts in the desert and in railway tunnels".
- "We believe Iraq is still hiding WMD in a range of locations."
- UN inspectors had been unable to account for significant quantities of precursor chemicals for use in the production of chemical weapons.
- "We fear Iraq is taking advantage of the absence of UN weapons inspectors to rebuild its WMD."
- If Iraq's weapons programmes remained "unchecked", Iraq "could redevelop offensive chemical and biological capabilities within a very short period of time and develop a crude nuclear device in about five years. Without the controls they would have developed a nuclear weapon by now."

241. Posing the question "Are you preparing for military action against Iraq?", the paper stated:

> "We cannot ignore the threat Iraq poses to the international community through its massive programme of development of weapons of mass destruction."

242. Mr Straw's Private Office signed a letter to members of Cabinet on 6 March, suggesting that they might find the PLP briefing paper on Iraq "useful background".[114]

243. In response to press reporting about Iraq's potential to develop a crude nuclear device in about five years if its programmes remained "unchecked", Mr Dowse wrote to Dr Williams on 13 March, pointing out that the reference in the PLP briefing paper statement differed from the FCO's "usual line" on Iraq's nuclear weapons.[115] That was that the development of a nuclear weapon would be possible only if UN sanctions were lifted. Mr Dowse added:

> "… we believe that at present … the Iraqi nuclear weapons programme is not 'unchecked' (CBW programmes are another matter) …"

244. Mr Dowse wrote that the difference was "small, but significant" and it raised an issue in relation to the "draft public dossier on 'WMD programmes of concern', which the Cabinet Office was producing". Mr Dowse added:

> "We clearly will now have to review the text, to avoid exposing differences with your paper."

[114] Letter Sedwill to Rycroft, 6 March 2002, 'Iraq: Cabinet Discussion'.
[115] Minute Dowse to Williams [Michael], 13 March 2002, 'Iraqi WMD – Public Lines'.

245. Mr Dowse concluded by underlining the importance of "very close co-ordination at a time when so much public briefing material is in preparation on WMD – and Iraqi – issues".

246. On 6 March, Mr Blair published an article setting out why Iraq was still a threat to the UK.

247. An article by Mr Blair, 'Why Saddam is still a threat to Britain', was published in the Daily Express on 6 March.[116]

248. Mr Blair wrote that "we now have to face the fact that there are irresponsible states which either have, or are actively seeking, biological, chemical and nuclear weapons", and that was a threat which President Bush had "rightly highlighted" in his State of the Union speech on 29 January.

249. In relation to the threat posed by Iraq, Mr Blair wrote:

- We "know … from his own history that Saddam Hussein … has mass destruction weapons and will use them …"
- The UN had "demanded" in 1991 "that its representatives should be allowed into Iraq to dismantle his weapons of mass destruction and ensure he did not replace them" because Saddam Hussein had "used chemical weapons repeatedly against Iranian soldiers", and had used them "against his own citizens when he attacked Kurds in northern Iraq".
- The UN weapons inspectors had "discovered and destroyed thousands of chemical and biological weapons, including thousands of litres of anthrax and 48 missiles" before they had been "kicked out".
- The inspectors were "convinced" that Saddam Hussein had "hidden other deadly arsenals and the plants to manufacture more" but could not track them down because of "almost daily obstruction".
- It was important to "remain vigilant" about the threat posed by Saddam Hussein. If he was not restrained, "a volatile situation in the region could easily become a world crisis".
- The fact that Saddam Hussein had been contained "for so long" did not mean the threat had gone away, he was "continuing his chemical and biological weapons programmes and … the long-range missiles to deliver them".

250. Mr Blair concluded:

> "How we act is a matter for discussion … [I]t is in the interest of all to face up to these threats with determination and resolve …"

DRAFT 'WMD PROGRAMMES OF CONCERN' PAPER, 6 MARCH 2002

251. Mr Scarlett told Sir David Manning that the draft paper for publication on WMD programmes of concern had taken a maximalist line, but said little that had not already been published by the US.

252. Mr Scarlett sent a draft paper setting out the facts "for public use" on WMD programmes of concern in Iraq, Iran, North Korea and Libya, which had been commissioned on 19 February, to Sir David Manning on 6 March.[117]

253. Mr Scarlett wrote that there were:

> "reservations on several points:
>
> - acknowledging that specific judgements draw on intelligence;
> - including material that we know only from intelligence sources;
> - going further than before in our accusations …"

254. Mr Scarlett added:

> "We can discuss these issues (and indeed whether the paper should only focus on Iraq) at your meeting tomorrow … while the draft does take a maximalist line, it goes little further on most points than the material already published by the Americans (to whom we are showing this version in parallel).
>
> "Getting the presentational tone right will clearly be key. We will need to consider at what stage to consult Alastair Campbell [Mr Blair's Director of Communications and Strategy]. Alastair is aware that the draft paper is being shown to you today and stands ready to advise …"

255. The Introduction to the draft paper stated:

- "Several countries have WMD programmes and missile systems to deliver nuclear, chemical or biological warheads. They are working to develop more accurate and longer range missiles that will allow them to threaten more than just their immediate neighbours."
- "Several countries that promised not to acquire nuclear weapons are trying to build them; North Korea has probably already succeeded."
- "There are similar problems over chemical weapons … Saddam Hussein used chemical weapons … as recently as the late 1980s."
- "Some countries also have or wish to acquire, biological weapons, some of which have the potential to cause casualties on the same scale as nuclear weapons."

---

[117] Minute Scarlett to Manning, 6 March 2002, 'WMD Programmes of Concern – Unclassified' attaching Paper, 'WMD Programmes of Concern'.

- "We know too that Usama Bin Laden's Al Qaida has for several years tried to get nuclear, chemical and biological agents. They had some success, and may even have obtained some chemical, biological and radiological materials, before being seriously disrupted by coalition action in Afghanistan. They will keep on trying."
- "These facts are alarming. This paper sets out what the Government knows about them, consistent with the protection of sensitive sources of information."

256. In relation to nuclear proliferation, the draft paper drew attention to the "increasingly worrying evidence that several countries that have signed the NPT" were:

> "… nonetheless seeking to breach the Treaty and acquire nuclear weapons. Such actions are illegal and destabilising. The governments concerned are themselves volatile and unpredictable. If these countries succeed in bypassing their international obligations and acquire nuclear weapons, the world will become immeasurably more dangerous."

257. The Summary of Iraq's capabilities stated:

- Iraq has a chemical and biological weapons capability.
- Iraq is seeking a nuclear weapons capability.
- Iraq is developing longer range ballistic missiles capable of delivering these weapons of mass destruction throughout the Middle East and Gulf Region."

258. In the section on Iraq, the draft paper stated:

> "Successful enforcement of the sanctions regimes and the UN arms embargo have hindered Iraq's reconstitution efforts, although WMD programmes continue. Since the withdrawal of inspectors in 1998, monitoring of Iraqi attempts to restore a WMD capability has become more difficult."

259. The draft paper stated that Iraq had "Retained more than a dozen prohibited Al Hussein (650km) missiles" and was "Working on designs for longer range missiles". It highlighted Iraq's achievements pre-1991, the use of ballistic missiles during the Iran-Iraq War and the 1991 Gulf Conflict, and, drawing on intelligence, Iraq's more recent activities.

260. In relation to Iraq's nuclear ambitions, the draft paper stated: "Iraq has a nuclear weapons programme, but it is unable to produce fissile material while sanction[s] remain in place." The UK assessed that, in 1991, Iraq was "only three years away from possessing a nuclear weapon", and:

> "Iraq still wants a nuclear weapons capability and is working to achieve it. Much of their former expertise has been retained and there is intelligence that specialists have been recalled to work on a nuclear weapons programme. But Iraq needs certain key components and materials for the production of fissile material, which would be necessary before a nuclear bomb could be developed. Iraq is covertly attempting to acquire nuclear related technology and materials, such as specialised aluminium, which is prohibited under the terms of international non-proliferation agreements because of its potential application to gas centrifuges used to enrich uranium."

261. As long as sanctions hindered the import of "crucial goods", Iraq "would find it difficult to produce a nuclear weapon". It was assessed that "Iraq would need five years to produce a weapon" if all sanctions were lifted, and progress would be "much quicker if Iraq was able to buy suitable fissile material".

262. In relation to chemical and biological weapons, the draft paper stated: "Iraq has a capability to produce CBW weapons at short notice." It set out Iraq's activities pre-1991, including its use of chemical weapons against Iran and Kurds in Northern Iraq; its history of denying its chemical and biological programmes; and the estimates of material produced which the UN weapons inspectors had been unable to account for.

263. The draft paper added that the UK assessed that Iraq had:

"… a covert chemical and biological weapons programme. All the necessary expertise has been retained. Iraq appears to be installing or repairing dual use equipment at suspect facilities, which could be used for chemical or biological weapon production … Iraq is assessed to be self-sufficient in terms of producing biological weapons."

264. The draft paper also stated that Iraq had developed "Strategies that enable key parts of the chemical and biological weapons programme to survive a military strike"; and that it was:

"… modifying L-29 light aircraft and seeking UAV [Unmanned Aerial Vehicle] technology, which would be suited for delivery of chemical and biological weapons."

265. The draft paper was also sent to Sir Richard Wilson, Cabinet Secretary, the heads of the intelligence Agencies, Mr Peter Ricketts, FCO Political Director, AM French, Mr Webb, Mr McKane and Mr Miller.

266. Mr Miller sent the draft to the US Embassy in London asking for comments, including if it raised "any sensitivities from an intelligence perspective", and any additional input that "might strengthen the public case", by early the following week.[118]

267. At the JIC meeting on 6 March, Sir David Manning said it would be "very helpful if an updated assessment on Iraq's WMD capabilities could be provided by the end of the following week", to form part of the package of briefing being prepared for Mr Blair's visit to the US.[119]

---

[119] Minutes, 6 March 2002, JIC meeting.

268. Mr Scarlett invited the Assessments Staff to prepare a CIG Assessment.

269. The Assessment, issued on 15 March, is addressed later in this Section.

270. The UK Government has been unable to find any record of Sir David Manning's meeting on 7 March, at which the draft Cabinet Office 'Iraq: Options Paper' was also discussed.[120]

CABINET, 7 MARCH 2002

271. Cabinet was told on 7 March that Iraq's WMD programmes posed a threat to peace.

272. Cabinet's discussion of the wider policy on Iraq is addressed in Section 3.2.

273. In relation to WMD, Mr Straw told Cabinet that "it was important to remind his colleagues of the background" of Iraq's failure to meet the obligations imposed by the Security Council, and that Saddam Hussein's:

> "… regime continued to pose a threat to peace through its development of weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and the means to deliver them. UN weapons inspectors had been forced to leave Iraq in 1998 because they were close to exposing the full extent of Saddam's programmes."[121]

274. Mr Straw concluded:

> "No decision had been taken on launching further military action … but, it was important to ensure that the British public and international opinion understood the true nature of the threat posed by the regime and the need to respond effectively."

275. Cabinet Ministers raised a number of points in the subsequent discussion, including that "it was important to distinguish between the campaign against international terrorism and efforts to address the threat … posed by the Iraqi regime's continuing development of WMD".

276. In his conclusion, Mr Blair stated:

> "… the Iraqi regime was in clear breach of its obligations … Its WMD programmes posed a threat to peace …"

CABINET OFFICE, 'IRAQ: OPTIONS PAPER', 8 MARCH 2002

277. The Cabinet Office co-ordinated background paper on Iraq, commissioned on 19 February, was sent to Mr Blair on 8 March.

---

[120] Letter Cabinet Office [junior official] to Iraq Inquiry, 22 July 2015, [untitled].
[121] Cabinet Conclusions, 7 March 2002.

278. Iraq's WMD capabilities were briefly summarised in line with the JIC Assessment of 27 February, including that Saddam Hussein would continue with his WMD programmes.

279. The Cabinet Office 'Iraq: Options Paper', commissioned by Sir David Manning and co-ordinated by OD Sec, was sent to Mr Blair by Sir David on 8 March, as part of the collection of "background briefs that you asked for" for the meeting with President Bush.[122] The paper is addressed in detail in Section 3.2.

280. In relation to WMD, the paper advised that containment had:

- effectively frozen Iraq's nuclear programme;
- prevented Iraq from rebuilding its conventional arsenal to pre-Gulf Conflict levels;
- severely restricted Iraq's ballistic missile programmes; and
- hindered Iraq's biological and chemical weapons programmes.[123]

281. The intelligence was "poor"; and there was no greater threat now that Saddam would use WMD than there had been in recent years.

282. The 'Options Paper' proposed consideration of a staged approach to establish international support for military action, advising that for the five Permanent Members (P5) and the majority of the UN Security Council to take the view that Iraq was in breach of the cease-fire provisions of resolution 687 (1991):

- they would need to be convinced that Iraq was in breach of its obligations regarding WMD, and ballistic missiles. Such proof would need to be incontrovertible and of large-scale activity. Current intelligence is insufficiently robust to meet this criterion …; or
- … Iraq refused to admit UN inspectors after a clear ultimatum by the Security Council; or
- the UN inspectors were re-admitted to Iraq and found sufficient evidence of WMD activity or were again expelled trying to do so."

283. Mr Straw stated that the WMD paper had to show that Iraq posed an exceptional threat, and did not yet do so.

284. The Cabinet Office 'Options Paper' and the WMD paper were sent to Mr Straw on 8 March.[124] In relation to the draft paper on WMD, Mr Straw commented that it was:

> "Good, but should not Iraq be first and also have more text? The paper has to show why there is an exceptional threat from Iraq. It does not quite do this yet."

JIC Current Intelligence Group Assessment, 15 March 2002

285. A Current Intelligence Group (CIG) Assessment of the status of Iraq's WMD programmes was produced to inform Mr Blair's discussions with President Bush. It stated that Iraq continued to pursue a policy of acquiring WMD and their delivery means.

286. A CIG Assessment, 'The Status of Iraqi WMD Programmes', was "approved on behalf of the Committee [JIC]" by Mr Miller on 15 March 2002.[125]

287. The Assessment stated that it had been commissioned by the FCO "to aid policy discussions on Iraq", but the minutes of the JIC of 6 March suggest it was produced in response to a request from Sir David Manning specifically to inform Mr Blair's discussions with President Bush.[126]

288. The Key Judgements in the Assessment were:

- Iraq retains up to 20 Al Hussein ballistic missiles … The location and condition of these is unknown, but there is sufficient engineering expertise to make them operational.
- Iraq has begun development of medium range ballistic missiles over 1,000km … but will not be able to produce such a missile before 2007 provided that sanctions remain effective.
- Iraq is pursuing a nuclear weapons programme. But it will not be able to indigenously produce a nuclear weapon while sanctions remain in place, unless suitable fissile material is purchased from abroad.
- Iraq may retain some stocks of chemical agents. Following a decision to do so, Iraq could produce:
  - significant quantities of mustard within weeks;
  - significant quantities of sarin and VX within months, and in the case of VX may already have done so.
- Iraq currently has available, either from pre-Gulf War stocks or more recent production, a number of biological agents. Iraq could produce more of these biological agents within days.
- A decision to begin CBW production would probably go undetected.
- Iraq can deliver CBW weapons by a variety of means including ballistic missiles. Iraq's CBW production capability is designed to survive a military attack and UN inspectors."

---

[125] CIG Assessment, 15 March 2002, 'The Status of Iraqi WMD Programmes'.
[126] Minutes, 6 March 2002, JIC meeting.

289. In the main text, but not in the Key Judgements, the Assessment warned that the intelligence on Iraq's WMD and ballistic missile programmes was "sporadic and patchy". It added, however, that Iraq was:

> "… well practised in the art of deception, such as concealment and exaggeration. A complete picture of the various programmes is therefore difficult. But it is clear that Iraq continues to pursue a policy of acquiring WMD and their delivery means. Intelligence indicates that planning to reconstitute some of its programmes began in 1995. WMD programmes were then given a further boost with the withdrawal of UNSCOM inspectors."

290. The detailed assessment of Iraq's capabilities is set out in the Box below.

CIG Assessment, 15 March 2002: 'Status of Iraqi WMD Programmes'

Ballistic missiles

- "Iraq has rebuilt much of the military production infrastructures associated with the missile programme and the few high profile sites targeted in Operation Desert Fox in 1998."
- "New infrastructure is being built with a particular focus on improving the support to the solid propellant missile programme."
- The Al Samoud missile had been "extensively flight-tested" and intelligence indicated that Iraq had "produced at least 50 … including those test fired". Preparations were under way "to deploy some of these to military units".
- "Iraq has reportedly succeeded in developing a number of 200km variants of Al Samoud although it is unclear if these are for operational use or research and development for longer range systems."
- "A small number of transporter-erector-launchers (TELs) have been seen, although others may exist."
- Both the Al Samoud and the Al Hussein "could deliver basic chemical and biological warheads". There were "a limited number of launchers available" for the missiles. "Identification and destruction by US aircraft of these missiles" was "unlikely in the first few days of an attack".
- The "solid-propellant Ababil-100 has also been tested and has reached ranges up to 150 km. We judge that this system is likely to become operational as an SRBM [short-range ballistic missile] within 2 years. It might enter service earlier as an artillery rocket. Intelligence indicates that Iraq has plans to extend the range … to 250km."
- Iraq was "seeking to develop new, larger liquid and solid propellant missiles, contrary to UN limits".
- "Recent intelligence" indicated "personnel associated with the Al Samoud programme" had "now been tasked to concentrate on designing liquid propellant systems with ranges of 2,000-3,000km".

- "New intelligence" indicated "the main focus may be on the development of a SCUD derivative, which we judge has an intended range of around 1,200km". "Work on an engine for this system began in 1998, involving personnel who had been reviewing the details of previous Al Hussein production since 1995, although by the end of the year 2000 they were still experiencing technical problems. Additional personnel were probably assigned to other parts of the programme during 2000. A large static test stand capable of testing liquid propellant engines bigger than the SCUD engine has been under construction since mid-2000, probably in support of this programme. Work on larger motor cases for longer-range solid propellant systems has been noted over the last 2-3 years."
- "UN sanctions and the work of the inspectors" had "caused significant problems for Iraq's missile industry in acquiring components and production technology, in particular, for improving guidance and control systems and therefore missile accuracy".
- Iraq was "actively seeking to procure material for its missile programme". Imports entered the country "mainly via Syria and the UAE, with some also coming through Jordan and Turkey"; "In the last six months, Iraq's foreign procurement front companies have become bolder in approaching Western firms, […]."

Chemical warfare

- The CIG continued "to judge that Iraq has an offensive chemical warfare (CW) programme, although there is very little intelligence relating to it".
- From the evidence available, the CIG believed that Iraq retained "some production equipment, and some small stocks of … agent precursors, and may have hidden small quantities of agents and weapons".
- "Anomalies in Iraqi declarations to UNSCOM" suggested that "stocks could be much larger".
- Intelligence on production facilities was "scarce"; and "the reconstructed former precursor … facility near Habbaniyah" was "insufficient to support large-scale CW agent production. Other industrial chemical facilities could be used … but we have no intelligence to suggest they are currently being used in that role."
- Intelligence had "indicated an Iraqi interest in transportable production facilities for chemical weapons, but these could produce only small amounts of agent" and the CIG judged it "more likely that the mobile units are for filling munitions".
- Iraq could produce "Significant quantities of mustard within weeks, using hidden stocks of precursors and with support from Iraq's chemical industry", and "Significant quantities of nerve agents within months, mainly sarin and VX".
- Production of significant quantities of nerve agent would be "heavily dependent on hidden stocks of precursors, the size of which are unknown". "There had been one uncorroborated report that Iraq had filled some artillery rocket munitions with VX in the period 1996-1998, and another that a team of chemists was formed in 1998 to produce 5 tons of VX. The source had been told that this had been completed by the end of 1998."
- Iraq could also produce "incapacitants".

Biological warfare

Work on a biological warfare (BW) programme had "continued throughout the period of UNSCOM inspections" and intelligence indicated "that this programme continues. Key figures from the pre-Gulf War programme are reported to be involved." Research and development was "assessed to continue under cover of a number of legitimate institutes and possibly in a number of covert facilities".

The CIG judged Iraq "could produce significant quantities of BW agents within days of a decision to do so".

There was:

> "… no intelligence on any BW agent production facilities, but one source indicates that Iraq may have developed mobile production facilities. A liaison source reports that:
> - the transportable production programme began in 1995;
> - 6 road-based facilities on trailers, and one rail based facility … were constructed and by March 1999; three were operational;
> - the facilities were capable of making five different (unspecified/unknown) biological agents. Between November 1998 and March 1999 20-30 tons of BW agent was produced."

The CIG commented:

> "Though not corroborated, we judge the reporting is technically credible. Imagery has yet to provide firm collateral but has identified a number of sites that could be associated with this programme. The mobile production facilities have yet to be identified."

The CIG did not "know which types of agent are produced by these facilities" but judged that "Iraq currently has available either from pre Gulf War stocks or more recent production, anthrax spores, botulinum toxin, aflatoxin and possibly plague".

- The "castor oil extraction plant at the former Habbaniyah chemical weapons site may provide the base for producing ricin", although there was "no evidence that Iraq is currently doing so".
- "Reporting that Iraq has also conducted research on smallpox and other toxins cannot be corroborated."
- The JIC judged that Iraq was "self-sufficient in the production of biological weapons".

Delivery means

- Intelligence indicated that Iraq had "command, control and logistical arrangements in place" for the use of chemical weapons.
- Iraq had a "variety of delivery means available for both chemical and biological weapons, some of which" were "very basic".
- "Because of the shortage of some platforms, such as aircraft and helicopters, we judge that Iraq would not be able to conduct a sustained CBW campaign … even if Iraq could produce enough CBW agents to do so. But a single major attack or a number of small attacks would be feasible."

Nuclear weapons programme

- The CIG judged that Iraq "does not possess a nuclear weapons capability", and that: "Its programme was effectively dismantled by the IAEA".
- Although there was "very little intelligence", the CIG continued to judge that Iraq was "pursuing a nuclear weapons programme" which was assessed to be:

  "… based on gas centrifuge uranium enrichment … the route Iraq was following for producing fissile material prior to the Gulf War. Recent intelligence indicates that nuclear scientists were recalled to work on a nuclear programme in the autumn of 1998, but we do not know if large-scale development work has yet recommenced. Procurement of dual use items over the last few years could be used in a uranium enrichment programme. There have been determined efforts to purchase high strength aluminium alloy …"
- A shipment stopped in Jordan was inspected by the IAEA, "who accepted, that with some modifications … would be suitable for use in centrifuges". But there was "no definitive intelligence that the aluminium was destined for a nuclear programme".

The CIG continued to judge that:

- "while sanctions remain effective, Iraq cannot indigenously develop and produce nuclear weapons";
- "if sanctions were removed or became ineffective, it would take at least five years to produce a nuclear weapon. This timescale would shorten if fissile material was acquired from abroad."

Iraq "was capable of producing an improvised nuclear device, but it lacks suitable fissile material. Iraq has in the past explored the use of radiological dispersal devices, but the design we have seen was not a credible weapon. There is no intelligence that Iraq is interested in such devices."

Dispersal of key equipment

- Iraq had "temporarily dispersed key equipment from its missile production facilities" following 11 September 2001, and was "likely to do so again" if it believed an attack was "imminent".
- Recent intelligence indicated that Qusay Hussein "has directed the Military Industrialisation Commission to ensure that all sensitive weapons and chemical technology was well hidden in case of further UN inspections, and that 'destruction committees' have also been formed at suspect CW facilities".
- Dispersal made "the targeting of production equipment very difficult, but it also prevents any surge in production".

291. The view that Iraq had used the period since the departure of the weapons inspectors in December 1998 to seek to enhance its capabilities and was pursuing a programme of concealment and deception was firmly embedded in UK thinking by March 2002.

292. There was also an impression that Iraq had a clear strategic intent to pursue its prohibited programmes.

293. The Butler Report concluded that, for Iraq, readers of JIC Assessments would:

> "… have had an impression of:
> a. The continuing clear strategic intent on the part of the Iraqi regime to pursue its nuclear, biological, chemical and ballistic missile programmes.
> b. Continuing efforts by the Iraqi regime to sustain and where possible develop its indigenous capabilities, including through procurement of necessary material.
> c. The development, drawing on those capabilities, of Iraq's 'break out' potential in the chemical, biological and ballistic missile fields, coupled with the proven ability to weaponise onto some delivery systems chemical and biological agent."[127]

294. The Inquiry concurs with that conclusion.

295. Mr Dowse told the Inquiry:

> "If sanctions were to go … our assessment was that Saddam would very quickly aim to rebuild his WMD programmes and then would pose a threat to his neighbours and international peace."[128]

296. Asked about the impact of international conventions, Mr Dowse added:

> "… the view was that Iraq would be likely to ignore them. It had a long history of cheating, attempting to hide, attempting to evade those controls. So I would say we had very little doubt that Saddam would try to rebuild his programmes."

297. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that, having got the capability, Iraq was capable of using it.[129] Asked whether Iraq's nuclear programme had been frozen, Mr Hoon responded:

> "His [Saddam Hussein's] nuclear programme had been frozen because of the absence of fissile material, but I think there was sense that his efforts to develop larger and longer-range missiles was part of an ambition to deliver a nuclear weapon, if he could secure the fissile material."

298. Sir William Ehrman stated that, in relation to chemical and biological capabilities, there were concerns about Iraq, "particularly through the spring and summer of 2002", although much of the intelligence on which that was based was subsequently withdrawn.[130] Iraq's previous actions in using chemical weapons and its breaches of UN Security Council resolutions also made it a unique case.

299. Sir William subsequently stated that, by August 2002, concerns about the Libyan nuclear programme and the Iranian and North Korean nuclear and missile programmes were top priorities in respect of the UK's counter-proliferation strategy; but so was Iraq:

> "… because its WMD may be the exception to the rule that such programmes are usually driven by defensive needs and, more importantly, are most likely to be deployed against UK forces and those of our allies."[131]

300. Sir Richard Dearlove, Chief of SIS from August 1999 to May 2004, told the Inquiry that, in spring 2002, Libya's WMD programme was viewed as a more serious problem than Iraq.[132]

301. Sir John Scarlett told the Inquiry that the stronger judgement in the 15 March 2002 CIG Assessment about Iraq's capability to produce biological agents "reflected a better understanding of the mobile facilities … and the refurbishment of a former production facility".[133]

302. Sir John Scarlett confirmed that there had been a change in the assessment between May 2001 and March 2002, as the influence of the reporting on mobile laboratories had "built up".[134]

303. Mr Miller told the Inquiry that there was a "slight strengthening in March [2002] of the judgement that BW production was likely to be continuing".[135] That was based on a "slight accumulation of evidence" from reporting from a new source on a possible laboratory and previous reporting in May 2001 from an SIS source on "anthrax production in the early 1990s", taken together with a "more thorough review of the reporting on mobile laboratories".

304. Sir John Scarlett added that "it was judged by the experts to be technically credible and indicated significant production in 1998 and 1999" and it had been "set against separate reporting, not from the same source, on procurement of large amounts of growth media, which at that stage was influential in the assessment".[136] That was the reason for the judgement that production of biological agent could begin within days, rather than the previous assessment of weeks.

305. The Butler Report also drew attention to uncertainties underlying the judgements in the Assessment on Iraq's:

- attempts to procure aluminium tubes;
- possession of plague; and
- chemical weapons programme.

306. The Butler Report stated that the Assessment had been "careful in its description" of the purpose of Iraq's attempts to procure aluminium tubes.[137]

307. The Butler Report explained that the seizure of aluminium tubes in Jordan in 2001 had not deterred Iraq from its efforts, and "By November 2001, there was intelligence that their requirement had increased to 100,000 tubes". It had, however, been "clear from an early date" that, "on the basis of the specifications of the tubes" sought by Iraq, "they would have required substantial re-engineering to make them suitable for gas centrifuge use, including reducing them in length, and machining metal off the inside and outside". That was "paradoxical" given the "very fine tolerances" specified by Iraq.

308. An alternative explanation for the purpose of the tubes had been available "from the outset".[138] Intelligence reporting in summer 2001 mentioned their potential use as rocket motor casings. One report recorded that Iraq had been seeking tubes of the same precise specification from Switzerland "probably for the Iraqi Air Force". Other reports "suggested possible conventional military uses".

309. Commenting on the inclusion of references to Iraq possibly possessing plague, the Butler Report stated that they seemed to have been included in the list of Iraq's biological agents "mainly on the basis of reporting from a much earlier period".[139] The judgement that Iraq could "possibly" produce plague within days "was stronger than was justified by more recent intelligence". A report issued in 1999 had "noted that the informant was unaware of any Iraqi work on plague". Comments on that report had "concluded prudently: 'We do not currently have any evidence that plague forms part of the Iraq BW programme.'"

310. The Butler Report added that "although little new intelligence was received, and most of that was historical or unconvincing, plague continued to be mentioned in JIC Assessments up to March 2003". It concluded that those Assessments "reflected historic evidence, and intelligence of dubious reliability, reinforced by suspicion of Iraq, rather than up-to-date evidence".[140]

[140] Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction ["The Butler Report"], 14 July 2004, HC 898, paragraphs 564-565.

311. The Butler Report also stated that the Assessment fairly reflected the intelligence on Iraq's chemical weapons programme, and that the word "may" had been used to reflect previous intelligence reports on the production and weaponisation of chemical agent.[141] But it added, "we believe the position is best described by a DIS commentary at the time", which stated:

> "Since 1998, there have been numerous claims that Iraq has continued to weaponise agent, but much of the reporting has come from dubious sources and that worth closer examination has lacked collateral and remains unsubstantiated."

312. Mr Miller told the Inquiry that there was little new intelligence on the chemical warfare programme, "but one of the reports on ballistic missiles had carried at least the implication that the person reporting believed that there was filling of missile warheads with chemical agents".[142]

313. Sir John Scarlett told the Inquiry that the May 2001 Assessment on chemical agents had been "slightly stronger" than that of March 2002.[143]

314. Mr Miller added that imagery had shown that plants which had been destroyed had been "recreated", "in some cases … with apparently surprising levels of security".[144] But the reasons for the "less firm" assessment in March 2002 were "no longer completely clear". His view was that:

> "… it reflected the judgement of the particular group of experts who had been convened on each occasion to look at the evidence. They reached slightly different conclusions on the weight to attach to it."

315. Sir John Scarlett also drew attention to the assessment of Iraq's ability to conceal and disperse its weaponry and that there was:

> "… intelligence to show … that thinking was being given to that and orders had gone out accordingly and there had been a temporary dispersal of what was called 'sensitive equipment' after 9/11."[145]

316. Sir John added: "It was a firm underlying judgement that Iraq was pushing where it could, but there was little detailed intelligence on nuclear and chemical programmes." That had been "set against the underlying judgements [in earlier Assessments] on command and control and logistical support, weaponisation". But it did not answer the questions of what chemical or biological agents Iraq currently possessed or was producing.[146]

Draft 'WMD Programmes of Concern' paper, 15 March 2002

317. The revised draft of the paper for publication on WMD programmes of concern sent to No.10 on 15 March incorporated new material strengthening the sections on Iraq's capabilities, including highlighting some unique features in relation to Iraq's violation of Security Council resolutions and Saddam Hussein's use of CW agents against his own people.

318. The draft included a diagram illustrating the impact of a nuclear warhead with a 20 kiloton yield exploding over London, despite the fact that Iraq did not have such a capability and there was no indication that Iraq would target the UK.

319. In response to a request from Sir David Manning to look hard at the facts on Iraq, which would come in for tough scrutiny, particularly about the missile programmes, Mr Miller advised on 11 March that:

- "… there is not much new intelligence in the paper. It is open to the question: so what has changed?"
- Mr Campbell had had "a first run through the draft" that morning, and thought it was on "the right lines" but "suggested a number of areas where more details could be included".
- Mr Campbell had "also commissioned an unclassified paper on the world trade in WMD".[147]

320. Mr Scarlett sent what was described as a "final draft" of the paper on WMD programmes of concern to senior officials in the FCO, the MOD and the intelligence agencies, on 13 March.[148]

321. Mr Scarlett wrote that the draft further reflected the views of No.10 on an earlier version, and that it was "broadly content with the thrust of the paper".

322. Mr Scarlett drew attention to the fact that there were "still some reservations on a number of key points", including going further than before in statements on Iran and Libya's nuclear programmes.

323. Mr Scarlett sought final comments before a meeting the following day "to resolve any outstanding issues".

324. The key changes to the draft paper submitted on 6 March were:

- The Introduction, Background and Aim were largely unchanged although a sentence was added to the last stating that the paper focused "on four countries, which we judge pose a potential threat to our interests".

---

147 Minute Miller to Manning, 11 March 2002, 'WMD: Public Paper'.
148 Minute Scarlett to C and others, 13 March 2002, 'WMD Programmes of Concern – Public Version'.

- The Summary of Iraq's capabilities had been revised to focus first on Iraq's ballistic missiles, including the addition of a statement that Iraq retained "some prohibited missile systems".
- A statement that Al Qaida would "continue with its efforts to acquire WMD and will use them if successful" was added to the Summary.

325. In the detailed section on Iraq, the key changes were:

- References to relevant UN resolutions and statements that Iraq was in breach of those resolutions and the NPT were added and emphasised throughout the text.
- Addition of text stating that the sanctions regime had "impeded" Iraq's efforts to reconstitute its capabilities, but had "not halted them. Much of Iraq's missile infrastructure has been rebuilt; the nuclear weapons programme is been [sic] reconstituted; and Iraq continues to have the capability to produce chemical and biological weapons, and may already have done so."
- The section on ballistic missiles was strengthened by the addition of further details, including:
  - Iraq had chemical and biological warheads available in 1991, but did not use them.
  - Recent evidence suggested that Iraq had succeeded in "reverse" engineering SCUD missile engines, which meant it could build new missiles.
  - Some Al Hussein missiles "could be available for use", and although they were "not very accurate" they were "still an effective system which could be used with a conventional, chemical or biological warhead".
  - Reporting had recently confirmed that Iraq's priority was "to develop longer-range missile systems, which we judge are likely to have ranges over 1,000km".
  - Removal of the reference to Iraq working on missile systems "with ranges up to 2,000km".
- The nuclear section was strengthened by the addition of text on:
  - Iraq's aim before the Gulf Conflict to produce a weapon with a 20 kiloton yield, "ultimately" for delivery in a ballistic missile warhead.
  - Details of the impact of such a weapon if it was used over London.
  - Intelligence in the last year which "indicated" that specialists were recalled to work on the nuclear programme "in the autumn of 1998".
  - Iraq exploration of the use of radiological dispersal devices before the Gulf Conflict, but there was "no evidence that they have maintained this interest".
- Detailed drafting changes to the text on chemical and biological weapons, including that Iraq's modification of the L-29 trainer was judged to be "designed for the delivery of chemical and biological agents".

326. Comments described as the "advice of DIS desk officers rather than the official DIS position", were sent to the Assessments Staff in advance of Mr Scarlett's meeting, including that:

- Iraq had not admitted "large-scale" production of VX agent until 1995; and
- there was insufficient intelligence to support a statement that the modification of the L-29 (jet trainer aircraft) was designed to disperse chemical and biological agents.[149]

327. A record of Mr Scarlett's meeting produced by a DIS participant stated that Mr Straw's comment, that he had been "left with the conclusion that there is nothing exceptional regarding Iraq", was "seen as a fair assessment".[150] That was "to be considered further". The drafting comments on Iraq offered in the email from AM French's office had been accepted.

328. The DIS document which appears to have provided the basis for the DIS comments sent to the Assessments Staff on 14 March, contained one additional point on Iraq questioning the categorical statement in the Summary section of the draft that Iraq had a chemical and biological weapons capability.[151] The author stated that that was historically correct, but:

> "… we are currently unsure as to Iraq['s] absolute capability. We feel there may be difficulty supporting this in the public domain. We should prefer a bullet point similar to … Iran."

329. The relevant statement on Iran was that:

> "Iran has a chemical weapons programme and is capable of producing a wide range of chemical weapons. Iran is also capable of producing biological agents."

330. The UK Government has been unable to locate a CO record of Mr Scarlett's meeting.[152]

331. A revised draft of the WMD paper, which had been agreed with the intelligence agencies in the UK and included some comments from the US, was sent to Sir David Manning by Mr Scarlett on 15 March.[153]

332. Addressing points raised by policy departments, including in relation to Iraq, Mr Scarlett wrote that:

- In the context of Mr Straw's comment that an earlier draft did not demonstrate why Iraq posed a greater threat than other countries of concern, the new draft highlighted "some unique features" in relation to Iraq's violation of Security Council resolutions and Saddam Hussein's use of CW agents against his own people.
- Sir David might wish to consider whether the paper could achieve more impact if it "only covered Iraq": "This would have the benefit of obscuring the fact that in terms of WMD, Iraq is not that exceptional. But it would diminish the impact of the paper in terms of the wider problem of WMD proliferation."
- There was a "potential for some awkwardness" because the briefing document circulated to the PLP in early March stated that Iraq could have nuclear weapons in five years if its programmes remained unchecked.

333. Mr Scarlett also drew attention to the implications of making public for the first time the UK's assessments of Iran and Libya's nuclear and chemical programmes, and the omission of Syria because it was "not expected to develop capabilities threatening to western interests (no long-range missiles)" and it was "not clear" if it was "pursuing a nuclear programme".

334. Mr Scarlett suggested that Sir David might want to consider a wider discussion of the issues raised, and advised that it would be important to set the paper "in a wider policy context" and prepare defensive press material before it was released.

335. Mr Scarlett also mentioned a separate paper, on the world trade in WMD commissioned by Mr Campbell, which "might be more effective as an appendix" to the paper on WMD programmes of concern. That could be considered when a more developed text was available.

336. There is no evidence that Sir David sought a wider discussion.

337. Changes to the draft included:

- A revision to the Aim to state that the paper focused "on four countries, whose activities are assessed to pose a direct threat to our interests".
- Saddam Hussein's "demonstrated readiness to deploy extensively WMD in the form of chemical weapons both against his neighbours and his own population" before the Gulf Conflict.
- Reference to Iraq's failure to comply with UN Security Council resolutions.
- The statement that recent evidence indicated Iraq had succeeded in reverse engineering SCUD missiles was amended to "may have succeeded".
- Addition of a reference to the IAEA having dismantled Iraq's nuclear weapons infrastructure, and the removal of a reference to a judgement that Iraq still wanted a nuclear weapons capability while retaining the judgement that it was working to achieve one.

- Removal of the reference to Iraq's past exploration into the use of radiological dispersal devices.
- The statement "We judge that Iraq has a covert chemical and biological weapons programme …" was changed to: "We assess that …"

338. An FCO note summarising the history of attempts to get weapons inspectors back into Iraq, sent to No.10 on 15 March, in response to a request from Mr Blair, is addressed in Section 3.2.[154]

Decision to produce a dossier focused on Iraq

Proposal for a media strategy to prepare opinion for possible military action

339. The FCO News Department prepared a draft media strategy suggesting that momentum could be built by feeding the media information on WMD and ensuring that, if military action became necessary, it would be clear that other means had been exhausted and it was Saddam Hussein who was at fault.

340. It is not clear what prompted this advice or how authoritatively it represented the FCO position at the time. But it does provide an indication of the thinking in the FCO News Department about the prospect of military action. It was sent to Ministers and senior officials in the FCO, and to Mr Campbell in No.10.

341. As part of the wider policy debate on Iraq, which is addressed in Section 3.2, Mr Blair and Mr Straw were, by mid-March, both addressing the need for an effective message about the specific threat posed by Iraq to underpin the wider strategy.

342. Mr John Williams, Head of the FCO News Department, sent Mr Straw's Private Office advice on a media strategy on 11 March, stating:

> "The process of preparing media and public opinion for possible action on Iraq is under way …
>
> "The Prime Minister's interviews in Australia and the Foreign Secretary's piece in The Times have established a solid base from which to work. The media has taken the point and is eager for detail. There is high interest in evidence being compiled for the dossier with [sic] the UK will share with the US.
> "We should exploit this interest by feeding newspapers and broadcasters with information on WMD, diversion of imports for military use, and human rights abuse:

[154] Letter McDonald to Manning, 15 March 2002, 'Iraq' attaching Note, 'Iraq: Weapons Inspectors'.

all of it presented as evidence from the Government's forthcoming dossier. By doing so, we can build momentum."[155]

343. Mr Williams identified the need to "encourage support from sympathetic newspapers and carry the argument to those likely to criticise our policy". Journalists who were "too easily inclined to discount the threat Saddam poses" should be "forced by the weight of facts" to justify their position. The exercise:

> "… should be part of a big effort to convey more clearly than we have before a sense that we are proposing a peaceful means of dealing with the problem through the UN, while Saddam is deliberately making a peaceful solution impossible. We have to stop his propagandists portraying him as the victim, rather than the villain. If action becomes necessary, it must be clear to all but a minority in [the] media and public opinion that we have exhausted all other means, and that Saddam is at fault."

344. Mr Williams also suggested the need to co-ordinate information and activity between London and Washington and consideration of using the Communications and Information Centre (CIC).

345. Mr Williams provided a more detailed media strategy, "agreed with Middle East Command [in the FCO] and No.10 Press Office", which had been prepared by one of his staff and was "designed to co-ordinate and pace our efforts for maximum impact".

346. The objectives of the strategy were identified as:

- convincing people of "the real threat to their safety and security" from Iraq's WMD programmes;
- demonstrating that Iraq was "in breach of its international obligations to co-operate with the UN";
- preparing "public opinion in Britain and abroad … for possible military action"; and
- rebutting allegations about the UK's policy, "e.g. that it is to toe the line or keep the Muslim world weak".

347. The strategy set out suggested key messages and a list of potential pitfalls, including balancing the need to prepare against the risk of "raising expectations that military action is a foregone conclusion before a final decision has been taken".

348. A list of potential media activities included:

- working with "No.10 and others on a dossier of releasable evidence about Saddam's weapons programmes"; and
- following "a decision in principle to take military action" establishing an FCO-led, CIC-style unit to "generate material" for use by the FCO and No.10.

---

[155] Minute Williams [John] to PS/Secretary of State [FCO], 11 March 2002, 'Iraq Media Strategy'.

349. Mr Williams told the Inquiry that he could "recall feeling it necessary" to produce the note, "though not what internal or external event prompted this", and that "clearly there was a heightened activity in Whitehall at the time".[156]

350. The proposals were discussed in a meeting held by Mr Straw on 18 March. That is addressed later in this Section.

351. Mr Blair concluded on 17 March that the papers he had been given on Iraq did not constitute a properly worked out strategy and that he would need to provide the US with a far more intelligent and detailed analysis of a game plan if the UK was to influence its decisions.

352. That included a need to "re-order our story and message" to address the limited support for a policy of regime change.

353. In a minute to Mr Jonathan Powell, his Chief of Staff, on 17 March, Mr Blair noted the absence of a "proper worked-out strategy" on Iraq, and the need to provide the US "with a far more intelligent and detailed analysis of a game plan".[157]

354. Mr Blair wrote:

> "The persuasion job on this seems very tough. My own side are worried. Public opinion is fragile. International opinion – as I found at the EU – is pretty sceptical.
> "Yet from a centre-left perspective, the case should be obvious …"

355. Mr Blair acknowledged that "the immediate WMD problems don't seem obviously worse than 3 years ago". He concluded: "So we have to re-order our story and message. Increasingly I think [these] should be about the nature of the regime."

356. Asked to explain the thinking in his minute, Mr Blair told the Inquiry that, in relation to WMD, the:

> "… question was about the changed assessment of the risk and the difficulty of making the case that Saddam Hussein posed a threat."[158]

Decisions to focus the dossier on Iraq but to postpone publication

357. Mr Straw concluded that the draft paper on WMD programmes of concern should be replaced by one solely on Iraq. A more general paper on other countries might be issued later.

358. Officials in No.10 agreed.

359. Mr Straw held a meeting to discuss Iraq on 18 March, addressing preparations for Mr Blair's visit to the US, the current discussions between Iraq and the UN and public and Parliamentary handling.[159] The last item comprised:

"– Media strategy … and the next steps in the run-up to Crawford.
– Handling of paper for public use on WMD programmes of concern.
– Ensuring co-ordination."

360. After the meeting, Mr Straw's Private Secretary recorded in relation to the public presentation of WMD:

> "[T]he JIC paper for publication should be solely about Iraq. The Foreign Secretary has discussed this with Alastair Campbell, who agreed. The Foreign Secretary suggests the paper resemble Michael Williams' paper for the PLP, with the meat of the JIC material inserted, so that it covers the range of concerns about Iraq but also draws explicitly on intelligence material. He is content, thereafter, for a more general paper on WMD, including other countries programmes, to be issued."[160]

361. Mr Straw would write to Mr Blair "to flag up the main issues for Crawford, including a media strategy beforehand".

362. Mr Straw would be:

> "… willing to brief the Diplomatic Correspondents and the Muslim media on Iraq, perhaps launching the JIC paper. Overall, we should continue to highlight the WMD threat, increase the profile of the UN angle and play down the prospect for military action."

363. Mr Straw agreed that the FCO News Department/CIC should be reinforced with expertise on Iraq.

364. Mr Straw's request for advice on a media strategy and the legal issues is addressed in Section 3.2.

365. Mr Campbell wrote to Mr Scarlett, Mr Powell, Sir David Manning and others on 19 March, stating that he had discussed the draft with Mr Straw and others and:

> "The general view, including Jack's, is that with such a focus on the public debate on Iraq at the moment, we may be trying to do too much by looking at Iran and North Korea too."[161]

366. Mr Campbell added that Mr Straw was making a speech to the Foreign Policy Centre on 25 March and "was wondering" whether an "Iraq only version" of the

367. Mr Campbell asked: "Do you and copy recipients agree with this approach? Is it doable?"

368. The JIC was informed on 20 March that an unclassified paper on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction was "due to be made public on 25 March, following detailed discussion with interested parties".[162]

369. The minutes of the JIC meeting record that:

> "In a short discussion, the main point made was that the production of this document followed in the wake of similar exercises during the Kosovo conflict and after the events of 11 September. On each occasion there had been a need to use secret intelligence for public consumption, in this current case because of policy imperatives, but each case needed to be taken on its merits. In some circumstances it would be difficult to meet the political need for material to use in public."

370. Concern was expressed about the potential to undermine the Government's policy of not commenting on intelligence matters, which might merit further discussion "at some stage".

371. Sir David Manning sought Mr Blair's views on the publication of the document, which gave details of Saddam Hussein's WMD programmes "drawn from intelligence, providing as much detail as we can safely reveal", on 20 March.[163] Mr Campbell, Mr Powell, Mr Scarlett and he had discussed the handling of the paper and concluded that it should be issued "soon". A speech or statement by Mr Straw on 25 March, which described "a regime which terrorises its own people and is determined to acquire WMD to terrorise its neighbours … would be the cue for placing" the paper "in the Library of the House, and for subsequent briefing of the media".

372. Sir David concluded:

> "We discussed whether we should delay until after you have been to Crawford. On balance we concluded it would serve our purpose better to release the material now to avoid charges that this was an exercise that we had undertaken at Bush's prompting.
> "Are you content for us to go ahead on this basis?"

373. In a manuscript postscript, Sir David added that the proposal had been discussed with Mr Straw, who was happy but preferred a speech in the House to a statement.

[162] Minutes, 20 March 2002, JIC meeting.
[163] Minute Manning to Prime Minister, 20 March 2002, 'Iraq'.

374. There is no indication in the No.10 papers sent to the Inquiry of a response from Mr Blair.

375. Sir David Manning wrote on 2 April: "Not to issue at present."[164]

376. A revised draft paper on Iraqi WMD programmes was produced on 20 March, explicitly stating that Iraq was in breach of UN Security Council resolutions and giving more prominence to its strategies for concealment.

377. Mr Miller sent the draft paper, which was "very much as you have seen it before", to the US Embassy asking for "final comments".[165]

378. Mr Miller also wrote to Sir Richard Dearlove, Sir Francis Richards (Director of the Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ)) and AM French with a similar request.[166]

379. The Introduction of the draft paper had been revised to place the UK's concerns in the context of the failure of a few countries to sign the NPT, the CWC and BTWC or a decision, if they had signed, "to break them".[167]

380. The Introduction focused on Iraq's failure to comply with the NPT, its previous use of chemical weapons, and its failure to comply with relevant UN resolutions adopted since the 1991 Gulf Conflict. It also stated:

> "The International Community has repeatedly sought to disrupt Iraq's efforts to acquire WMD. On each occasion Saddam has sought to rebuild his capabilities. His efforts are making progress. The Government monitors these efforts very closely. This paper sets out what the Government is able to say about them."

381. The Introduction remained unchanged in all subsequent versions of the document produced before September.

382. Other changes in the draft paper included:

- An acknowledgement that Iraq's nuclear weapons infrastructure had been dismantled by the IAEA, but the addition of a judgement that Iraq was "still working to achieve a nuclear weapons capability". That was in breach of its NPT and IAEA obligations, and resolution 687 (1991).
- A reference to Iraq's obligation under resolution 707 (1991) to "cease all nuclear activities of any kind other than the civil use of isotopes".

- A statement that extending short-range missile systems beyond 150km and retention of Al Hussein missiles would be a breach of resolution 687.
- The addition, to the assessment that Iraq had a covert chemical and biological weapons programme, of a statement that Iraq was in breach of resolution 687.
- The addition of a judgement that Iraq had the capability to produce cyclosarin.
- A box setting out the effects of anthrax, botulinum toxin and aflatoxin.
- A statement that: "Strategies to conceal and protect key parts of the chemical and biological weapons programmes from a military attack or a UN inspection have been developed." These included "use of transportable laboratories; use of covert facilities; dispersal of equipment when a threat is perceived".
- A statement that: "Some of these techniques [concealment and protection] also apply to the nuclear and missile programmes. In particular we know that the Iraqi leadership has recently ordered the dispersal of its most sensitive WMD equipment and material."

383. Commenting on the draft of what he described as the "WMD Proliferators' Dossier", Mr Sebastian Wood, Counsellor for External Affairs at the British Embassy Washington, suggested there was a need to "try to present the paper in its wider context alongside other evidence of our commitment to a wide range of non/counter-proliferation tools".[168]

384. In response to receiving a copy of the draft text on Iraq only, Mr Wood wrote to Mr Ricketts:

> "Firstly, if the primary aim of this exercise is to build public understanding of and support for decisive action to prevent Saddam's further acquisition of WMD, we think that whatever is published should spotlight the nexus between State sponsors of terrorism and WMD, and the associated risk that State-developed WMD technology is made available to terrorists who would not hesitate to use it: the [US] Administration have repeatedly stated that this is their number one concern, and focusing the dossier on this risk would bring out more vividly the threat to the UK. Neither does that at the moment."[169]

385. Mr Wood questioned the urgency in producing the document and recommended that US policy officials, including Dr Condoleezza Rice, President Bush's National Security Advisor, should be given a chance to comment on the tactics and timing of publication: "We would not want them to think we are bouncing them on such a politically sensitive issue."

386. Mr Straw was advised on 22 March that the evidence would not convince public opinion that there was an imminent threat from Iraq.

387. Publication of the document was postponed. The Cabinet Office was given the responsibility of co-ordinating preparation of a public "dossier; Mr Campbell was to "retain the lead" on its form and the timing of publication.

388. Mr Miller sent "the latest version of the paper for public consumption setting out the facts on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction" to Sir David Manning on 21 March.[170] He added: "The intelligence agencies here have had a final look at it." The document also incorporated earlier comments from the US.

389. Mr Miller reported to Mr Scarlett that Mr Ricketts had "held a meeting of all concerned" on 21 March and that, after the meeting, No.10 had "decided to delay publication till a decent interval after Crawford".[171]

390. Mr Miller added: "There are nonetheless some points for us to consider", including:

- "Peter's meeting was very concerned that our first paragraph on CBW … was general figures, not the specific numbers used recently and for some time) by the FCS [the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary]. I explained that the US had asked for the change, not recognising the old figures, and that the DIS had in any case recently amended their estimates. Peter planned to draw this to Mr Straw's attention. His Private Office … thought the paper should be delayed until the figures were amended and issued in a PQ [Parliamentary Question]. We need to press the DIS to ensure they stand by their new figures …"
- Sir David Manning would not show the paper to Dr Rice until Mr Blair had approved it.

391. The announcement of the revised estimates produced by the DIS is addressed later in this Section.

392. In a personal minute to Mr Straw on 22 March, Mr Ricketts wrote that there were "two real problems" in supporting US objectives "which need discussing".[172] The first was the threat from Iraq:

> "The truth is what has changed is not the pace of Saddam's WMD programmes, but our tolerance of them post-11 September. This is not something we need to be defensive about, but attempts to claim otherwise publicly will increase scepticism about our case. I am relieved that you decided to postpone publication of the unclassified document. My meeting yesterday showed there is more work to do to ensure that the figures are accurate, and consistent with those of the US. But even the best survey of Iraq's WMD programmes will not show much advance in recent years on the nuclear, missile or CW/BW fronts: the programmes are extremely worrying but have not, as far as we know, been stepped up."

393. Mr Ricketts added:

> "US scrambling to establish a link between Iraq and Al Qaida is so far frankly unconvincing. To get public and Parliamentary support for military operations we have to be convincing that:
> - the threat is so serious/imminent that it is worth sending our troops to die for;
> - it is qualitatively different from the threat posed by other proliferators who are closer to achieving nuclear capability (including Iran).
>
> "We can make the case on qualitative difference (only Iraq has attacked a neighbour, used CW and fired missiles against Israel). But the overall strategy needs to include re-doubled efforts to tackle other proliferators … in other ways … But we are still left with a problem of bringing public opinion to accept the imminence of a threat from Iraq. This is something the Prime Minister and President need to have a frank discussion about."

394. Mr Ricketts' advice on the second problem, the end state of military operations, is addressed in Section 3.2.

395. In a separate minute to Mr William Patey, FCO Director Middle East, and others on 22 March, Mr Ricketts wrote:

> "We now have a bit more time to prepare the public dossier of material on Iraq. We need to use it to ensure that the material is accurate and meets the presentational needs of Ministers."[173]

396. Mr Ricketts added that he had asked No.10 to consider asking the Cabinet Office to take forward work on the dossier through an inter-departmental group. That would need to:

> "… ensure that the US policy community gets enough time to consider our draft paper and comment on it. Ideally, David Manning would send it to Condi Rice soon as work in progress … We will need to keep the Embassy in Washington and UKMIS New York in the loop."

397. Mr Ricketts envisaged that the dossier would also be sent to key European allies in advance of publication.

398. A manuscript note on Mr Ricketts' minute from Mr Matthew Rycroft, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, recorded that Sir David Manning had agreed an inter-departmental group chaired by Mr McKane "could usefully meet after Easter on the substance of public dossier"; Mr Campbell "should retain the lead role on the timing/form of its release."[174]

399. In his statement for the Inquiry, Mr McKane wrote:

> "There was a concentration on ensuring that we produced a document which would make an impact. I therefore had to include as much fresh material as possible. But throughout the process we were clear that the material had to be factually accurate and as comprehensive as possible. We drew from a range of sources, both open and classified, including intelligence material. I relied on the Cabinet Office Assessments Staff and other representatives of the intelligence community to advise on the accuracy of the material which they were providing and the benefits and risks of using intelligence material in a public document."[175]

400. Mr McKane told the Inquiry that there was a debate in Whitehall about whether Iraq represented a greater threat than the other countries, and that "the distinguishing feature of Iraq was that … they had actually used these weapons".[176] He added that he was aware of differences of view about whether it was sensible to publish the document at that stage.

401. Following a discussion with Mr Tony Cragg, Deputy Chief of Defence Intelligence, about a proposed amendment to the paper, a junior official in the DIS recorded that he had been told on 26 March by a junior official in the Assessments Staff that the latest plan was for the paper to be issued after a "decent interval" following Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush.[177] The Assessments Staff official was not sure when that meeting would take place.

402. The Guardian reported on 1 April that the UK Government had "indefinitely delayed publishing a dossier revealing damning evidence against Saddam Hussein", which had been "trailed by" Mr Campbell.[178] It would "now be published when 'it is believed to be appropriate'". The article suggested that No.10 feared publication would add to "fevered speculation of an imminent strike", and that "Labour MPs considered the outlines of the evidence to be unconvincing".

403. The Guardian also reported that there had been:

> "… intense discussions within the intelligence community about what should be published and how much speculation it should contain.

Mr Hoon's and Mr Straw's advice for Mr Blair, March 2002

404. Mr Hoon and Mr Straw both wrote to Mr Blair before the meeting with President Bush at Crawford, Texas on 5 to 6 April 2002.

405. In relation to Iraq's WMD:

- Mr Hoon emphasised the importance of a wider counter-proliferation strategy in the Middle East, stating that, in objective terms, Iran might be a bigger problem for the UK than Iraq.
- Mr Hoon also stated that a number of issues would need to be addressed before forces were committed to military action, including the need for a comprehensive public handling strategy convincingly to explain why such drastic action against Iraq's WMD was needed now.

406. The preparations for Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush in early April 2002, including minutes to Mr Blair from Mr Hoon on 22 March and Mr Straw on 25 March which raised a range of issues, are addressed in detail in Section 3.2.

407. In relation to the threat posed by Iraq's WMD, Mr Hoon wrote:

"The key strategic problem is the spread of WMD – of which Saddam is only one unpleasant dimension. A more active counter-proliferation strategy is required for the region as a whole (for example any Iraqi government will seek WMD if Iran is getting them so our strategy must cover both) …

"… In objective terms, Iran may be the greater problem for the UK … Ironically, we have Saddam Hussein bound into an established control mechanism. There is some substance in the US view that he as an individual is at the root of the WMD risk in Iraq. But any Iraqi government is likely to try and achieve a balance of forces with Iran …"[179]

[179] Minute Hoon to Prime Minister, 22 March 2002, 'Iraq'.

408. Mr Hoon also proposed that Mr Blair might raise with President Bush "the need for a comprehensive public handling strategy, so that we can explain convincingly why we need to take such drastic action against Iraq's WMD now".

409. Mr Straw pointed out that the evidence did not explain why the threat from Iraq would justify military action.

410. On 25 March, Mr Straw sent a personal minute to Mr Blair on the way ahead on Iraq.

411. In relation to the draft document for publication, Mr Straw wrote that making the case that "Saddam and the Iraq regime are bad" was "easy", but there were four areas where there was "a long way to go to convince" the PLP, including about "the scale of the threat from Iraq and why this has got worse recently" and "what distinguishes the Iraqi threat from that of eg Iran and North Korea so as to justify military action".[180]

412. Mr Straw advised that the Iraqi regime posed "a most serious threat to its neighbours, and therefore to international security" but, from "the documents so far presented it has been hard to glean whether the threat from Iraq is so significantly different" as to justify military action. There was:

> "… no credible evidence to link Iraq with UBL and Al Qaida …
> "… Objectively, the threat from Iraq has not worsened as a result of 11 September. What has, however, changed is the tolerance of the international community …"

413. Addressing the difference between Iraq, Iran and North Korea, Mr Straw wrote:

> "By linking these countries together in his 'axis of evil' speech, President Bush implied an identity between them not only in terms of their threat, but also in terms of the action necessary to deal with the threat. A lot of work will now need to be done to delink the three, and to show why military action against Iraq is so much more justified than against Iran and North Korea. The heart of this case – that Iraq poses a unique and present danger – rests on the fact that it:
> - invaded a neighbour;
> - has used WMD, and would use them again;
> - is in breach of nine UNSCRs."

MOD consideration of Iraq's ability to acquire a nuclear capability

414. Work in the MOD in late March to address the difference between US and UK estimates of the time Iraq would need to acquire a nuclear weapon exposed the extent of the difficulties Iraq would face.

---

[180] Minute Straw to Prime Minister, 25 March 2002, 'Crawford/Iraq'.

415. Following discussions in Washington, Mr Webb discussed the time Iraq would need to acquire a nuclear weapon with Admiral Sir Michael Boyce, Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS), and AM French on 20 March.[181]

416. A DIS paper, "What does Iraq need to do to get the bomb quickly?" was produced later that day.[182]

417. Referring to the Assessment of 15 March, the DIS stated:

> "Although there is very little intelligence, the JIC judges that Iraq is still pursuing a nuclear weapons programme. Intelligence indicates that scientists were recalled to work on a nuclear weapons programme in the autumn of 1998, but it is not known if large scale development work has yet recommenced. Procurement of dual use items over the last few years could be used in a uranium enrichment programme. But we have no definitive intelligence that such items are intended for a nuclear programme."

418. Addressing the question "What does Iraq have now?", the DIS stated that the Atomic Weapons Establishment (AWE) had concluded that Iraq had "made significant progress in designing a nuclear device" before 1991:

> "Many aspects of a simple design had been studied, although the high explosives needed to detonate the device had not been fully developed. More sophisticated concepts were being considered to produce a smaller and lighter device, capable of missile delivery, but it is unlikely that much progress has been made … Iraq will have retained documents, drawings and expertise.
>
> "… Iraq still needed to complete aspects of its design and, in particular, to validate the high explosives system. It is unlikely that much of this would have been done before IAEA inspectors left in December 1998 for fear of detection. However, if all the key scientists had been recalled … they could have reconstituted the programme and further developed warhead designs since then. This would not necessarily have been detected by intelligence.
>
> "Iraq also has some possible platforms to deliver a suitable nuclear device. Its Russian made jet aircraft … could probably be adapted [to] carry a simple nuclear bomb … Any former SCUD missiles that could be assembled could take a more sophisticated device. However, the remaining … Al Hussein missiles would not be suitable."

[181] Minute CDI to Policy Director, 21 March 2002, 'Iraq – Nuclear Weapons'.
[182] Minute DIS [junior official] to DI ST, 20 March 2002, 'What does Iraq need to do to get the bomb quickly?'

419. Addressing the question "What would Iraq need?", the DIS stated:

"Iraq does not have the fissile material to make a weapon. To rebuild its uranium enrichment programme would take years and require extensive foreign procurement, which would not be possible with effective sanctions in place. To make a weapon quickly, Iraq would need Highly Enriched Uranium (HEU) from the 'black market' (eg stolen from Russia). It would be credible but very difficult for Iraq to do this. We have no good evidence of Iraq ever acquiring any such material.

"Iraq cannot make the crucial neutron initiator for the device. Iraq needs a nuclear reactor to make a key material in the original unfinished design: it has not had a[n] operable reactor since 1991. Iraq would need to develop or buy a completely new initiator system [from abroad]. Even if it acquired [a] system … Iraq would have to develop the theory and practicalities of how to use such a component. Iraq could only do this quickly with outside expertise.

"Iraq's goal has been to produce a missile warhead. If it had the necessary components and fissile material, Iraq could complete its former simple warhead design for air delivery within a year. However a missile warhead would require a more sophisticated design concept which would take at least two years longer. These timescales could only be shortened with outside assistance."

420. Addressing Iraq's ability to produce an improvised nuclear device (IND), the DIS stated that: "If Iraq could acquire reactor-grade plutonium on the 'black market' it could assemble a crude nuclear weapon." That would be "large and unreliable" and have to be delivered by "unconventional means (eg a lorry)". There was, however, "no evidence" that Iraq had sought such material.

421. The DIS concluded:

"(a) Iraq does not have any nuclear weapons.

(b) Iraq has much of the design technology for a simple nuclear weapon.

(c) It cannot make the fissile material or a neutron initiator for a weapon.

(d) To make a nuclear weapon quickly, Iraq would have to acquire fissile material and a weaponised neutron initiator system, together with foreign expert assistance.

(e) If Iraq could acquire sufficient low-grade plutonium from power reactor fuel it could make a crude IND, but would need to use risky unconventional delivery means."

422. AM French commented that the views Mr Webb had heard in the Pentagon were "not held unanimously in Washington", and the DIS analysis was supported by their "US counterparts":

> "If you take a 'best case' scientific and technical approach to this issue, rather than using intelligence, then we judge that Iraq could probably complete its former simple warhead design for air delivery within about a year."[183]

423. On 22 March, Mr Webb asked Dr Paul Roper, Director Strategic Technology, for:

> "… a second opinion, in particular on how quickly and under what circumstances Iraq might acquire a deployable nuclear capability. There is a range of opinions on this, even within the US Administration."[184]

424. Mr Webb asked for a response by 8 April.

425. Dr Roper responded that he agreed with the advice in the DIS paper, which was "a 'best guess' broad based scientific judgement" in circumstances where hard intelligence was "a little thin on the ground". He added that it was "very important to distinguish" between those two cases.[185]

426. Dr Roper wrote that it was:

> "… hard to believe that Iraq had covertly established a domestic source [of fissile material] given the relatively large signatures of the necessary facilities and it would almost certainly take a few years from start up to acquire enough material."

427. Dr Roper's view was that the likelihood of Iraq acquiring fissile material from abroad was "low", but that was "purely an intelligence matter" not a scientific judgement.

428. Dr Roper set out other components that would be required for a nuclear weapon or device, concluding that even if "against all the odds" Iraq acquired those components from a third party: "The nuclear component would have to be fabricated and integrated with the explosives system and the firing electronics and incorporated in a bomb case." That would "take some time and the one year 'guesstimate' is reasonable".

429. Dr Roper pointed out that work could be carried out in advance of the acquisition of fissile material. In that case "it might take only a few weeks to complete assembly" once fissile material was obtained. Whether such activity would be detected was an "intelligence judgement".

[185] Minute Roper to Policy Director, 27 March 2002, 'Iraq – Nuclear Weapons'.

430. Dr Roper concluded:

> "A more advanced design suitable for deployment on a missile would almost certainly involve more development work and explosive trials. I have no feel for timescale but 2-3 years is a good guess. Again most of this work can be done in advance of acquiring the fissile material."

431. Mr Webb told the Inquiry that there was a "pretty sharp contrast" between the US and UK assessments of the time required by Iraq to obtain a nuclear weapon.[186] Mr Doug Feith, US Under Secretary of Defense for Policy, had told him that the US view was: "We think they can get to a nuclear device within a few months." That had prompted him to ask the DIS for advice.

432. Mr Webb added that, in relation to essential components for a nuclear device, he was aware that the AQ Khan network had placed Pakistani nuclear technology into the hands of a number of states:

> "I knew that AQ Khan had been providing designs to North Korea, to Libya. I suppose I would probably have assumed that if he could do a design, why wouldn't he be prepared to hand over a [key nuclear component] if he had one?"[187]

433. Mr Webb told the Inquiry that his focus "was all about timescales". In the light of the advice that one year would be required to produce "a real nuclear weapon, as distinct from a dirty bomb, and two to three years for a nuclear missile", he had informed Mr Feith, "I think you are overdoing this, but at a year-ish we are in the same sort of zone".

434. In his discussions with President Bush, Mr Blair identified the need for a public relations strategy which highlighted the risks posed by Iraq's WMD programme.

435. Mr Blair's meetings with President Bush at Crawford, Texas on 5 to 6 April, and his speech at College Station on 7 April arguing for an internationalist approach to dealing with Iraq, and the dangers of not doing so, are addressed in Section 3.2.

436. In the discussions with President Bush about a strategy of taking the issue of Iraq back to the UN, Mr Blair identified the need for a public relations strategy that highlighted both the risks of Saddam Hussein's WMD programme and his "appalling" human rights record, and the importance of managing European public opinion and helping to construct an international coalition.[188]

437. Mr Blair said he would emphasise that Saddam Hussein was being given an opportunity to co-operate. If "as he expected" Saddam failed to do so, it would be "very much harder to resist the logic that we must take action to deal with an evil regime that threatened us with its WMD programme".

438. Mr Blair also considered that the US and UK would still face the question of why they had decided to act now; "what had changed?"

439. In the joint press conference on 6 April, Mr Blair stated that the threat of WMD was real and had to be dealt with.

440. Mr Blair said he and President Bush had agreed that "the issue of weapons of mass destruction cannot be ducked, it is a threat, it is a danger to our world and we must heed that threat and act to prevent it being realised".[189]

441. Subsequently Mr Blair stated:

> "There is a reason why United Nations resolutions were passed … calling upon him [Saddam Hussein] to stop developing weapons of mass destruction … and that is we know he has been developing the weapons.
> "We know that those weapons constitute a threat …"

442. As part of his advice to Mr Blair on a statement to Parliament about the discussions with President Bush, Mr Straw wrote that Mr Blair could say that the document on Iraq would be produced "shortly".[190] In Mr Straw's view the UK could "certainly get something out pretty quickly".

443. In his statement to the House of Commons on 10 April, Mr Blair said only that Saddam Hussein was "developing weapons of mass destruction", was "a threat to his own people and the region", and that if he was "allowed to develop these weapons" that would be a threat to the UK.[191]

444. In his response to a question from Mr Tam Dalyell (Labour), Mr Blair said there was "no doubt" that Saddam Hussein was:

> "… still trying to acquire nuclear capability and ballistic missile capability. Furthermore, although we do not know what has happened, we suspect that the piles of chemical and biological weapons remain."[192]

445. Asked by Mr Llew Smith (Labour) on 16 April why he had not published the dossier on the status of Iraq's weapons programmes, Mr Blair replied:

> "We have already placed some evidence concerning Iraq's programmes in the Library of the House. When the time is right, we shall release further material, including the threat posed by the development of weapons of mass destruction.

> The Government believes it important that we should divulge as much information to the public as we can without prejudicing sensitive sources, including intelligence reporting. It has been the practice of successive governments not to comment on intelligence matters."[193]

446. In an interview with Mr David Frost on BBC Television's Breakfast with Frost on 21 April, primarily about the Budget, Mr Blair was asked about the imminence of military action against Iraq (see Section 3.3).[194]

447. In response to a suggestion that the dossier on Iraq had been stopped because it was out of date because there hadn't been any decent intelligence for two or three years or because it was insufficient to convince critics within the Labour Party, Mr Blair replied:

> "… it wasn't pulled … we will publish it at the appropriate time and when that's going to be I simply don't know … The evidence of Saddam Hussein on weapons of mass destruction is vast.
> "… [W]hat we also know from our experience of September 11 that it's sensible to try to deal with these threats before they become fully operational rather than after."

Development of the Iraq dossier, April to July 2002

Revision of the estimates of unaccounted for Iraqi material

448. Revised estimates of material which UNSCOM had been unable to account for when it left Iraq in December 1998 were published on 2 May.

449. Mr Straw was advised that the figures were an extrapolation based on UNSCOM data, but it was "inherently difficult to arrive at precise figures".

450. Mr Ricketts asked Mr Dowse on 22 March to "take forward work with the Assessments Staff" on the new figures provided by the DIS for "Iraqi stocks of CW precursors and munitions" which should, "if possible", be the same as those being used by the US.[195] Ministers would then need to be advised:

> "… how best to get them into the public domain before any comprehensive paper is published: probably by inspired PQ as soon as Parliament re-assembles, making clear that these are revised estimates."

451. Mr Dowse wrote to Mr Miller on 25 March "to sort out how we manage the DIS' new calculations of unaccounted-for Iraqi CW precursors and munitions".[196]

452. Mr Dowse added:

> "Clearly, the first step is to resolve with the DIS just how robust are their new figures. If they carry no more confidence than the previous ones, which we have been using in public for several years, I see no reason to change our lines …
>
> "Thereafter, if it appears we do have to change our public line, I wonder if we might finesse the presentational difficulty by changing the terms? Instead of talking about tonnes of precursor chemicals (which don't mean much to the man in the street anyway), could we focus on munitions and refer to 'precursor chemicals sufficient to produce x thousand SCUD warheads/aerial bombs/122mm rockets filled with mustard gas/the deadly nerve agents tabun/sarin/VX'? Presumably we know from UNSCOM what types of munitions the Iraqis had prepared or were working on at the time of the Gulf War."

453. Mr Dowse concluded:

> "I realise that this would not in the end hoodwink a real expert, who would be able to reverse the calculation and work out that our assessment precursor quantities had fallen. But the task would not be straightforward, and would be impossible for a layman. And the result would, I think, have more impact on the target audience for [an] unclassified paper."

454. Mr Scarlett sent Sir David Manning a revised draft of the paper on WMD on 4 April.[197] That "differed slightly" from the version provided the previous week, because figures for CW material for which UN inspectors had been unable to account had been included. Those were being "double-checked".

455. The draft made clear that the UK could not be sure whether the material the inspectors could not account for had been destroyed or remained at the disposal of the Iraqi Government.

456. Before the first meeting of the inter-departmental group to discuss the paper on Iraq's WMD prepared by the Assessments Staff, Mr McKane wrote to colleagues stating:

> "The only outstanding question in relation to the WMD paper of which I am aware is a discrepancy between certain numbers quoted by Ministers in Parliament and the latest assessment generated in the preparation of the paper for publication. The issue, as I understand it, is whether it is preferable to correct the previous answers to Parliament by means of an inspired PQ or to disguise the discrepancy in the new WMD document."[198]

[197] Minute Scarlett to Manning, 4 April 2002, 'Iraqi WMD Programmes: Proposed Public Paper'.
[198] Letter McKane to Tanfield, 9 April 2002, 'Iraq'.

457. Mr McKane's meeting on 12 April agreed that:

> "… in terms of public presentation, it would be desirable to stick with the chemical weapons numbers used by Ministers in Parliament. If the numbers of tonnes of declared precursor chemicals was in fact seriously out of line with latest DIS assessments and US assessments, then we would recommend use of the new numbers. Jane Hamilton-Eddy agreed to write following receipt of further input from Sebastian Wood in Washington. Thereafter [junior official] would submit advice to the Foreign Secretary in the course of next week. The numbers in the paper can then be finalised …"[199]

458. The FCO review of the revised DIS estimates for Iraqi holdings of precursor chemicals and special munitions which were "unaccounted for" was sent to Mr Straw on 23 April.[200]

459. Mr Straw was told that the DIS had been asked to ensure that the figures previously used in public were defensible, given that they were "based on a series of Iraqi declarations (some of which have altered over time) extrapolated from data in UNSCOM official records" and it was "inherently difficult to arrive at precise figures (a point exemplified by the fact that there is no inter-Agency agreement in Washington on a definitive set of numbers)". The DIS had "therefore produced revised estimates which it judges would be readily defensible in public".

460. The revised estimates were that:

> "UNSCOM inspectors were unable to account for:
> – up to 3,000 tonnes (previously 4,000) of precursor chemicals, 'approximately 300 (previously 610) tonnes of which … were unique to the production of VX nerve agent';
> – up to 360 tonnes of bulk CW agent including 1.5 tonnes of VX (new figures); > – and over 30,000 (previously 31,000) special munitions for delivery of chemical and biological agents;
> – large quantities of growth media acquired for use in the production of biological weapons – enough to produce over three times the amount of anthrax Iraq admits to having manufactured."

461. Mr Straw was advised to announce the revised figures to Parliament, and incorporate them into the "JIC public lines document" on Iraqi capabilities, which the Cabinet Office would be submitting to Mr Blair "by the end of the month".

462. An alternative to such an announcement would be "to move away from precise figures and use more general terms … on the grounds that precise figures are inherently unreliable". The "major downside to this approach" was that the media would "seize on the more vague formulation to suggest that the Government has misled the public for the past three years in talking up the Iraqi WMD threat".

463. To defend the new figures, the FCO suggested the answer should state:

> "These figures represent our latest assessment. This assessment is subject to continual review … The changes we have made do not alter our view on the scale of the Iraqi WMD threat. Indeed, they reinforce our judgement that Iraq's chemical and biological capabilities are substantial and a very real danger to the region and the wider world. We shall be releasing further material about this threat in due course."

464. In a manuscript comment on the submission to Mr Straw, Mr Dowse confirmed he had agreed the minute which would "clear the way for release of the 'WMD dossier' – but whether and when to do that awaits a separate decision".[201]

465. Mr McKane's meeting on 26 April was informed that the FCO had sought Mr Straw's views on an inspired PQ to "bring our public statements on chemical weapons numbers into line with the latest DIS estimates".[202]

466. Mr Straw agreed the recommended approach but asked that the answer should explicitly draw attention to the fact that the figures had been revised, and that he was correcting the estimates in an answer he had given during oral questions on 12 March.[203]

467. Mr Straw also asked that press notice should be issued immediately after the answer, "so that no-one can accuse us of concealing this".

468. The revised estimates were published in a Written Answer from Mr Straw on 2 May.[204]

The Iraq dossier

469. In April the Iraq dossier was expanded to include material on human rights and a history of weapons inspections.

470. Mr McKane told the Inquiry, "In April it was decided that we should work on a group of papers", not "simply a document about weapons of mass destruction".[205] These were worked on until June "when it was decided to put them on ice".

471. In response to a request from Mr Blair for a paper on Saddam Hussein's record of human rights abuses, which might be published alongside the WMD paper, Mr McKane had sent Mr Rycroft the material which had been prepared by the FCO for use by Mr Straw.[206] Mr McKane added that he had asked for material produced around the time of Operation Desert Fox "in case" Mr Blair decided "a more comprehensive treatment of Saddam's human rights record going back to the 1980s" was needed.

472. Mr McKane also asked the FCO to "produce an expanded version of the paper on Iraqi Human Rights abuses to cover Saddam's record from his accession in 1979, stating that the intention was "to produce a clear picture of Saddam's record of human rights abuses throughout his career".[207]

473. In relation to the draft paper on Iraqi Regime Crimes and Human Rights Abuses, which also drew on intelligence, the FCO would revise the paper, "including boxes to highlight particularly vivid and detailed pieces which illustrated the nature of the regime".[208]

474. Junior officials in the FCO questioned whether the draft WMD paper would be sufficient to underpin an argument that WMD posed such a threat that action should be taken to deliver Iraq's disarmament and offered suggestions to improve its impact.

475. Mr Mark Matthews, a junior official in the FCO News Department, was critical of the style of the draft WMD paper and:

> "… the repeated efforts of the authors to emphasise what they do not know as well as what they know. In some cases this is necessary for the sake of accuracy. In others it is unnecessary and unhelpful."[209]

476. After offering detailed comments, Mr Matthews added:

> "It is important that, where unnecessary and unhelpful, these expressions of the authors' uncertainty are removed. Otherwise we risk undermining further a paper which already looks a little thinner than earlier versions of evidence of Iraqi wrongdoing."

477. Mr Matthews also provided a "revised version of the general briefing paper", including a draft Introduction by the Foreign Secretary. The document shows that the briefing paper would set out the wider context of policy on Iraq and would be issued by the FCO. The detailed papers on Iraq's WMD and Saddam's human rights abuses being prepared under the auspices of the inter-departmental group would be published as Annexes to that paper.

478. The points in the draft Introduction included:

- Iraq continued to claim that it had "no chemical, biological or nuclear weapons. We are therefore taking the important step of publishing further information from Government intelligence reports about Iraq's weapons. This shows there is no doubt that Iraq has dangerous chemical, biological and nuclear weapons programmes."
- The concern was "heightened" by Saddam Hussein's previous use of "these horrific weapons". That made him, and the threat he posed, "unique".
- Saddam Hussein would "use these weapons again in pursuit of his aim of regional domination and against the West if he thinks he can get away with it".
- "Doing nothing about this threat" was "not an option".
- That was why the Government was "devoting immense diplomatic energy to pressing Iraq to comply with UN resolutions to destroy its weapons", including giving "UN weapons inspectors full and unfettered access".
- The Government was "serious about wanting to resolve this issue through compliance with UN resolutions …"

479. The key points identified in the FCO briefing paper included statements that:

- The Iraqi regime was "a demonstrable threat to the stability of the region as a result of its continued development of weapons of mass destruction".
- The onus of complying with UN resolutions was on Saddam Hussein: "If Iraq poses no threat, why does he continue to refuse access to UN inspectors?"

480. Sending the email and FCO briefing paper to Mr McKane, Dr Tanfield wrote:

> "I would like you to see this now because I am not convinced that NPD [Non-Proliferation Department] is giving DIS/AS [Assessments Staff] a sufficiently hard time even after all the problems we have already had. May be necessary to bang heads together at next meeting!"[210]

481. An Assessment of regional attitudes towards Iraq and an evaluation of "the regional reactions so far to the prospects of a US-led attack on Iraq", produced at the request of the JIC, was issued on 19 April (see Section 3.3).[211]

482. The Assessment did not examine Iraq's WMD capabilities but, in a concluding paragraph entitled "Making the case", it stated:

> "For governments expected to support a US-led attack, the justification and evidence will be crucial in managing their public presentation. Given that we judge Iraq had no responsibility for, or foreknowledge of, the 11 September terrorist attacks, Iraq's neighbours are likely to demand stronger proof of Iraq's development of WMD (even though many of them are ambivalent on the issue); using Saddam's brutal and repressive regime alone in justification would not attract much support …"

483. Following a meeting chaired by Mr Campbell, it was agreed that the Iraq dossier should include a history of weapons inspections and an explanation of the sanctions regime.

484. Reflecting the decision recorded in Mr Rycroft's manuscript note of 25 March, that he would "retain the lead role on the timing/form of the release" of the document on Iraq, Mr Campbell held a meeting on 23 April.

485. The meeting agreed that the Government:

"should aim to release …:

- the dossier on WMD: JIC will continue their work;
- a readable history of weapons inspections: FCO will compile;
- an explanatory note on sanctions to get across the message that our fight is not with the Iraqi people: FCO will prepare;
- a note detailing the Iraqi regime's human rights abuses: FCO will look again at the material it has prepared for release with the WMD dossier."[212]

486. The documents should be released "as a prelude to a further push on getting the UN weapons inspectors back into Iraq". That could be done through a statement by Mr Straw linked to the UN Security Council's agreement to the Goods Review List (GRL) (see Section 3.3). An alternative might be publication when the GRL entered into force at the end of May.

487. Mr Straw considered that publication of the dossier on WMD should be separate from action in the UN on the revised Goods Review List.

488. Mr Ben Bradshaw, FCO Parliamentary Under Secretary of State, told the FAC on 23 April:

"We will put more evidence in the public domain and we will publish in whatever form we think is most effective … When we feel the time is right."[213]

489. The FCO official who attended Mr Campbell's meeting advised Mr Straw that it would be better to separate the publication of the Iraq dossier and the discussion of the GRL/Oil-for-Food (OFF) resolution in the UN for a number of reasons; and proposed a number of briefing exercises instead.[214]

490. Mr Charles Gray, Head of Middle East Department, and Mr Edward Chaplin, Director Middle East and North Africa, agreed.

491. A letter from Mr Straw's Private Office to Mr Campbell on 25 April recorded Mr Straw's understanding that Mr Campbell's meeting had:

> "… agreed that the launch of the Iraq dossier must not convey a misleading impression of imminent military action, and therefore decided that new material should be added to cover the record of inspections, humanitarian issues and the GRL."[215]

492. The letter set out the FCO preference for separating publication of the dossier from activity on a GRL, including that:

- "The WMD dossier would eclipse the humanitarian message of the GRL/OFF resolution."
- The "Arab world" was "particularly unreceptive at present".
- The "best bet" might be for publication to coincide "with a renewed effort to get weapons inspections readmitted".
- The release of the dossier should be co-ordinated with the US and briefing "governments, notably in the Arab world, in greater detail than is possible in a public document".

493. Mr McKane continued to co-ordinate work to refine the Iraq paper.

494. Mr McKane held a further meeting to discuss progress on the draft public documents on Iraq on 26 April.[216]

495. The meeting was informed that the WMD paper was "ready, although as a living document" it would need "a few days notice to prepare before issue". The FCO would finish the paper on weapons inspections by 2 May and it was finishing the paper on human rights abuses. The documents would "need to be cleared with Washington".

496. The FCO and CIC were preparing "Q and A" material and Mr McKane would "check with No.10 on the desirable extent of ministerial involvement in launching the package".

497. Mr McKane sent the draft papers 'Iraqi WMD Programmes' and 'Iraqi Regime Crimes and Human Rights Abuses' to Sir David Manning on 26 April, reporting that:

- The "WMD paper is in a finished condition, though John Scarlett continues to keep it under review".

---

[215] Letter Sedwill to Campbell, 25 April 2002, 'Iraq: Adoption of the Goods Review List'.
[216] Letter Dodd to Gray, 26 April 2002, 'Iraq'.

- "The Humanitarian Abuses paper needs some further work, principally to insert boxes and photographs …"[217]

498. Mr McKane stated that the papers would need to be shown to the US Administration "at some point", and asked for Sir David's views on the timing for that. He also asked for Mr Blair's views on whether they "should be launched under the name of the Foreign Secretary or a group of Ministers, who might include the Prime Minister, the Defence Secretary and the International Development Secretary (or any combination)" before DFID was consulted.

499. There were only three material changes to the previous draft:

- References to UNSCOM being unable to account for all imported missiles and that Iraq could have built more missiles using components it had retained and hidden were added as "evidence" to the summary of Iraq's ballistic missile capability.
- The Human Rights Watch estimate of casualties from Saddam Hussein's attack on Kurds in Northern Iraq in 1988 was added to the text.
- The revised estimates of chemical agent and precursor chemicals produced by the DIS replaced broad brush figures.

500. A further Cabinet Office meeting was held on 21 May, to discuss progress on the draft FCO documents on weapons inspections and human rights abuses, which were to be finalised for discussion, with the WMD paper, on 29 May.[218] Officials were generally content with the drafts, subject to a number of detailed, mainly presentational, amendments.

501. Mr Patrick Lamb, a member of the FCO Non-Proliferation Department, sent the Cabinet Office "a copy of the latest version of the Inspections Paper" on 27 May.[219]

502. Mr McKane sent the three draft papers, which he described as "virtually in final form, although the CIC is still making presentational changes", to the MOD, the FCO and the Department for Trade and Industry (DTI) on 30 May.[220]

503. Mr McKane added that he envisaged submitting the drafts to No.10 in the second half of June.

504. The paper on Iraq's WMD programmes was very little changed from the version of 26 April. The key changes were:

- The insertion of a reference to a judgement that Iraq's nuclear programme "is based on gas centrifuge uranium enrichment, which was the route Iraq was following for producing fissile material before the Gulf War", as context for text on Iraq's attempts to acquire technology and material with nuclear applications, including specialised aluminium.
- The addition of the words "in their chemical and biological weapons programmes" to a statement that Iraq was using transportable laboratories for concealment.
- Adding to the conclusion that Iraq had a chemical weapons capability, the words "and has used it. It also has a biological weapons capability."

505. The paper on UN inspections and the key changes between the initial draft and the version of 20 June are described in the Box, 'Weapons Inspections in Iraq', later in this Section.

506. A "consolidated draft" of the papers on Iraq, produced by the CIC on 3 June, was circulated by the Cabinet Office on 6 June.[221]

507. The CIC had produced a revised draft of a Foreword for the document. That identified Saddam Hussein as personally responsible for Iraq's WMD programmes and defying the Security Council resolutions. It amended the previous text, which stated that the papers showed "there was no doubt that Iraq has chemical, biological and nuclear programmes", to a statement that they showed "Saddam Hussein has dangerous chemical, biological weapons and is nearing completion of nuclear weapons".

508. The draft Foreword also changed the statement about the UK's diplomatic efforts to resolve the issue through compliance with UN resolutions to one which stated:

> "The world is urging Saddam Hussein to comply … giving UN weapons inspectors … access to Iraq – any time, any place, any where.
> "No decision has been taken to launch military action. It is up to Saddam Hussein to show the world that he is serious about fulfilling Iraq's … obligations."

509. The CIC had reformatted and reordered the text of the Summary and draft paper 'Iraqi WMD Programmes', including addressing Iraq's nuclear capabilities first, before its chemical and biological weapons and ballistic missiles. The substance was, however, largely unchanged.

510. The CIC added summaries for the papers on the 'History of UN Weapons Inspections' and the 'Iraqi Regime's Crimes and Human Rights Abuses'. There were a number of minor changes to the former, the most important of which was to correct a statement that Iraq had, in 1991, been "within 1-2 years" of acquiring a nuclear weapon. Consistent with the paper on Iraqi WMD programmes, that was replaced by the words "within less than three years".

511. A detailed list of occasions on which UN inspectors had been harassed or denied access to sites was removed.

512. Mr McKane told the Inquiry that the role of the CIC was "to sharpen up the product … to make the language clearer, to make it language that would be more readily understood by the public".[222]

513. Mr Miller reported to Mr McKane on 7 June that there was "no serious difference of analysis or interpretation" between the US and UK on WMD.[223] He also reported that work had been commissioned on a US paper for publication on Iraqi WMD.

514. The paper on Iraq produced for the Chiefs of Staff "Strategic Think Tank" on 18 June, stated:

> "Although Iraq's nuclear capability (essentially a 'dirty' bomb) cannot be dismissed, the main threat, at the moment, is from CB weapons."[224]

515. In a minute to Mr Miller on 17 June, a junior official in the Assessments Staff confirmed that the CIC had attempted "to reformat the Iraqi WMD section of the Government briefing paper to match other sections", but "Apart from removing the word 'evidence' from the summary, they have not altered the text".[225]

516. The draft Iraq dossier was sent to Sir David Manning on 21 June, with advice that Ministerial guidance would be needed on the content of the paper and the timing of publication.

517. Following a meeting on 19 June, Mr McKane sent the latest versions of the three "Iraq public documents" and a draft Foreword to Sir David Manning, stating that Ministerial guidance was needed on:

- "Whether Ministers are content with the texts …"
- "Whether to invite the International Development Secretary to sign the Foreword alongside the Foreign and Defence Secretaries."
- "Timing of publication."
- "Whether to treat three Iraqi public documents as a package or separate out the Iraq WMD paper."

518. Mr McKane wrote that the drafts took account of comments from the CIA but had not been passed to other parts of the US Government. He also pointed out that the drafts had not, at that stage, been "shared with DFID".

519. The inter-departmental group advised:

> "… that the drafts should now be held in readiness for an appropriate moment to issue them. Choosing that moment requires careful judgement. The publication of the documents will be regarded by some as an indication that the Government has moved closer to decisions on military action. On the other hand, as part of the carefully co-ordinated exercise, they could serve to increase the pressure on Saddam Hussein."

520. Mr McKane reported that Mr Scarlett's "strong preference" was to:

> "… keep the WMD paper separate in order to preserve its status as a considered assessment of what the intelligence says about Iraq's existing WMD capabilities – in contrast with the other two papers which are based on a mixture of historical material, intelligence and reportage. Most of my group felt that this point was out-weighed by the advantages of presenting the three papers as a single package, in particular because of the close relationship between the WMD and the Weapons Inspection papers."

521. Mr McKane also provided a copy of the separate draft paper addressing wider WMD programmes of concern, stating that:

> "The Foreign Office, in particular, have advised that this paper should not be published at the same time as the Iraq dossier, because of awkward comparisons which might be drawn between the threat posed by other countries of concern and that posed by Iraq. More generally, the FCO have concerns about the quality of the 'evidence' …"

522. Mr McKane concluded:

> "Despite the case for shining a spotlight on all states of WMD concern, the balance of the arguments points towards delaying, at least until we are clearer about the way forward on Iraq."

523. The draft papers sent to Sir David Manning were largely identical to those produced by the CIC on 3 June. The key changes to the WMD paper were:

---

[226] Minute McKane to Manning, 21 June 2002, 'Iraq: Public Documents'.

- The text on nuclear weapons in the draft Foreword was amended to state the papers showed only that Saddam Hussein was "still seeking to acquire nuclear weapons".
- References to Iraq's ability to produce ricin and its effect were added to the section on biological agents in the paper on Iraq's WMD programmes.

524. The key points in the paper on UN inspections, which drew on published and intelligence sources, including reports by UN personnel and non-Government sources, are set out in the Box below.

'UN Weapons Inspections in Iraq'

The draft FCO paper on weapons inspections stated:

> "The history of UN weapons inspections in Iraq has been characterised by persistent Iraqi efforts to frustrate, deceive and intimidate inspectors. Despite the conduct of the Iraqi authorities towards them, both UNSCOM and the IAEA … have valuable records of achievement …
>
> "By the end of 1998 there nevertheless remained significant uncertainties about the disposition of Iraq's prohibited WMD programmes. A series of confrontations and the systematic refusal by Iraq to co-operate, left UNSCOM unable to perform its mandate and the inspectors withdrew …"

Since December 1998, Iraq had:

> "… refused absolutely to comply with its UN … obligations and allow access to weapons inspectors. We judge that Iraq has used the intervening … period to rebuild significant aspects of its chemical, biological, nuclear and ballistic missile programmes."

That was "a direct challenge to the authority of the UN". In addition, Iraq's actions breached its commitments under:

- the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention – which bans the development, production, stockpiling, acquisition or retention of biological weapons; and
- the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty – which prohibits Iraq from manufacturing or otherwise acquiring nuclear weapons."

The paper described the setting up of two inspection teams in accordance with the provisions of resolution 687 (1991) and set out an account of Iraq's concealment of its activities together with a list of "infamous examples" of Iraq's harassment of the inspectors.

The 20 June version of the paper acknowledged that special access to Presidential sites had been negotiated in 1998. A statement in the initial draft that the sites housed units "which had in the past been associated with concealing Iraq's WMD programme" was replaced by a statement that they were "an integral part of Iraqi counter-measures expressly designed to hide weapons material".

The initial reference to Iraq having "admitted… a large, effective, system for hiding proscribed material" was replaced by a reference to Iraq's acknowledgement that it had set up a unit in April 1991 to "conceal vital aspects of its proscribed programmes".

The paper set out in considerable detail Iraq's "blatant" obstruction of UN inspectors in relation to its biological weapons programme. Iraq did not acknowledge that biological agents had been produced "on an industrial scale" until July 1995. It also "admitted producing in excess of 200 biological weapons with a reserve of agent to fill considerably more". Subsequent disclosures in relation to the programme were "technically inadequate" and Iraq had refused to elaborate on the details.

The paper also set out the inspectors' achievements in dismantling and destroying Iraq's proscribed weapons systems, but "a series of significant unresolved disarmament issues remained".

The paper stated the UK believed "that Iraq has pressed ahead with its WMD programmes" since 1998; and that the heads of UNSCOM and the IAEA had "declared that in the absence of inspections", it was "impossible to verify Iraq's compliance with its … obligations".

The paper concluded:

> "In the interests of regional and global security, the international community cannot allow this stand off to continue indefinitely."

525. In a report published on 20 June, the FAC recommended that the UK Government should follow the precedent it had set in relation to Afghanistan, in October 2001, and:

> "… publish the fullest possible documentation on the need for further military action, before any such action is seriously contemplated. While nothing should be published which might compromise sources or methods of intelligence, the Government must try to secure the widest possible support in Parliament and among the British people if it is proposing to risk the lives of British servicemen and women as part of a further phase of the war against terrorism."[227]

526. In mid-July, No.10 officials decided that publication should be put on hold for the time being.

527. During questions on Iraq from the Liaison Committee on 16 July (see Section 3.3), Mr Blair replied that "as far as he was aware there was no evidence linking Saddam Hussein to the actual attack on 11 September"; and that there were "various rough linkages" to Al Qaida; but the issue (on Iraq) was "weapons of mass destruction. It is not what happened on 11 September or the Al Qaida terrorist network."[228]

528. Asked what had changed since President Bush took office, Mr Blair replied:

> "… First … it is clear that Saddam Hussein is still trying to develop weapons of mass destruction. Secondly … weapons inspectors where he is still refusing to > abide by the UN resolutions … as more negotiations go on and he fails to comply and you know that he is developing these weapons of mass destruction, then over a period of time you are entitled to draw the conclusion that this threat is growing not diminishing … there is a threat … The options are open but we do have to deal with it …"[229]

529. Mr Blair also told Mr Anderson that there would be documentation setting out the nature of the WMD threat and that:

> "The only reason we have not published some of this documentation before is that you have got to choose your time … otherwise you send something rocketing up the agenda when it is not necessarily there. Certainly if we do move into a new phase, yes, of course, we will publish."[230]

530. Sir David Manning discussed Mr McKane's minute of 21 June with him and Mr Powell and Mr Campbell on 16 July.[231] They agreed:

> "… now was not the time to publish any of the three Iraq public documents or the wider WMD programmes of concern paper. We should, however, be ready to move quickly in the light of changing circumstances."

531. It was also agreed that the draft would not be shown to the US until closer to the date of publication and that:

> "We should keep an open mind on whether to publish the Iraq WMD paper separately from the other two Iraqi papers. We should aim for a Foreword signed by either the Foreign and Defence Secretaries, or possibly the Prime Minister."

532. Mr McKane told the Inquiry that he had "had an exchange with Sir David Manning in which we agreed that we should keep it ready … to dust it off and use it at short notice, if necessary".[232]

533. In his diaries Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair had:

> "… raised the temperature another gear by making clear publicly we intended to do something and also saying that Saddam had to be dealt with. We agreed not to go for it yet, because it would look like we were going to war if we did, TB having made it pretty clear that it would be the start of another phase."[233]

534. In his press conference on 25 July, Mr Blair was asked a number of questions about the policy on Iraq (see Section 3.3).[234] Asked why the promised dossier laying out the evidence against Saddam Hussein had not appeared, Mr Blair stated that it would be published when he judged it to be the right moment.

Conclusions

535. The ingrained belief that Saddam Hussein's regime retained chemical and biological warfare capabilities, was determined to preserve and if possible enhance its capabilities, including at some point in the future a nuclear capability, and was pursuing an active policy of deception and concealment, had underpinned UK policy towards Iraq since the Gulf Conflict ended in 1991.

536. While the detail of individual JIC Assessments on Iraq varied, this core construct remained in place.

537. Security Council resolutions adopted since 1991, demanded Iraq's disarmament and the re-admission of inspectors, and imposed sanctions in the absence of Iraqi compliance with those – and other – obligations. Agreement to those resolutions indicated that doubts about whether Iraq had disarmed were widely shared.

538. In parallel, by 2000, the wider risk of proliferation was regarded as a major threat. There was heightened concern about:

- the danger of proliferation, particularly that countries of concern might obtain nuclear weapons and ballistic missiles; and
- the potential risk that terrorist groups which were willing to use them might gain access to chemical and biological agents and, possibly, nuclear material, and the means to deliver them.

539. These concerns were reinforced after 9/11.

540. The view conveyed in JIC Assessments between December 2000 and March 2002 was that, despite the considerable achievements of UNSCOM and the IAEA between 1991 and December 1998, including dismantling Iraq's nuclear programme, the inspectors had been unable to account for some of the ballistic missiles and chemical and biological weapons and material produced by Iraq; and that it had:

- not totally destroyed all its stockpile of chemical and biological weapons;
- retained up to 360 tonnes of chemical agents and precursor chemicals and growth media which would allow it to produce more chemical and biological agents;

---

[234] The National Archives, Prime Minister's Press Conference, 25 July 2002.

- hidden a small number of long-range Al Hussein ballistic missiles; and
- retained the knowledge, documentation and personnel which would allow it to reconstitute its chemical, biological, nuclear and ballistic missile programmes.

541. The JIC also judged that, since the departure of the weapons inspectors, Iraq:

- was actively pursuing programmes to extend the range of its existing short-range ballistic missiles beyond the permitted range of 150km;
- had begun development of a ballistic missile with a range greater than 1,000km;
- was capable of resuming undetected production of "significant quantities" of chemical and biological agents, and in the case of VX might have already done so; and
- was pursuing activities that could be linked to a nuclear programme.

542. Iraq's chemical, biological and ballistic missile programmes were seen as a threat to international peace and security in the Middle East region, but Iraq was viewed as a less serious proliferation threat than other key countries of concern – Iran, Libya and North Korea – which had current nuclear programmes. Iraq's nuclear facilities had been dismantled by the weapons inspectors. The JIC judged that Iraq would be unable to obtain a nuclear weapon while sanctions remained effective.

543. The JIC continued to judge that co-operation between Iraq and Al Qaida was "unlikely", and that there was no "credible evidence of Iraqi transfers of WMD-related technology and expertise to terrorist groups".

544. In mid-February 2002, in preparation for Mr Blair's planned meeting with President Bush in early April 2002, No.10 commissioned the preparation of a paper to inform the public about the dangers of nuclear proliferation and WMD more generally in four key countries of concern, North Korea, Iran, Libya and Iraq.

545. When the preparation of this document became public knowledge, it was perceived to be intended to underpin a decision on military action against Iraq. The content and timing became a sensitive issue.

546. Reflecting the UK position that action was needed to disarm Iraq, Mr Blair and Mr Straw began, from late February 2002, publicly to argue that Iraq was a threat which had to be dealt with; that Iraq needed to disarm or be disarmed in accordance with the obligations imposed by the UN; and that it was important to agree to the return of UN inspectors to Iraq.

547. The focus on Iraq was not the result of a step change in Iraq's capabilities or intentions.

548. When he saw the draft paper on WMD countries of concern on 8 March, Mr Straw commented:

> "Good, but should not Iraq be first and also have more text? The paper has to show why there is an exceptional threat from Iraq. It does not quite do this yet."[235]

549. On 18 March, Mr Straw decided that a paper on Iraq should be issued before one addressing other countries of concern.

550. On 22 March, Mr Straw was advised that the evidence would not convince public opinion that there was an imminent threat from Iraq.

551. Publication was postponed. No.10 decided that the Cabinet Office Overseas and Defence Secretariat should co-ordinate the production of a "public dossier" on Iraq, and that Mr Alastair Campbell, Mr Blair's Director of Communications and Strategy, should "retain the lead role on the timing/form of its release".

552. The statements prepared for, and used by, the UK Government in public, from late 2001 onwards, about Iraq's proscribed activities and the potential threat they posed were understandably written in more direct and less nuanced language than the JIC Assessments on which they drew.

553. The question is whether, in doing so, they conveyed more certainty and knowledge than was justified, or created tests it would be impossible for Iraq to meet. That is of particular concern in relation to the evidence in this Section on two key issues.

554. First, the estimates of the weapons and material related to Iraq's chemical and biological warfare programmes for which UNSCOM had been unable to account were based on extrapolations from UNSCOM records. Officials explicitly advised that it was "inherently difficult to arrive at precise figures". In addition, it was acknowledged that neither UNSCOM nor the UK could be certain about either exactly what had existed or what Iraq had already destroyed.

555. The revised estimates announced by Mr Straw on 2 May were increasingly presented in Government statements as the benchmark against which Iraq should be judged.

556. Second, the expert MOD examination of issues in late March 2002 exposed the difficulties Iraq would have to overcome before it could acquire a nuclear weapon. That included the difficulty of acquiring suitable fissile material from the "black market".

---

[235] Minute McDonald to Ricketts, 11 March 2002, 'Iraq'.

557. In addition, the tendency to refer in public statements only to Iraq's "weapons of mass destruction" without addressing their nature (the type of warhead and whether they were battlefield or strategic weapons systems) or how they might be used (as a last resort against invading military forces or as a weapon of terror to threaten civilian populations in other countries) was likely to have created the impression that Iraq posed a greater threat than the detailed JIC Assessments would have supported.

558. The way in which information was presented in the dossier on Iraq published on 24 September 2002 is addressed in Section 4.2.

Introduction and key findings

1. This Section addresses:

- the assessment between late July and late September 2002 of Iraq's capabilities and intentions to develop, produce and use chemical, biological and nuclear weapons and ballistic missiles;
- the production of the Government dossier Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction. The Assessment of the British Government, which was published on 24 September; and
- Mr Blair's statement to the House of Commons that day.

2. A significant number of the documents relevant to the events considered in this Section are already in the public domain, including:

- documents published by the Hutton Inquiry, including the four drafts of the dossier produced in September 2002; and
- documents released in response to FOI requests.

3. The Inquiry has examined most of the original, unredacted, versions of these documents and, in some cases, is adding further information to that already in the public domain. In a small number of cases, however, primarily emails given to the Hutton Inquiry, the Government has been unable to provide copies of the original documents.

4. The roles and responsibilities of the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) and the Secret Intelligence Service (SIS) are addressed in Section 2.

5. The development of UK strategy during the period addressed in this Section is addressed in Sections 3.3, 3.4 and 3.5.

6. The military planning for a campaign in which chemical and biological weapons could be used, and in particular the arrangements to provide protection for UK forces, are addressed in Section 6.1 to 6.3.

Key findings

- The urgency and certainty with which the Government stated that Iraq was a threat which had to be dealt with fuelled the demand for publication of the dossier and led to Mr Blair's decision to publish it in September, separate from any decision on the way ahead.
- The dossier was designed to "make the case" and secure Parliamentary and public support for the Government's position that action was urgently required to secure Iraq's disarmament.
- The JIC accepted ownership of the dossier and agreed its content. There is no evidence that intelligence was improperly included in the dossier or that No.10 improperly influenced the text.

- The assessed intelligence had not established beyond doubt either that Saddam Hussein had continued to produce chemical and biological weapons or that efforts to develop nuclear weapons continued. The JIC should have made that clear to Mr Blair.
- In his statement to Parliament on 24 September Mr Blair presented Iraq's past, current and potential future capabilities as evidence of the severity of the potential threat from Iraq's weapons of mass destruction; and that at some point in the future that threat would become a reality.
- The dossier's description of Iraq's capabilities and intent became part of the baseline against which the UK Government measured Iraq's future statements and actions and the success of weapons inspections.
- The widespread perception that the September 2002 dossier overstated the firmness of the evidence has produced a damaging legacy which may make it more difficult to secure support for Government policy, including military action, where the evidence depends on inferential judgements drawn from intelligence.
- There are lessons which should be implemented in using information from JIC Assessments to underpin policy decisions.

Late July and August 2002

Mr Blair's meeting, 23 July 2002

7. Mr Blair's meeting on Iraq on 23 July did not take firm decisions and he commissioned further advice and background material on the issues.

8. On 23 July, Mr Blair discussed Iraq with Mr Jack Straw (the Foreign Secretary), Mr Geoff Hoon (the Defence Secretary), Lord Goldsmith (Attorney General), Sir Richard Wilson (Cabinet Secretary), Admiral Sir Michael Boyce (Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS)), Sir Richard Dearlove (Chief of the Secret Intelligence Service (SIS)), Sir Francis Richards (Head of the Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ)), Mr John Scarlett (Chairman of the JIC), Mr Jonathan Powell (Mr Blair's Chief of Staff), Baroness Morgan (Mr Blair's Director of Political and Government Relations), Mr Alastair Campbell (Mr Blair's Director of Communications and Strategy) and Sir David Manning (Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser and Head of the Cabinet Office Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec)).[1]

9. The meeting and the advice prepared for Mr Blair and other participants are addressed in detail in Section 3.3.

10. The Cabinet Office paper, 'Iraq: Conditions for Military Action', which was prepared to inform the discussion, was based on the assumption that Iraq was in possession of prohibited weapons and material and was not complying with its UN obligations; but it did not address the issue of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction (WMD) capabilities and intentions or the actual threat posed by Iraq's WMD at that stage.[2]

11. Sir Richard Dearlove discussed policy towards Iraq in a meeting with Dr Condoleezza Rice, President Bush's National Security Advisor, in Washington on 19 July.[3]

12. The report of that discussion stated that the US view was:

- There was "growing evidence of the construction of CBW production and links to terrorists [in Iraq] stoking fears of a repeat 9/11 with WMD".
- There was a strong strategic case for removing Saddam Hussein. Continued development of WMD was not in doubt.
- A casus belli already existed.

13. Sir Richard reported that he was told a US "decision [on action] had already been taken – the question was only how and when".

14. Sir Richard also reported that, in a separate discussion with a senior US official, he had been told that the US Administration's intention was to set the threshold on UN weapons inspections so high that Iraq would not be able to hold up US policy.

15. Sir David Manning drew Mr Blair's attention to the report, commenting:

> "Not much doubt here that the Administration is bent on action soon, and convincing itself that it has strong strategic, as well as a historical duty to act.
> "Our views on links between Iraq, terrorism and development of WMD are different from Condi's: not proven at best …
> …
> "C [Sir Richard Dearlove] will be able to give the full picture tomorrow."[4]

16. Mr Powell commented: "Strengthens the need for and urgency of your note to Bush."[5]

17. Sir David Manning gave Mr Blair an Annotated Agenda for the meeting on 23 July, including inviting:

- Mr Scarlett to set the scene with a "very brief summary" of the intelligence on the position inside Iraq; and
- Sir Richard Dearlove to provide a brief account of his recent talks in Washington. He had returned "convinced that the Administration have moved up a gear".[6]

18. Sir David also identified questions Mr Blair might ask, including what sort of battlefield environment was anticipated, and the response to any use of biological weapons (BW) or chemical weapons (CW).

19. The record of the 23 July meeting written by Mr Matthew Rycroft, one of Mr Blair's two Private Secretaries for Foreign Affairs, noted:

- Mr Scarlett summarised the intelligence and latest [4 July] JIC Assessment: "Saddam's regime was tough and based on extreme fear. The only way to overthrow it was likely to be by massive military action." Saddam Hussein was "worried and expected an attack", but he was "not convinced" that an attack would be "immediate or overwhelming". Real support for Saddam Hussein was "probably narrowly based".
- Sir Richard Dearlove reported that there was "a perceptible shift in attitude" in Washington: "Military action was now seen as inevitable." President Bush "wanted to remove Saddam, through military action, justified by the conjunction of terrorism and WMD. But the intelligence and facts were being fixed around the policy. The NSC [National Security Council] had no patience with the UN route and no enthusiasm for publishing material on the Iraqi regime's record."[7]

20. Mr Rycroft recorded that the meeting concluded that the UK "should work on the assumption that the UK would take part in any military action". Mr Blair also asked for further advice on a number of issues, including that Mr Scarlett would send Mr Blair a full intelligence update.

21. In a separate record circulated more widely in Whitehall, Mr Rycroft wrote that it had been suggested that Mr Scarlett provide a weekly update, on Friday mornings for Mr Blair's weekend box.[8]

22. In his account of the meeting in his diaries, Mr Campbell wrote, in relation to the points made on WMD, that:

- Mr Straw had "said of the four powers posing a potential threat with WMD … Iraq would be fourth. He [Saddam Hussein] does not have nukes, he has some offensive WMD capability. The tough question is whether this is just regime change or is the issue WMD."
- Mr Blair "said he needed to be convinced first of the workability of the military plan, and second of an equally workable political strategy. Jack [Straw] said we could probably get the votes for a UN ultimatum, but the Americans may not want to go down that route. TB saw regime change as the route to dealing with WMD."[9]

23. In his memoir, Mr Straw wrote that he:

> "… ran through the four countries that posed a potential threat to world peace because of their unauthorised and highly dangerous weapons systems – North Korea, Iran, Libya, and Iraq. I thought it important to raise the issue as to whether we should contemplate not joining the US in any American military effort against Iraq. I was concerned that the case against Iraq (why did it merit the most severe action? what differentiated it from the other three?) had not at that stage been made: and also about the potential consequences for Tony's leadership, and the survival of his government."[10]

24. Sir Richard told the Inquiry that he had had "quite contentious and difficult conversations". He had returned from Washington "deeply concerned that there was momentum in parts of [US] Administration", and he had warned Mr Blair about that momentum.[11] In relation to his "alleged comment" about the intelligence being fixed around the policy, Sir Richard told the Inquiry that was really a reference to the attempts "to join up terrorism and Iraq" with which he "radically disagreed".

25. Sir Richard Dearlove's report of his meetings in Washington and the comment that "the intelligence and facts were being fixed around the policy" are addressed in more detail in Section 3.3.

26. Sir David Manning asked Mr Scarlett for advice on a number of issues, including a review of Saddam Hussein's military capabilities and intentions.

27. It is not clear what was said about Iraq's WMD in Mr Blair's meeting on 23 July, but the following day Sir David Manning explained to Mr Blair his concern that:

> "… we (and I suspect the Americans) have only a hazy idea of Saddam's retaliatory capabilities if and when we attack Iraq. CDS [Adm Boyce] was unable to say whether we would expect to fight in a CBW [chemical and biological warfare] environment. The answer has a crucial bearing on the plausibility and viability of US military plans."[12]

28. Sir David wrote that he had "therefore, asked John Scarlett to review all the intelligence on Saddam's military capabilities and intentions, including:

- What military equipment do we think Saddam possesses, and in what state of readiness?
- In particular, does he [Saddam Hussein] have chemical and biological agents; and if so, can he weaponise them?
- If he can weaponise them, do we believe he can deliver them by missile or aircraft?"

29. Sir David pointed out that Iraq had not used chemical or biological agents during the 1991 Gulf Conflict, but he was unsure whether that was because Iraq did not have the capability or for other reasons. He was:

> "… anyway left very uneasy by Mike Boyce's suggestion that the Americans believe that Saddam would only use CBW as a last resort. If this is the American assessment, it strikes me as alarmingly complacent. Saddam will know that once the US launches an attack, the game is up. From his point of view, it will be last resort time from the moment the first Marines hit the beach. And with all the wisdom of the armchair strategist, it seems to me that the temptation to let fly at the Kuwait bottleneck, with everything in his armoury, could be very strong indeed."

30. Mr Scarlett was also asked to "do more work on regime cohesion" in the light of what Sir David described as "a risk of American wishful thinking".

31. Mr Scarlett subsequently provided a list of points on Iraq, to which he believed answers were needed, for Sir David Manning to use during his visit to Washington (see Section 3.3).[13] The points on Iraq's WMD were:

"
- Iraq's CBW and ballistic missile capability …
- Saddam's 'red lines' which would provoke him to use CBW against Coalition Forces or his neighbours.
- What would be the Israeli response to an Iraqi CBW attack?"

32. A JIC Assessment addressing Sir David Manning's questions about Iraq's military capabilities was produced on 9 September. That is addressed later in this Section.

33. On 29 July, Sir David Manning delivered to Dr Rice a Note from Mr Blair to President Bush.

34. Mr Blair sent President Bush a "Note on Iraq" dated 28 July which was intended to influence President Bush's thinking on Iraq.[14] The Note and the subsequent discussions between Sir David Manning and senior members of the US Administration, including President Bush, and Mr Blair's own discussion with President Bush, are addressed in Section 3.3.

35. Mr Blair's Note included six elements for "A Strategy for Achieving a Coalition".

---

[13] Minute Scarlett to Manning, 26 July 2002, 'Iraq: We do not know enough about …'.
[14] Note Blair [to Bush], 28 July 2002, 'Note on Iraq'.

36. One of the elements was the need to explain why action to disarm Iraq was necessary. In a paragraph on "The Evidence", Mr Blair wrote that he had been told that the US thought evidence was unnecessary but his view was "we still need to make the case". He suggested:

> "If we recapitulate all the WMD evidence; add his [Saddam Hussein's] attempts to secure nuclear capability; and, as seems possible, add on the Al Qaida link, it will be hugely persuasive over here. Plus … the abhorrent nature of the regime. It could be done simultaneously with the deadline."

37. In a final section addressing "The Military Plan", Mr Blair wrote that he had been advised that there was a "risk of CW being used" if a military attack was launched which did not result in the rapid collapse of the Iraqi regime.

38. Sir David Manning had a "pre-meeting" with Mr Richard Armitage, the US Deputy Secretary of State.[15]

39. Sir David told the Inquiry that he had raised a number of detailed points with Mr Armitage:

> "… Why now? What if Saddam Hussein were to use weapons of mass destruction during a military campaign? What would follow military action? What role … would the United States see the United Nations playing, and what was the United States planning to do about the Middle East Peace Process [MEPP]?"[16]

40. Sir David said that he had told Mr Armitage that he "didn't think we had answers to those questions". Mr Armitage had replied that he thought they needed a lot more work and that: "It was better to be right than to hurry."

"Summer reading"

41. In response to a request from Mr Powell, Mr Scarlett sent Mr Blair "classified reading material on Iraq" including two documents produced by the Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) on proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and Iraq:[17]

- 'Proliferation Study of Iraq', providing an in-depth study of each of Iraq's programmes to develop weapons of mass destruction, produced in August 2002; and
- an 'aide memoire on Weapons of Mass Destruction and Proliferation', including Iraq, produced in June 2002.

[16] Public hearing, 30 November 2009, pages 16-17.
[17] Minute Scarlett to Powell, 1 August 2002, 'Iraq: Classified Reading Material'.

42. The first was a document of almost 500 pages, "designed to provide a comprehensive reference and briefing document" for use by government departments, providing details of:

- Iraq's nuclear, chemical and biological programmes and their potential means of delivery, particularly ballistic missiles;
- procurement mechanisms in recent times;
- the critical goods which Iraq would require for WMD-related programmes;
- goods and technologies which Iraq was actively seeking;
- developments in indigenous military production; and
- Iraq's conventional arms purchases.[18]

43. The document replaced a version produced in 1996.

44. A one-page summary of key judgements was provided, including:

- The location and condition of the concealed Al Hussein missiles was "unknown", but there was "sufficient engineering expertise to make them operational".
- Iraq had "begun development" of ballistic missiles with a range of more than 1,000km, but it would "not be able to produce such a missile before 2007 provided sanctions remain effective".
- Iraq was "continuing to carry out research into nuclear weapons development at a theoretical level" and intelligence indicated that it might have recalled its nuclear scientists from civilian work in 1998.
- Iraq might "be trying to develop centrifuge enrichment of uranium", but that was "likely to produce significant, if not insurmountable problems".
- "Some clandestine procurement has been attempted abroad using foreign front companies. Many 'dual-use' items such as machine tools and electrical equipment have been acquired which would be available for the nuclear programme."
- It was assessed that Iraq had "no intention of restoring its CW agent production to pre-Gulf Conflict levels" but it "could begin the production of mustard gas on a significant scale at any time and the nerve agents sarin and VX within weeks".
- It was assessed that Iraq was "continuing to conceal the full extent of its BW programme in order to preserve a limited offensive capability and that it could revive its BW programme within a matter of weeks without much difficulty or outside assistance".
- Iraq's CBW production capability had "been dispersed to survive a military attack and UN inspections".

[18] Paper Defence Intelligence Analysis Staff, August 2002, 'Proliferation Study: Iraq'.

45. The second document addressed several countries of concern.[19] A two-page Annex provided comments on Iraq.

46. On Iraq's nuclear weapons, the DIS stated that the intelligence on Iraq's nuclear weapons programme was "limited". Saddam Hussein had held regular meetings with Iraqi Atomic Energy personnel and expressed continuing support of atomic energy. There was:

> "No confirmed weapon-related facilities have been identified but some civil research continues at Tuwaitha and rebuilding of Military Industrial Complex facilities continues. Many scientists from the former nuclear weapons programme are known to work at … al-Tahidi and may conduct nuclear-associated research. Any links to a weapons programme have yet to be established."

47. On Iraq's ballistic missiles systems, the DIS set out Iraq's activities to develop short range systems. On long-range missiles, it stated that Intelligence indicated Iraq had:

- a longer-range SCUD-derived missile "under development". That was "probably linked to the construction of a new large liquid propellant rocket engine static test stand";
- continued work on longer-range systems but it was "unlikely to produce such new systems within five years if sanctions remained effective"; and
- "reported ambitions for missiles with ranges of 2,000 to 3,00km".

48. In addition, the DIS had "recently noted a world-wide drive to acquire production-level quantities of materials for making solid rocket motors and a continued emphasis on guidance and control technology".

49. On Iraq's chemical and biological programmes the DIS stated:

- There had been "some refurbishment" of the former CW precursor production facility near Habbaniyah, but "this could not support large-scale CW agent production".
- The possibility existed that Iraq had "a series of transportable production facilities, although none have yet been identified, possibly as a result of denial and deception".
- Iraq had "the necessary command and control structure necessary to deliver CBW weapons". There were "no specifics on preferred delivery options" but they could, in the future, include the L-29 Unmanned Aerial Vehicle (UAV).

50. It is clear from the documents on the No.10 files that Mr Blair read the papers.

51. When No.10 asked for reading material for Mr Gordon Brown, the Chancellor of the Exchequer in September 2002, Mr Scarlett provided the same documents.[20]

Reservations about the wisdom of publishing the dossier

52. As set out in Section 4.1, Mr Tom McKane, Deputy Head of OD Sec, was asked in March 2002 to chair an inter-departmental group to take forward work on the substance of a paper for publication on Iraq.[21] Mr Campbell was to retain the lead role on the form of the document and timing of its publication.

53. Mr McKane sent the latest versions of the "three Iraq public documents: on WMD, Weapons Inspections and Abuse of Human Rights" to Sir David Manning on 21 June, asking whether the three documents should be treated as a package or the WMD paper should be published separately.[22] Mr Scarlett's preference was for the latter, but most officials in the inter-departmental group thought the papers should be published together.

54. Mr McKane also produced a draft Foreword "which could be issued in the name of Mr Straw or jointly by him, Mr Hoon and Ms Short [the International Development Secretary]".

55. On 16 July, Sir David Manning, Mr Powell and Mr Campbell agreed that publication of the three papers on Iraq should be put on hold.[23]

56. The Cabinet Office paper of 19 July recommended that Ministers should:

> "Agree to the establishment of an ad hoc group of officials under Cabinet Office chairmanship to consider the development of an information campaign to be agreed with the US."[24]

57. There was no mention of that issue in the record of Mr Blair's meeting on 23 July.[25]

58. Mr McKane told the Inquiry that the proposal had come from the MOD and that he had seen it as related to, but separate from, the production of the dossier.[26] The dossier seemed to him to be:

> "… about putting the fact[s] before the British public in a way that would explain why this [Iraq] was a problem and a problem that had to be dealt with.
> "So … it might have formed an element of a broader information campaign."

59. On 5 August, Mr Peter Watkins, Mr Hoon's Principal Private Secretary, wrote to Sir David Manning suggesting that there was "a need to bolster our public lines on Iraq for the summer while not changing our fundamental posture that no decision has been taken on military action".[27]

60. Mr Watkins wrote that the Government was "likely to face a long hot summer of media speculation about the possibility of military action". He suggested strengthening the presentation of existing lines and reinforcing them with recent quotes from Mr Blair and others "about the WMD threat posed by Saddam Hussein". MOD and FCO officials were working on that but careful drafting would be required "to avoid foreshadowing the document now under consideration in the Cabinet Office". He added:

> "The aim would be to reinforce the message that the threat is real, without suggesting that we have determined any particular policy to counter it."

61. Mr Watkins suggested there was a need for "some closely held inter-departmental thinking on a contingent information strategy in support of any decision to take military action against Iraq".

62. Sir David Manning was not persuaded that action was needed immediately and asked Ms Anna Wechsberg, one of Mr Blair's two Private Secretaries for Foreign Affairs, to follow up.[28]

63. Sir David also sent a copy of the minute and his comments to Mr Scarlett.

64. Ms Wechsberg spoke to Mr Hoon's Private Office to say that No.10 was "not enthusiastic" about the proposals. It was agreed that, unless the MOD identified "other arguments for proceeding, the idea will be dropped for now".[29]

65. In a minute on 8 August, reporting developments while Mr McKane had been on leave, Mr Jim Drummond, Assistant Head OD Sec (Foreign Policy), wrote that, in the context of the public debate on Iraq "raging on in the press", Sir David Manning had "been very clear that he wants no action taken on the release of the dossier or any private briefing of those engaging in the debate".[30]

66. Mr Drummond also reported that Mr John Williams, FCO Press Secretary (formerly Head of FCO News Department), had told Mr Straw that "releasing the dossier would be a bad idea because it has insufficient evidence to convince public opinion".

67. Mr McKane had an interdepartmental meeting planned for 19 August. Mr Drummond suggested that if it went ahead, it might be "small and informal to consider the options for a press campaign if/when Ministers take political decisions about Iraq".

68. Mr Williams had written a minute on 2 August which prompted Mr Edward Chaplin, FCO Director Middle East and North Africa, to write to Mr Andrew Patrick, FCO Head of Newsroom, that: "Although the dossier includes some good material, it presents little new evidence of Iraq's WMD to justify a move away from our policy of containment/ deterrence."[31] He had discussed the issue with SIS who took "the same view".

69. Mr Chaplin suggested that special briefings for key foreign leaders would be needed "in addition to any dossier", to "convince them that the Iraqi WMD threat was real, drawing on intelligence material more freely than would be possible in a public document".

70. That might be extended to:

> "… a selection of opinion-formers in the UK … In private briefings one could be much more explicit about the threat, using recent JIC Assessments (SIS have suggested that this could be done without undue threat to sources), plus a political briefing and, perhaps, a description of the damage which a relatively small quantity of WMD could inflict in urban areas of Britain."

71. Mr Chaplin also reported that another senior FCO official had pointed out the risk of "binning the dossier, given that it has already been so heavily trailed", and suggested a briefing note could still be published "nearer the time of military action" along the lines of a document on the "sins of Saddam" produced in 1998.

72. Mr Chaplin suggested the message would be that:

> "… there is still a serious potential threat to UK national security; action has to be taken; the problem could still be resolved peacefully; but if Iraq pursues this route, military action as a last resort is right."

73. Mr Chaplin concluded that, if Mr Patrick and Mr Williams thought his proposals were "a runner", the idea could be developed with the Cabinet Office and others and submitted to Ministers "after the holiday season".

74. Mr Chaplin's minute was sent to the Private Offices of Mr Straw and Mr Mike O'Brien, Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, and to Sir Michael Jay, FCO Permanent Under Secretary (PUS), and other senior officials.

---

[31] Minute Chaplin to Patrick, 9 August 2002, 'Iraq'.

75. In his statement to the Inquiry, Mr Williams wrote that he had been "instinctively against the idea of a dossier" which seemed to him:

> "… to rest on uncertainties, as by definition we did not know what Iraq had done with weapons and materials which it had been told by the UN to account for, but hadn't. That is not to say I questioned the general concern about Iraq, only that I had a feeling we would be in difficulty if we were asked for evidence of things that were inherently unknown to the international community."[32]

76. Mr Williams added that he:

> "… had no inkling that Iraq may no longer possess such weapons, only an anxiety that we could not know the extent of weaponry which the UN was unable to inspect or verify."

77. Mr Williams also wrote that his recollection was that "there was never a voice raised" in Mr Straw's presence, "or in the flow of paper … that ever raised doubts that Iraq still possessed weapons of mass destruction".[33]

78. Mr Williams stated that he had done nothing about his concerns until August 2002, when he "vividly" recalled that he felt "he had to do something", and he wrote a note asking Mr Straw, when he returned from holiday, to try to persuade Mr Blair "to forget about a dossier".[34] He had argued that the Government should not take it upon itself to prove what the inspectors had not been able to prove. The note was overtaken by Mr Blair's announcement at Sedgefield, which is addressed later in the Section, and Mr Williams did not receive a response.

79. The Government has been unable to find either Mr Williams' minute of 2 August or any subsequent minute to Mr Straw in August 2002. Mr Williams' minute of 4 September is addressed late in this Section.

80. During an unpublicised visit to the US on 20 August, Mr Straw informed Mr Colin Powell, US Secretary of State, that:

- Mr Blair had been irritated to find himself in the position, where the US and UK had been "outed" before they had been able to make the case with the public for action against Iraq.
- The UK's draft dossier on Iraq did not in his view lead inexorably to the conclusion that military action was the only way to deal with Saddam Hussein.
- A better case for action could be made.

81. When Mr Straw and Secretary Powell met on 20 August, they discussed Mr Blair's Note to President Bush of 28 July and its impact on thinking in the US.[35]

82. In relation to Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, Secretary Powell told Mr Straw that dossiers on the "case for action" were being prepared:

> "True believers would see a smoking gun no matter what. But most of the stuff Iraq was importing was dual-use. It was not clear that the situation was any more serious this year than last."

83. Mr Straw handed over a copy of the UK's draft dossier:

> "Although it made clear that Saddam was a very bad man, the contents did not lead inexorably to the conclusion that the only way to deal with him was by military action."

84. Mr Straw told Secretary Powell that he had discussed the position with Mr Blair the previous day. Mr Blair was concerned and had:

> "… asked him to stress that the problem was that we had been 'outed' long before we had been able to make the case with the public for action …"

85. Addressing the "public case", Mr Straw said that the UK dossier:

> "… needed a compelling last chapter. We could make a better case than the one we had made so far. Traditional Cold War-style containment did not work for WMD. Rogue states did not have as much at stake as the Soviet bloc."

86. On 19 August, Mr McKane chaired a "restricted" inter-departmental meeting on an information strategy on Iraq.[36]

87. The MOD had provided an outline of the shape an information strategy might take, with the objectives of attaining "domestic acquiescence" and regional and international support.

88. The meeting also discussed the forthcoming International Institute of Strategic Studies (IISS) report (on Iraq's WMD). It was perceived as "useful", but the UK should "resist any calls" to publish the dossier, "which would be seen by the media as a positive indication of UK preparations for a military operation against Iraq".

89. In conclusion, Mr McKane:

> "… re-iterated the sensitive nature of the meeting. It was important that no work was taken forward in the absence of a policy decision, and that no action was taken that might be misconstrued by the media as an indication of the UK's policy decision."

90. It is not clear who attended the meeting as the record was not sent to participants.

91. Mr McKane described the meeting to the Inquiry as a "throat clearing exercise".[37]

92. Reporting on a meeting on 22 August to update Sir David Manning on developments concerning Iraq, Mr Tom Dodd, a junior official in OD Sec, wrote that the IISS would be publishing "an academic dossier" on Iraqi WMD on 9 September:

> "Officials have considered whether we should publish our own dossier in advance or shortly afterwards. However they feel that the HMG dossier should only be published in the context of Ministerial decisions on a policy change towards Iraq and as part of a fully-fledged media campaign."[38]

Revision of the WMD paper

93. Mr Scarlett had been working on the WMD paper in the dossier during August.

94. On 8 and 9 August, there was an email exchange between the Assessments Staff and the MOD about whether there was evidence available on Iraq's ballistic missile work outside the activities permitted by the UN:

- The MOD was asked if it could provide two to three "examples of ballistic missile related sites" which were relevant to the claim that Iraq was breaking the limit of 150km range permitted by the UN.[39] Mr Scarlett was "keen" to include them in the dossier. The MOD was also asked for "an explanation of the shed going up at al-Rafah", which Mr Scarlett also wanted to mention.
- The MOD replied that it was not sure what it could provide but it would "see what we can do".[40]
- In a subsequent email, the MOD stated that al-Rafah was a known engine test site, which had been bombed in 1991 and December 1998.[41] It was "no surprise" that Iraq was putting "a lid on the new stand to prevent imagery observation of test objects – the implication being that the stand is nearing completion and/or there will be something to test on it".
- The MOD also commented: "You will recall that … we said that … points about buildings being reconstructed … rely on inference and comparisons with what they were trying to do before the Gulf War with BADR-2000. A big assembly building does not automatically make large missiles … If the Chairman wants to make the UK paper into a smaller clone of […] … I would tend towards relying on quality …"

- The MOD suggested "Further to your request to make the public paper more exciting", text describing facilities which had "potential applicable to production of the prohibited long-range missile that Iraq is known to be developing", and a reference to "concerted efforts to acquire additional manufacturing technology for its missile programmes" with some items "inevitably" slipping through the embargo.[42]

95. On 19 August, Ms Jane Hamilton-Eddy, one of the Deputy Heads of the Assessments Staff, sent a further draft of the dossier to the DIS. She wrote that Mr Scarlett had recently reviewed the document, and made changes. The presentation of the CBW sections had been revised "to bring out more clearly our judgements" although the text itself was "not new".[43] Mr Scarlett was also:

> "… particularly keen to include examples of suspicious facilities, so can I ask that we look closely at the relevant areas to see if anything more can be said."

96. Ms Hamilton-Eddy added that the aim was to have the revised document ready "by the end of the summer break".

97. While the revised draft largely contained the same material as the draft sent to Sir David Manning by Mr McKane on 21 June (see Section 4.1), there were a small number of additions.[44] Those included:

- In relation to the material for which the inspectors had been unable to account, Iraq's "declarations to UNSCOM [UN Special Commission] deliberately obscure the picture".
- "Iraq's military forces maintain the capability to use these weapons, with command, control and logistical arrangements in place."
- "Facilities of concern include the Castor Oil Production Plant at Habbinayah, which could be used in the production of ricin … and the Al-Dawrah Foot and Mouth Disease Vaccine Plant, which was involved in BW agent production before the Gulf War."
- Details of the possible delivery means for chemical and biological agents.
- "Following the expulsion of weapons inspectors in 1998 Iraq has increased [covert efforts to acquire technology and materials with nuclear applications]. There is compelling evidence that Iraq has sought the supply of significant quantities of uranium from Africa."

- A box on the gas centrifuge uranium enrichment process which described “Many hundreds or thousands of centrifuges …”
- “Iraq admitted to UNSCOM it had 50 chemical and 25 biological warheads [in 1991] but did not use them.”
- Iraq had retained “up to 20”, Al Hussein missiles, rather than “more than a dozen”.
- The new facilities at al-Rafah “would not be needed for systems that fall within the UN permitted range of 150km. The Iraqis have recently taken measures to conceal activities at this site.”
- “Some aspects of this [the new missile-related infrastructure under construction], including rocket propellant mixing and casting facilities at the Al Mamoun Plant, appear to replicate those linked to the prohibited BADR-2000 programme that were destroyed in the Gulf War or by UNSCOM.”

98. The DIS responded on 30 August, stating:

- The UK did not “know where CBW work was being conducted – by its nature it can be conducted in small facilities or labs … Even if only a few litres of agent a day had been manufactured in the 1,200 or so days since UNSCOM left, a considerable stockpile could have been built up.”
- Iraq had a capability to produce biological “agents” as well as weapons.
- Iraq had repeatedly claimed that the agents in “unaccounted for CW weapons would have deteriorated sufficiently to render the weapons harmless. But this was found not to be the case by UNSCOM when they examined Iraqi weapons, many years after they and [sic] been filled (in fact the inclusion of stabilisers in the nerve agent would prevent decomposition).”
- Iraq had admitted that it had 75 chemical warheads for SCUD type missiles.
- It had “nothing else to offer” on Iraq’s ballistic missile programmes.
- Iraq had started to take journalists to facilities to “demonstrate that they are benign”.
- Dr Hans Blix, the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC, had recently stated that there were “some 700 sites” in Iraq the inspectors would like to visit. None were “proven WMD sites” and if specific facilities were mentioned in a public dossier, there was a risk Iraq would target those facilities for visits by journalists “in an attempt to undermine the impact of the dossier”.[45]

JIC Assessment, 21 August 2002: 'Iraq: Saddam's Diplomatic and Military Options'

99. A JIC Assessment of 21 August concluded that in a conflict Saddam Hussein would order missile strikes and the use of CBW against Coalition Forces, supporting regional states and Israel.

100. The JIC had little intelligence on Iraq's CBW and little insight into how it would fight. Its conclusions reflected the Committee's own judgements.

101. In relation to Saddam Hussein's intentions to use CBW and missile strikes, the sense of certainty that Iraq had chemical and biological weapons and that it would use them in the Key Judgements reflected a wider judgement than could have been derived from the information in the Assessment itself.

102. At the request of the MOD, the JIC issued an Assessment on 21 August considering "what diplomatic options Saddam has to deter, avert or limit the scope of a US-led attack".[46] The judgements on these issues are set out in Section 3.4.

103. In addition, the Assessment considered Saddam Hussein's "military options for facing a US-led attack" and how his analysis about each course of action might "change as an attack becomes increasingly imminent". It examined Iraq's options for the short term, whether Saddam Hussein might seize the initiative, how Iraq might respond to a US military build-up, Saddam's options in "war" – including the use of missiles and WMD, and "alternative scenarios and at the death".

104. Iraq's options for the use of weapons of mass destruction were considered "only briefly" as the JIC would assess those in early September, but the JIC offered two Key Judgements:

- "Early on in any conflict, Saddam would order missile attacks on Israel, Coalition Forces and regional states providing the US with bases."
- "Saddam would order the use of CBW against Coalition Forces at some point, probably after a Coalition attack had begun. Once Saddam was convinced that his fate was sealed, he would order the unrestrained use of CBW against Coalition Forces, supporting regional states and Israel."

105. The Assessment stated that "Saddam would probably order missile attacks" and the JIC judged that attacks on Israel would be "an attempt to attract Israeli retaliation and thus widen the war, split the Coalition and arouse popular opinion in the Arab States". Missiles "could be armed with chemical or biological warfare (CBW) agents", although "Saddam might be deterred at least initially by the threat of Israeli nuclear retaliation."

---

[46] JIC Assessment, 21 August 2002, 'Iraq: Saddam's Diplomatic and Military Options'.

106. The Assessment also stated:

- Iraq had a "limited number of long-range missiles … available"; the JIC assessed "12-20 650km range Al Hussein missiles".
- Iraq had produced more than 50 Al Samoud missiles with a range of 150km.
- Attacks on Coalition Forces in Kuwait would require Iraq to deploy short-range missiles into the "No Drive Zone [south of the 32nd parallel – imposed in resolution 949 (1994)]".
- A pre-emptive missile attack on Israel was "less likely because it would show Iraq had been lying about its retention of long-range missiles".

107. Although it had "little intelligence on Iraq's CBW doctrine" and knew "little about Iraq's CBW work since late 1998", the JIC judged it "likely that Saddam would order the use of CBW against Coalition Forces at some point, probably after Coalition attacks had begun". Iraqi CBW use "would become increasingly likely the closer Coalition Forces came to Baghdad. Military targets might include troop concentrations or important fixed targets in rear areas such as ports and airfields."

108. Addressing the possibility of "Alternative scenarios and at the death" the Assessment also stated:

- Saddam Hussein "might pursue an extreme course of action at an earlier stage" if he judged it to be "worth the risk of providing the US with overt justification to attack".
- Unorthodox options might include "the early or pre-emptive use of CBW"; "CBW terrorism: although Saddam probably lacks the capability to deploy a sophisticated device, he could cause widespread panic".
- "Should he feel his fate is sealed, Saddam's judgement might change to 'bring the temple down' on his enemies no matter what the cost". At that stage, "Saddam would order the unrestrained use of CBW against Coalition Forces, supporting regional states and Israel, although he would face practical problems of command and control, the loyalty of his commanders, logistics problems and the availability of chemical and biological agents in sufficient quantities to be effective and the means to deliver them."

109. The Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction, the Butler Report, stated:

> "The Key Judgements … would rightly have been prepared on a precautionary basis. Perhaps for that reason, we have observed that when set against the intelligence on Iraqi programmes contained in advice to Ministers in March [2002], the JIC assessment reflected more firmly the premise that Iraq had chemical and biological weapons and would use them in war. Underpinning this must have been a presumption that, if Iraq did not have stocks of these weapons, it would quickly produce agent, weaponise it and deploy weapons to units …"[47]

110. The Butler Report also stated:

"We were told that the JIC's conclusions were based in part on one human intelligence report from one source, but mainly on the JIC's own judgements. They thus represent an insight into the views of JIC members of Iraq's chemical and biological weapons capabilities at that time."[48]

111. Mr Julian Miller, Chief of the Assessments Staff from September 2001 to November 2003, told the Inquiry that the Assessment had:

"… picked up a report from an established source which referred to the intention to use weapons. I think it didn't distinguish between chemical and biological. It implied both were intended to be used. […]"[49]

Dr Blix's interview, 25 August 2002

Dr Hans Blix, Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC, gave an interview on NBC's Meet the Press programme on 25 August.[50]

Asked whether Iraq possessed biological, chemical or nuclear weapons, Dr Blix responded that there were "many open questions" but the inspectors did not have proof that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction.

Dr Blix also pointed out that "an absence of evidence is not the evidence of absence".

Other points made by Dr Blix are set out in Section 3.4.

Mr Blair's position at the end of August 2002

112. In August, debate in the US about whether military action would be taken against Iraq intensified.

113. The events and debate within the UK Government before Mr Blair's press conference in Sedgefield on 3 September are addressed in Section 3.4.

114. On 26 August, in a major speech to a National Conference of the Veterans of Foreign Wars on the threat from terrorism, the US Vice President, Mr Dick Cheney, stated that Saddam Hussein had "made a science out of deceiving the international community".[51] The "Iraqi regime has in fact been very busy enhancing its capabilities in the field of chemical and biological weapons" and that "we now know that Saddam has resumed his efforts to acquire nuclear weapons … Many of us are convinced that Saddam will acquire nuclear weapons fairly soon."

115. Vice President Cheney added that there was "no doubt" that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction and was "amassing them to use against our friends, against our allies, and against us".

116. In a telephone call on 29 August, Mr Blair and President Bush discussed Iraq, including the need to make clear that Iraq was the UN's problem and that the issue was total disarmament of Iraq's WMD and associated systems not just the reintroduction of inspectors.[52] Mr Blair:

> "… wanted the UN to meet that challenge, but if it could not we would have to act. So we should remake the case, put together the evidence against Saddam, and work up a UNSCR [UN Security Council resolution] …"

117. When Mr Blair returned to No.10 after his holiday, he set out his concerns about the public debate, and that he and President Bush had been "outed" as having decided on military action when no decisions had been taken.

118. As part of a wider note to No.10 officials on 30 August about the strategy on Iraq, Mr Blair set out his position:

> "I don't need any convincing as to where we are on this. The state of opinion, the difficulties. The problems are compounded by the fact that [President] Bush and myself have been 'outed' as having decided for war, come what may, when actually no decisions have been taken. So the arguments are all being made against any action, when we are not yet in a position to make the arguments for it. But all this can be turned round in time, with the right strategy.
> "My basic view on Iraq is clear and hard. The policy of containment … has worked up to a point, but can't continue indefinitely; there is no doubt that, uncontained, Iraq is a threat; they are trying to acquire nuclear weapons capability; they are developing ballistic missile capability for biological and chemical weapons of a longer-range; they retain substantial WMD stocks …
> "Opinion against action divides into two: those always opposed and the usual anti-American lobby; and those, a large number, who ask entirely sensible questions, but who might support action if the questions were answered."[53]

119. Mr Blair stated: "The basic strategy should be to answer these questions and, in doing so, set … Iraq in a bigger context." The steps to do that included:

- raising the whole issue of WMD up the agenda with a separate strategy for each country developing WMD, "in particular [those] acquiring nuclear technology in secret"; and
- setting out the "unique danger posed by Iraq … an inherently violent and unstable regime, with a track record of external aggression, unmitigated by any moderate elements unlike other WMD countries".

September 2002

Mr Blair's decision to publish the dossier

120. On 2 September, Mr Campbell wrote to Sir David Manning, Mr Powell and Mr Rycroft, saying that Mr Blair was "alarmed, and angry, at the way parts of our thinking and planning on Iraq are seeping into the media in an uncoordinated and undisciplined way".[54] "Above all", Mr Blair was "concerned what the US Administration must think". Mr Blair intended to use his press conference the following day (in his Sedgefield constituency) to make the general position clear and "give people a public script".

121. The FCO advice to Mr Blair before the press conference in Sedgefield on 3 September 2002 stated unequivocally that Iraq had and was hiding WMD; and that it had continued its chemical, biological, nuclear and ballistic missile programmes after the departure of UN weapons inspectors in December 1998.

122. The FCO advice conflated past, present and potential future capabilities and conveyed a sense of certainty about Iraq's capabilities and intentions without acknowledging that the judgements were inferential and that there were uncertainties about Iraq's current capabilities and caveats about the absence of intelligence in the existing JIC Assessments.

123. The FCO asserted the belief that Iraq had recently accelerated its weapons programmes, but it did not substantiate that assertion.

124. In preparation for his press conference in Sedgefield, Mr Blair asked for information on a number of issues, including a summary of:

- "what we knew of the existing Iraqi WMD programme, in particular ballistic missile technology (and its significance); and nuclear weapons technology (including why the civil nuclear programme they are funding is almost certainly misused for weapons programmes)".[55]

125. The FCO response was sent to No.10 on 2 September by Mr Mark Sedwill, one of Mr Straw's Private Secretaries who had been attached to UNSCOM between 1996 and 1998.[56]

126. Addressing the question "Does Iraq possess WMD?", the FCO stated:

> "Yes. Iraq is still hiding weapons of mass destruction in a range of locations. The regime has admitted hiding chemical, biological weapons and missile parts …
>
> "The Iraqi regime has admitted producing large quantities of chemical warfare agents … It has also admitted … producing biological warfare agents …
> "In the course of their work between 1991 and 1998, UN weapons inspectors were unable to account for thousands of tonnes of so-called precursor chemicals used in the production of weapons; hundreds of tonnes of chemicals used in the production of VX nerve agent; up to a dozen ballistic missiles with a range of over 600 kilometres; and tens of thousands of special munitions which can be used in chemical and biological weapons."

127. Addressing "Developments in Iraq's WMD programmes Since the Last Inspections?", the FCO stated:

> "… the Baghdad regime continues to pursue ballistic missile, nuclear, chemical and biological programmes in breach of its UN obligations.
>
> "We believe that Iraq has recently accelerated its weapons programmes. For example:
>
> "Saddam's ballistic missile programme has made continued progress and facilities damaged by Operation Desert Fox in 1998 have been repaired. We believe that he is planning to extend the range of his current missiles beyond the 150km limit imposed by the UN …
>
> "We have reports of increased nuclear procurement. We think R&D on a nuclear weapons programme has restarted. If sanctions are lifted, we believe that Saddam could develop a nuclear weapon within 5 years. If he were able to procure fissile material from outside Iraq, then he might possess a nuclear capability in a much shorter timeframe.
> "We believe that the Iraqi regime continues its biological and chemical weapons programmes."

128. The FCO advised Mr Blair that Iraq did not have an active civil nuclear programme and that almost all its facilities had been dismantled after 1991. The International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) inspected "the small quantity of radioactive material which Iraq was permitted to keep for research". The FCO added: "In these circumstances, [56] Letter Sedwill to Rycroft, 2 September 2002, 'Iraq'.

it is more important than ever that the … inspectors are given unconditional and unrestricted access …"

129. The FCO stated that "UN measures" had "played a vital role in frustrating Saddam's ambitions to develop WMD" and described the new sanctions regime adopted by the UN on 14 May 2002 as demonstrating "that the international community remains united in its determination to control the export of military-related items to Iraq".

130. In response to a potential suggestion that the absence of the promised dossier demonstrated the weakness of the Government's case, the FCO stated:

> "Not at all. The scale of the Iraqi WMD programme uncovered by UN inspectors in the 1990s demonstrates the extent of Saddam's ambitions. And his previous use of chemical agents against his own people demonstrates that he will show no compunction in using such weapons.
>
> "… All of our intelligence reporting, revelations from Iraqi defectors and past experience tells us that Iraq is taking advantage of absence of inspections to revive its chemical, biological and nuclear programmes."

131. The FCO also referred to the examples of past Iraqi concealment and deceit identified in UNSCOM's final report in 1999.

132. The FCO stated that further details on Iraq's WMD programmes were set out in the draft dossier on Iraq, which had been produced earlier in the year for possible publication.

133. A separate FCO brief on the policy of containment stated:

- The purpose of the policy (of containment) had been to ensure that Iraq was disarmed through two main elements:
  - disarmament through inspections regimes; and
  - reducing Iraq's ability to finance its WMD programmes by controlling its revenues from oil.
- The policy had "some success in dismantling Saddam's arsenal when the inspectors were able to operate", and it had "slowed his efforts to rebuild WMD". The arms embargo had "been effective in preventing Saddam acquiring new complete weapons systems".
- But, "in the absence of inspectors", Iraq could "work on its WMD programmes unimpeded" and Iraq was "in violation of a string of Security Council resolutions intended to curb" those programmes.
- Controls on revenues were "eroding", giving Saddam "access to large sums over which the international community had no control" and "much" of that was "certainly going into his high-priority WMD programmes".

- Although the sanctions regime had been "targeted on goods of most concern", no sanctions regime would "be completely effective in stopping a ruthless and well-funded regime getting its hands on some of the goods and technology needed for a WMD programme".[57]

134. In his press conference, Mr Blair stated that Saddam Hussein was, "without any question, still trying to develop" a "chemical, biological, potentially nuclear capability"; and that to allow him to do so would be "irresponsible".

135. Mr Blair announced that the "dossier" setting out the evidence of Iraq's attempts to develop its "chemical, biological and potentially nuclear capability" would be published in the "next few weeks".

136. Mr Campbell wrote that the hardest question to answer was "Why now?"

137. On 3 September, in his Sedgefield press conference, which lasted 90 minutes, Mr Blair stated:

> "… I think I would be right in saying that many of your questions will be on Iraq … I sense that some of you believe we have taken all the key decisions but just haven't got round to telling you. That isn't the case … We, at every level of government, have been and remain in close dialogue with the United States of America about this issue and where we are in absolute agreement is that Iraq poses a real and unique threat to the security of the region and the rest of the world. But Saddam Hussein is continuing in his efforts to develop weapons of mass destruction … We have to face up to it, we have to deal with it and will. The issue is then what is the best way of proceeding."[58]

138. A number of questioners pointed out that public opinion had moved against the idea of a strike against Iraq "partly because people feel that there hasn't been much evidence … We have heard again and again that there is a dossier of evidence about Saddam Hussein's weapons of mass destruction. Why haven't we got it up to now and when are we going to see it?" Would there be any evidence in the dossier which had been "gleaned in the last four years" that Saddam Hussein had "moved any further down the route to nuclear weapons? There were suggestions that there was "not going to be much new"; and that, in terms of public opinion, there was "a mountain to climb".

139. In response to the first question, Mr Blair replied:

> "Originally I had the intention that we wouldn't get round to publishing the dossier until we'd actually taken the key decisions. I think it is probably a better idea to bring that forward."

[58] The National Archives, 3 September 2002, PM press conference [at Sedgefield].

140. Mr Blair added: "A lot of the work has already been done, there needs to be some more work and some more checking" but "the best thing to do is to publish … within the next few weeks". When that happened:

> "… people will see that there is no doubt at all the United Nations resolutions that Saddam is in breach of are there for a purpose. He [Saddam Hussein] is without any question, still trying to develop that chemical, biological, potentially nuclear capability and to allow him to do so without any let or hindrance, just to say, we [sic] can carry on and do it, I think would be irresponsible."

141. In terms of the specifics of Iraq's WMD, Mr Blair made a number of comments including:

- "… there is no doubt that at some point the Iraqi regime were trying to develop nuclear weapons … I believe that there is evidence that they will acquire nuclear weapons capability if they possibly can."
- "Now we will provide what support we can for that, although of course the absence of inspectors … means there is necessarily a limit. But I don't think we should be in any doubt about the nature of this regime, they will acquire whatever weapons they possibly can."
- "Certainly they were trying to obtain a nuclear weapons capability. I think there is some evidence that they continued to do so."
- "… [W]e don't really know what is happening now, there are huge amounts of stocks of chemical, biological weapons unaccounted for."
- "… [W]e can't be quite sure what is happening on the nuclear side … but on the biological and chemical weapons side there is no doubt about it, there are vast stocks of these weapons unaccounted for by the previous weapons inspectors."
- "And in addition there is real concern that there is ballistic missile technology."

142. Mr Blair suggested that the reason Iraq might not be letting inspections take place was because "the last time the inspectors were in there, they uncovered so much that the Iraqi regime was deeply embarrassed". He also argued that people would "think about it differently once they see the evidence".

143. Mr Campbell wrote in his diary on 3 September:

> "The hardest [question] was: 'Why now? What was it that we knew now that we didn't before that made us believe we had to do it now?' It was not going to be at all easy to sell the policy in the next few months …"[59]

144. Mr Campbell added that announcing the publication of the dossier would "raise expectations massively. Today was about beginning to turn the tide of public opinion and it was going to be very tough indeed."

145. The Inquiry asked Mr Blair for a statement addressing whether, before his press conference in Sedgefield, he had refreshed his memory in relation to the 15 March 2002 JIC Assessment, 'The Status of Iraqi WMD Programmes'.[60]

146. In his statement, Mr Blair wrote:

> "The basis for the statements I made on the issue of Saddam and WMD were based, of course, on the JIC Assessments and on the whole history of Saddam and WMD going back over many years, including his use of chemical weapons, the findings of previous UN inspectors, his well documented attempts at concealment.
> "… [F]or my press conference at Sedgefield … I requested and received a special briefing from the FCO. I would probably also have re-read the JIC report of 15 March 2002 and the list of unaccounted for items from the UNSCOM reports. I draw attention to the first part of the [FCO] briefing of 2 September 2002, in particular to the reference that 'we believe that Iraq has recently accelerated its weapons programme'; 'increased nuclear procurement'; and to the fact that UN inspectors in 1998 'were unable to account for thousands of tonnes of so-called precursor chemicals'."[61]

147. As Section 4.1 sets out, the decision to produce a document for publication setting out the facts on WMD in relation to countries of concern, including Iraq, was taken in mid-February 2002 and was briefed to the press shortly thereafter.[62]

148. Speculation about the publication of a document on Iraq's WMD and its significance in relation to a decision about military action against Iraq had continued throughout the spring and summer of 2002.

149. On 16 July, No.10 decided to put publication on hold and that further decisions would be needed on its precise form.[63]

150. On the same day, Mr Blair had told the Liaison Committee that if policy on Iraq moved into a new phase, a document would be published.[64]

151. Asked what had led to his change of mind in early September and the decision to publish the dossier, Mr Blair told the Hutton Inquiry:

> "What changed was really two things which came together. First … there was a tremendous amount of information and evidence coming across my desk as to the weapons of mass destruction and the programmes … that Saddam had.
> "There was also a renewed sense of urgency, again, in the way that this was being publicly debated …
> "President Bush and I had a telephone call towards the end of that [August] break and we decided … we really had to confront this issue, devise our strategy and get on with it and I took the view … that we really had to disclose what we knew or as much as we could of what we knew."[65]

152. Mr Blair added: "The aim of the dossier was to disclose the reason for our concern and the reason why we believed this issue had to be confronted."

153. Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that Mr Blair:

> "… wanted to publish information as he saw it was because he thought it was important that the public were as aware as possible of the pressures that he had seen coming across his desk."[66]

154. Mr Campbell told the Inquiry that the decision to bring forward the publication of the dossier was a way of trying to calm the situation.[67] Mr Blair had wanted "to set out for the public, in as accessible a way as possible, the reasons why he had become more concerned" about Iraq.

155. In his memoir, published in 2010, Mr Blair wrote:

> "One other rather fateful decision was taken at that time. Reasonably enough, people wanted to see the evidence on Saddam and WMD. This evidence was contained in intelligence. It was not practice, for obvious reasons, to disclose intelligence. We decided we had to do it. Many times afterwards, I regretted the decision. The 'dossier', as it was called, later became the subject of the most vicious recrimination and condemnation. In reality, it was done because we could see no way of refusing it, given the clamour for it. The very unprecedented nature of it was, however, part of the problem. Both opponents and supporters of the war were urging us to share with the public the evidence we had."[68]

156. In his memoir, published in 2012, Mr Straw wrote:

> "Earlier in the summer there had been a mounting and understandable clamour for more and more explanation about why we and the US were now taking the threat from Iraq so much more seriously than we had before 9/11. People assumed we must know much more than we were letting on. Through the CIA [Central Intelligence Agency], SIS and the other agencies, we did … have access to what we believed to be reliable intelligence about Saddam's continuing intentions in respect of his banned weapons. The mistake we made – on both sides of the Atlantic – was to believe that the best way to respond was to include a declassified summary of some of the intelligence in the dossier."[69]

157. Mr Blair's announcement galvanised thinking on the draft Iraq dossier.

158. On 2 September, in response to a discussion with Mr Rycroft about "the need for a capping piece for the Iraq dossier currently sitting on the shelf", Mr McKane provided a draft, which set out "the argument for effective action against Saddam Hussein".[70]

159. Mr McKane concluded:

> "If you or David think the draft is worth developing and refining, the next step would be for me to circulate it … We should also, as you and I agreed, be considering whether there is more up to date material which could be incorporated in the dossier itself."

160. The draft referred to the general threat from the spread of chemical and biological weapons and stated that Saddam Hussein's regime was a "particularly dangerous example" of that general threat because of "his track record and his continuing flouting of international norms of behaviour. That is why it is so important to deal now with the threat he represents."

161. The draft also stated:

- Since 1998, the UN had "tried repeatedly to persuade Saddam to comply" with his obligations, but he had sought "At every turn … to divert attention from his failure to comply." The "only reasonable explanation" for that "prevarication" was that "he has something to hide, something he is unwilling to give up".
- "… [W]e cannot wait for ever for the right answer from Saddam, when all the time he is engaged in work on weapons which could threaten our [sic] own population and certainly the population of his neighbours. If we were to do so, particularly after 11 September, and our patience were to be rewarded with another devastating attack, we would rightly be castigated for our inaction."

[70] Minute McKane to Rycroft, 2 September 2002, 'Iraq'.

- The facts in the dossier "as a whole" presented a picture of a regime which was "so opposed to international norms of behaviour that it must be confronted effectively now".

162. Mr Rycroft suggested that Mr McKane should develop the draft.[71]

163. Sir David Manning wrote: "Yes. Let's see what the response is."[72]

164. In his statement for the Inquiry, Mr McKane wrote that Mr Blair:

> "… had decided the dossier should be ready for publication within weeks, in order to explain publicly why effective action had to be taken to counter the threat posed by Iraq. This is brought out in the draft 'capping piece' which I sent to Matthew Rycroft …"[73]

165. Asked about the origins of the capping note, Mr McKane told the Inquiry that it "followed an exchange with either Sir David Manning or Matthew Rycroft in which we agreed that the draft needed something … which would encapsulate the main points".[74]

166. Mr McKane subsequently stated:

> "I suppose what I was doing was trying to answer the question: why should we take action now? So it is related to the shift in approach that was marked by the meeting on 23 July and the greater sense of pace and urgency that was injected thereafter."[75]

167. Following the Sedgefield press conference, Dr Michael Williams, Mr Straw's Special Adviser, wrote to Mr Straw reporting that the Director of the International Institute for Strategic Studies (IISS) had informed him that it would be publishing its dossier on the threat posed by Iraq's possession of weapons of mass destruction and past practices of deception in relation to UN inspections.[76] Dr Williams thought that it would "be helpful in moving towards a more informed debate about Iraq which is long overdue".

168. Commenting on the draft UK dossier, Dr Williams wrote that he shared many of Mr John Williams' views:

> "The text I've seen is not significantly different from one I saw in late Spring.
> "It is certainly not a 'killer' dossier. The material is often poorly presented and would benefit from professional editing to make it a sharper assessment.

I am surprised that we do not have stronger material … We need, I believe, to regard the publication of the strongest material as a political imperative."

169. Mr McKane wrote to Mr Stephen Wright, FCO Deputy Under Secretary Defence and Intelligence, on 4 September asking the FCO to renew the chapters in the dossier it had produced on 'Human Rights Abuses' and the 'History of Weapons Inspections' to "ensure they are as up to date and hard hitting as possible".[77]

170. Mr McKane stated that Mr Scarlett had "already started work to refresh the WMD chapter" and asked for comments on the draft capping piece.

171. Sir David Manning replied:

"This looks good.

"Let's point out that there has been no monitoring since ?1998 when the inspectors were expelled in violation of UNSCRs."[78]

172. The Assessments Staff had already sought more information from the DIS.[79]

173. The DIS provided additional material on:

- missile numbers on 4 September;[80]
- "Nuclear Weapons" on 5 September;[81]
- WMD funding on 6 September;[82] and
- chemical facilities on 6 September.[83]

The FCO position on the problem posed by Iraq

174. The FCO was also developing a script addressing why the problem of Iraq's WMD, unlike the programmes of other countries, including Iran, could not be resolved through containment and diplomacy.

175. The argument relied on Saddam Hussein's past behaviour and his continuing refusal at that time to admit weapons inspectors as required by resolution 1284 (1999).

176. With its advice to No.10 on "possible UNSCRs and a game plan for securing them" of 4 September, which is addressed in Section 3.4, Mr Straw's Private Office also provided:

- a "script on why the problem of Iraqi WMD was being treated differently from other WMD programmes"; and
- a "note setting out the broader problem of WMD proliferation and the action we are taking to tackle it".[84]

177. The script on Iraq's WMD stated that there were:

> "… particular concerns about Iraq's WMD programmes. Since Iraq's persistent obstruction forced the UN Inspectors to leave in 1998, Iraq has maintained its chemical and biological weapons programmes, and is developing ballistic missiles capable of delivering them to targets beyond the 150km limit imposed by the UN for defensive systems."

178. The "key differences between Iraq and other countries such as Iran and North Korea" were that:

- Saddam Hussein had used WMD.
- UNSCOM had uncovered the scale of his programmes.
- Iraq had "been shown to have broken every commitment it has ever made under the NPT [Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons] and BTWC [Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention] (it is not a member of the CWC [Chemical Weapons Convention])".
- Iraq was "in flagrant violation" of 14 UN Security Council resolutions relating to its WMD and missile programmes, and was in violation of nine of the remaining 13 obligations on other issues.

179. The script added that the UK approaches "to Iraq and to other governments with WMD programmes of concern" were "fundamentally identical": political and diplomatic engagement. But:

> "… in the case of Iraq, the diplomatic route has been constantly obstructed by Saddam's intransigence and duplicity, and has been blocked altogether since Inspectors left in 1998 – leaving us no alternative but to consider other options."

180. The note, 'Proliferation of WMD: The Wider Context', described the "wider problem of the proliferation of WMD and long-range missiles" and "An additional increased concern since 11 September 2001" that international terrorists would obtain WMD. Iraq, Iran, North Korea, Libya and Syria were identified as "priorities for counter-action … (as the most likely to pose a threat to the UK, our allies, or deployed UK forces)".

---

[84] Letter Sedwill to Manning, 4 September 2002, 'Iraq' attaching Paper 'Iraq: UNSC Action' and Note, 'Proliferation of WMD: The Wider Context'.

181. The note stated:

- The UK was "keen to raise awareness of the WMD and missile threat beyond the US/UK partnership, to draw others into closer co-operation in countering the threat".
- "[M]ain efforts over the past year" had been directed "at key EU partners – particularly the French and Germans".
- The UK was the US "partner of choice in countering WMD and missile proliferation".
- The US Administration was "clearly more interested in deploying tools at the robust end of the spectrum", including "direct action", rather than "diplomatic processes to strengthen the treaty regimes or build wider multilateral consensus against proliferation".

182. Mr Tim Dowse, Head of FCO Counter-Proliferation Department in 2002, told the Inquiry that, in a paper on counter-proliferation strategy produced in July/August 2002, Iraq was viewed as a priority because it might be "the exception to the broader rule that WMD programmes are generally acquired for defensive purposes".[85]

183. Mr Dowse added that it had been the political context which made Iraq a priority.

184. In a subsequent private hearing, Sir William Ehrman, FCO Director International Security in 2002, told the Inquiry that the paper, approved by Mr Blair in August 2002, stated:

> "In country programme terms, our top CP [counter-proliferation] priorities are:
> "Iraq – because its WMD may be the exception to the rule that such programmes are usually driven by defensive needs and, more importantly, are the most likely to be deployed against UK forces and those of our allies."[86]

185. Asked if the "threat from WMD from Iraq" would have continued to be contained if sanctions had been maintained, Mr Dowse told the Inquiry:

> "… the nuclear threat would have been contained and there would have been constraints on his other activities, although we believed he was making progress with missiles, with chemical and biological weapons, despite the constraints.
>
> "The problem was … we did not have high confidence that the sanctions regime would be maintained …"[87]

186. Mr John Williams produced advice on a media strategy for Iraq on 4 September.

187. In response to a request from Sir Michael Jay, Mr John Williams provided advice on a media strategy for Iraq on 4 September.[88]

188. Mr Williams advised that there was a lot to be done, but it could be done "with simple arguments and plain language". Mr Blair's press conference had shown that the media landscape could be changed "in a way that separates the hard core critics from the doubters who are open to persuasion". The key would be to "put the burden of the argument on to Iraq and on the critics":

> "Detailed facts will be necessary but not enough.
>
> "We should make the case with conviction … The tone … should reflect difficult choices, which on balance leave us no alternative but to protect the peace and stability we have come to take for granted … The public … needs to feel it shares a sense of reaching a point where minds have to be made up … In the end, it will come down to an appeal for the public's trust that the Prime Minister has got a big judgement right in circumstances where there is no easy answer."

189. The means of dealing with Iraq were "not yet decided".

190. Mr Williams set out the elements of a possible argument:

- The Iraqi regime was a "uniquely dangerous example" of a threat to peace.
- Saddam Hussein's record was "a challenge to the whole international community".
- The "harsh facts have to be faced, and addressed, whether or not we are able to deal with the threat by asserting the authority of the United Nations, whether or not military force becomes necessary".
- The threat would not go away, it would "become more dangerous".
- The events of 11 September 2001 had shown that distant threats could not safely be ignored.
- Saddam Hussein had in the past provided a safe haven for terrorists.

191. There was a "need to stress the general threat Iraq poses to international peace and stability, as well as the direct and specific threat of its WMD being used against us". Mr Williams also cited Saddam Hussein's human rights abuses.

192. Mr Williams stated that the "evidence dossier" was:

> "… unlikely to be enough by itself to win the argument: it will convince persuadable opinion only if launched in the right environment, framed by a broad case that establishes Iraq as a threat to international peace and security. There is no 'killer fact' in the dossier which 'proves' that Saddam must be taken on now, or this or that weapon will be used against us.

[88] Minute Williams [John] to PS/PUS [FCO], 4 September 2002, 'Iraq Media Strategy'.

> "But it does make a convincing case that Iraq has been trying to recruit people for a nuclear weapons programme and to acquire materials usable in such a programme; and that it has been trying to extend the range of some missiles in breach of Security Council resolutions. These are too deeply buried … there is too long a prologue on what was happening before the inspectors were withdrawn. The dossier should either be re-structured, and perhaps pared down, or have an executive summary."

193. Mr Williams warned that the exercise would be "counter-productive" if the media was allowed to "trap" the Government "into having to provide 'proof' to Appeal Court standards". The focus should be on an audience that knew we could not have "certain knowledge of what is going on inside a closed tyranny", but would:

> "… take seriously a careful assessment which avoids over-statement and appeals to people to trust the judgement of those taking the decisions … understand that intelligence is partial, dangerous to acquire and limited in what it is safe to put out in public. If the dossier is judged by these … standards it will be worth doing."

194. Mr Williams also addressed the possible timing of publication depending on whether "the UN route" was agreed, and the need for a longer-term strategy for Iraq. He concluded that Mr Blair's press conference had already had an impact, with a Sky poll showing "48 percent favour military action, with 52 percent against". This suggested that public opinion was more fluid than the critics believed.

Mr Campbell's meeting, 5 September 2002

195. Sir David Manning commissioned Sir Richard Dearlove to examine whether SIS had material for inclusion in the dossier.

196. Sir Richard Dearlove told the Hutton Inquiry that Sir David Manning had telephoned him on the morning of 4 September and they had:

> "… discussed … to what extent it would be possible to put intelligence from my service into the public domain; and I said that I thought it would be possible … but I would insist on grounds of source protection on having the last word in withholding material from publication, if necessary."[89]

197. In a discussion on 5 September, Sir Richard Dearlove told Mr Straw that SIS had new material for which the sourcing was "strong but indirect" which might be used in the dossier. There might also be a "significant increase of relevant intelligence" before publication of the dossier on 25 September.[90]

198. Sir Richard also told Mr Straw that the draft dossier "was weakened by the JIC doctrinaire approach to its drafting". It would be "better if SIS made its own in-house judgements on the release of material from sources". SIS had established a team that was working on the text, which would be speaking to Mr Scarlett about the re-draft (of the dossier) on 6 September.

199. Sir Richard Dearlove agreed that Mr Straw could tell Mr Campbell about the SIS drafting exercise.

200. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that Mr Straw told him on 5 September that he had seen Sir Richard, who "had agreed to go through all the relevant material [for the dossier]".[91]

201. Asked what his comment about the draft being weakened by the JIC's doctrinaire approach had meant, Sir Richard Dearlove told the Inquiry:

> "Good question. I mean, the answer is I have seen this reference and I'm not sure. There must be something specific that that refers to. It must be something to do with material from one of our sources and how it was presented. I'm sorry. I mean, I'm sure if you searched long and hard enough in SIS records, we could turn it up, but it would be difficult, I think. I'm really not sure what that is."[92]

202. A revised structure for the dossier was agreed at a meeting chaired by Mr Campbell on 5 September, which also decided that Mr Scarlett and Mr Miller would lead the work.

203. Mr McKane wrote to Mr Campbell on 4 September with suggestions for the agenda of the meeting to be chaired by Mr Campbell the next day "to discuss how to take forward" Mr Blair's decision to publish the dossier.[93]

204. The suggested agenda comprised:

- Timetable for publication
- The shape of the Dossier – ie should all three chapters be published together?
- Arrangements for allowing the US Government the opportunity to comment on our documents
- Press lines to be used in connection with the IISS report to be published on Monday 9 September …"

205. Mr McKane wrote that he was sending Mr Campbell "the latest version of the Dossier – though John Scarlett's people are doing further work on the WMD chapter". Mr Campbell had already been sent the "first draft of a capping piece to answer the question: 'Why Now?'"

206. The version of the dossier sent to Mr Campbell was the 20 June draft of the dossier sent to Sir David Manning and others, including Mr Campbell, on 21 June; it did not include the later draft of the WMD paper produced by Mr Scarlett in mid-August.

207. Mr Campbell's meeting on 5 September was attended by Sir David Manning, Mr Scarlett, Mr Miller, Mr McKane, Mr Desmond Bowen, who was about to succeed Mr McKane, Mr Wright, Mr Chaplin, Mr John Williams and Mr Paul Hamill, Communication and Information Centre (CIC).[94]

208. Reporting the outcome of the meeting to Mr Powell, Mr Campbell wrote:

- There would be a "substantial rewrite" with Mr Scarlett and Mr Miller "in charge".
- The structure would be "as per TB's [Mr Blair's] discussion".
- It had been agreed that there had to be "real intelligence material" in the document.
- Mr Scarlett would take the draft to the US on Friday 13 September.[95]

209. Commenting on the meeting, Mr Campbell wrote that the dossier:

> "… had to be revelatory and we needed to show that it was new and informative and part of a bigger case. John Williams … was offering to write it full time. John Scarlett was clearly aware of the responsibility, he was so serious … He warned us that there was very little re nuclear."[96]

210. Following the meeting, Mr Miller recorded the agreement on a revised structure for the dossier, and who would be responsible for action on each of the seven sections:

- Section 1: Background to the bloody nature of Saddam's regime. How he gained and retains power. [Action: FCO/MED]
- Section 2: Saddam's use of power … Human rights abuses. [Action: FCO/MED]
- Section 3: Short link section covering the international community's demand to dismantle Iraq's WMD capability … to ensure Iraq's regional ambitions did not cause further instability. [Action: Assessments Staff]
- Section 4: Effects of using WMD and ballistic missiles. Why the international community was right to be concerned then and why we are still concerned now. [Action: Assessments Staff]
- Section 5: The history of UN weapons inspections. What UNSCOM found? What the Iraqi's [sic] subsequently admitted. History of concealment and obstruction (including the withdrawal of UNSCOM and the failure to co-operate with UNMOVIC. What remains unaccounted for? [Action: Assessments Staff]

Use of illicit funding and circumvention of 'Oil-for-Food' arrangements. What is the threat posed by Iraq's on-going WMD programmes? [Action: Assessments Staff]
- Section 7: Why we cannot continue to rely on containment and why we should act now. Future intentions. [Action: FCO/MED]"[97]

211. Mr Miller wrote that much of the work was seen as "cutting and pasting" existing material, and that the Communications and Information Centre (CIC) had "offered to … co-ordinate the various inputs and produce a revised draft of the dossier". That would be discussed at a meeting on 10 September.

212. Mr Sebastian Wood, Counsellor, British Embassy Washington, wrote that Mr Scarlett had told him:

- Mr Blair wanted the paper on "what Saddam has been doing since 1998 and how we currently assess his WMD programmes" to be "as intelligence-rich and convincing in detail as possible", and Mr Scarlett expected to be "able to 'break out' some current intelligence".
- Mr Scarlett would come to Washington with a draft and Sir David Manning wanted the Embassy to tell the US that Mr Scarlett had been "designated" by Mr Blair to take the dossier forward".[98]

213. Mr Williams suggested revising the "capping piece" for the draft dossier.

214. On 5 September, Mr Williams sent Mr McKane a revised version of the draft capping piece for the dossier, which he described as offering "suggestions" on how it might be amended to "make the document easier for Ministers to defend in interviews".[99]

215. Mr Williams' changes included reference to Saddam Hussein's regime being "uniquely" dangerous and that it had a "capacity for aggression". He also described the material in the dossier as "our best publishable assessment" of the facts.

216. Mr McKane told the Inquiry that his only recollection of an exchange with Mr Williams on the dossier was of his comments on the draft capping note "which were designed … to improve the draft and make … it read better".[100]

217. Mr McKane stated that his draft was "overtaken by the decision to move responsibility" for the dossier, from OD Sec to the Assessments Staff when it was decided that it would be "more overtly an intelligence-based document".[101]

218. Mr Williams produced a draft executive summary for the dossier over the weekend of 7 to 8 September.

219. Mr Williams wrote to Mr Campbell on 6 September saying that he had spoken to Mr Straw and Sir Michael Jay about the "the media-friendly editorial job that will need to be done when John Scarlett and his team have produced the dossier".[102] They were "happy" for him "to devote whatever time necessary" to work on the draft and he would be able to work full time on it (from the week beginning 16 September).

220. Mr Williams added that it would, in his view, "be good for the Foreign Office if we could do it that way". He also offered a press officer with a "very good eye for the kind of material which works with the media", to work with Mr Scarlett and his team "on producing the right kind of material".

221. In his statement for the Inquiry, Mr Williams wrote that at Mr Campbell's meeting on 5 September:

> "It was clear that no decision had been taken about who would produce the dossier. John Scarlett said that intelligence had no experience of writing documents for publication and would need the help of a 'golden pen'. He turned to me. Alastair Campbell did not take this up. At the end of the meeting I asked Alastair what his intention was. He said he was inclined to give the task to the No.10 Strategic Communications Unit.
> "When I reported this … to the Foreign Secretary and Michael Jay, they were clear that the dossier must be produced by the Foreign Office, not No.10, and I should be the 'golden pen'."[103]

222. Mr Williams added that he was "still sceptical of the whole idea", but the "dossier was going to happen". He was about to accompany Mr Straw to the UN General Assembly in New York, so he asked Mr Scarlett:

> "… if he would like to give me the material he intended to use, so that I could show him how to produce it in publishable form. I did this over the weekend. It was a routine job of taking the strongest points and putting them in an executive summary, while taking care to reflect their content accurately, and introducing them with the sort of language that was familiar from speeches and interviews given by … [Mr Blair and Mr Straw]."

223. Mr Williams stated that the "result was underwhelming", that there was "nothing much new", and that his "feeling that this was not a good idea persisted".[104] He had been "relieved" when he heard that No.10 had decided that Mr Scarlett would write the dossier.

224. The document which Mr Williams produced was released by the FCO in February 2008 in response to a Freedom of Information request.[105]

225. Mr Williams told the Inquiry:

> "Some journalists have detected similarity between the shape of my effort and the finished product, but it would have been surprising if an organisation which had never produced a public document [had] not taken some pointers from a professional."[106]

226. Following Mr Campbell's meeting on 5 September, four drafts of the dossier were prepared and circulated for comment to JIC members and other officials in the FCO, the MOD, the Cabinet Office and the Intelligence Agencies, on 10, 16, 19 and 20 September. Each is addressed later in this Section.

Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush, Camp David, 7 September 2002

227. In a press conference before the discussions at Camp David Mr Blair stated that Iraq had to be dealt with. The purpose of the meeting with President Bush was to work out the strategy.

228. Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush at Camp David on 7 September, and the press conference which preceded the meeting, are addressed in Section 3.4.

229. In the press conference, Mr Blair stated:

> "The point I would emphasise … is the threat from Saddam Hussein and weapons of mass destruction, chemical, biological, potentially nuclear weapons capability, that threat is real. We only need to look at the report from the International Atomic [Energy] Agency this morning[107] showing what has been going on at the former nuclear site to realise that. And the policy of inaction is not a policy we can responsibly subscribe to. So the purpose of our discussion today is to work out the right strategy for dealing with this, because deal with it we must."[108]

230. In response to a question, Mr Blair emphasised concern about Iraq's attempts to develop nuclear weapons and the importance of the IAEA report he had mentioned which showed there was "a real issue that has to be tackled here". He stated that, on the way to Camp David, he had been reading "the catalogue of attempts by Iraq to conceal its weapons of mass destruction, not to tell the truth … over a period of years".

[106] Statement, December 2010, paragraph 18.
[107] The IAEA issued a press release (IAEA Press Release 2002/11) on 6 September 2002 stating: "With reference to an article published today in the New York Times, the International Atomic Energy Agency would like to state that it has no new information on Iraq's nuclear weapons programme since 1998 when its inspectors left Iraq. Only through a resumption of inspection … can the Agency draw any conclusion with regard to Iraq's compliance with its obligations … relating to its nuclear activities."
[108] The White House, 7 September 2002, President Bush, Prime Minister Blair Discuss Keeping the Peace.

231. Asked about international support, Mr Blair replied that:

> "… people were asking perfectly reasonable questions … but the one thing no one can deny is that Saddam Hussein is in breach of the United Nations resolutions on weapons of mass destruction … that that poses a threat not just to the region, because there is no way, if those weapons are used, that the threat would simply stay in the region.
>
> "People understand that. Now we have got to make sure that we work out a way forward that, of course, mobilises the maximum support, but does so on the basis of removing a threat that the United Nations itself has determined is a threat to the whole world."

232. The British journalists covering the Camp David meeting focused on the WMD dossier.

233. The Sunday Express anticipated a "Dossier of Doom".[109]

234. An editorial in the News of the World claimed that the dossier would be "as devastating as it is vital". It would show that "evil Saddam has enough chemical and biological stocks to attack the entire planet, and the missile technology to deliver them". It would confirm that he is on the brink of nuclear capability. The editorial concluded: "We believe Mr Blair CAN convince us a military attack on Iraq is right. We have faith in our Prime Minister."[110]

235. In their meeting, Mr Blair told President Bush that he was in no doubt about the need to deal with Saddam Hussein.

236. Mr Blair also set out the need to build a case to persuade the international community of the threat posed by Iraq, including the potential for fusion of WMD and terrorism.

237. During the discussion with President Bush, Mr Blair set out the need to make a good public case against Saddam Hussein, publishing all the evidence. The UK would publish a dossier. He stated that the US and UK:

> "… must build our case, persuading the international community of the nature of the threat. In particular we must get over to our publics the reality that any crisis in the Gulf generated by Saddam would inevitably involve us."[111]

238. Later Mr Blair stated that there was a need to explain the case for action fully to public opinion: "While insisting that no-one wanted war, we must spell out why we had to act." That included reminding people of the horrors of Saddam Hussein's regime.

239. Mr Blair said there was a:

> "… natural reluctance to do difficult things, made worse by ignorance … of Saddam's capabilities and intentions. We had to correct this, at the same time answering the legitimate question of why we were taking action now. 11 September [2001] was a powerful argument for dealing with threats before they materialised … At some point, WMD and terrorism would come together, with appalling consequences, unless we took action."

240. A plenary meeting between President Bush and Mr Blair and their teams followed the restricted discussion.[112]

241. Presentational issues were discussed between officials and in the plenary, including the "Why now?" question.

242. Mr Blair stated that since 1998, there was evidence, including in the 6 September International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) report (see previous comment), of continued development of WMD. He also thought that the nature of the Iraqi regime "should become part of our case on WMD"; and that: "We needed an active strategy to take the debate to the rest of the world." He set out the UK's plans to publish the dossier within a few weeks.

243. Mr Campbell emphasised the need for people "to understand what BW actually did"; and that the "media threshold would be high, so the dossier would need to include new facts from the last four years".

JIC Assessment, 9 September 2002

244. On 9 September, the JIC issued an Assessment of Iraq's possession of chemical and biological weapons and possible scenarios for their use.

245. The Assessment contained a number of significant changes which strengthened previous JIC judgements on Iraq's possession of chemical and biological weapons and the likelihood of their use.

246. In response to the request from Sir David Manning for advice on the possible scenarios for Iraqi use of chemical and biological weapons, the JIC commissioned an Assessment.[113]

247. The Assessment was discussed in "an informal CIG [Current Intelligence Group] of experts" and then considered by the JIC on 4 September.

[113] Minutes, 4 September 2002, JIC meeting.

248. A number of key points were made in the JIC discussion:

- "Once finalised it [the Assessment] would be of immense interest to Ministers and officials, and would help to underline the importance and seriousness of the threat Iraq posed with these weapons. The fact that Saddam Hussein possessed these capabilities, and that he showed every sign of being prepared to use them, was significant."
- "Another important message, which needed to be brought out more clearly in the draft, was that if the chips were down, and Saddam believed his regime to be under real threat of extinction, nothing was going to deter him from using such weapons. Readers of the paper needed to be reminded of Saddam's unpredictability, and of the fact that his thought processes did not work in a recognisably Western rational and logical way."
- "The draft should also distinguish more clearly between the three different ways in which Iraq might use its offensive chemical or biological capabilities: in weaponised form against military targets; in an unconventional attack on military targets; or as part of a sponsored terrorist attack aimed at spreading fear and influencing public attitudes".
- "[S]ince the draft had been written and circulated, an important and valuable supply of new intelligence had been received, from a variety of sources, judged by the producers to be reliable and authoritative. The draft needed to … include this intelligence with an expert assessment of its significance."
- "It [the Assessment] also needed to be clearer which of its judgements were based on firm intelligence, which were based more on informed assessment or interpretation, and where the major gaps in the UK's knowledge and understanding of Iraq's capabilities remained."
- "It was possible that further insights from intelligence would be forthcoming in the relatively near future. These might not only inform any future Assessments but might also need to be reflected somehow in the dossier on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction programmes that was being prepared for publication."

249. Mr Scarlett proposed that the paper should be revised to reflect the discussion and then reviewed "at working level by the relevant experts". Once that was done, the paper would be issued in its final form.

250. The Key Judgements of the JIC Assessment of 9 September stated:

- Iraq has a chemical and biological weapons capability and Saddam is prepared to use it.
- Faced with the likelihood of military defeat and being removed from power, Saddam is unlikely to be deterred from using chemical and biological weapons by any diplomatic or military means.
- The use of chemical and biological weapons prior to any military attack would boost support for US-led action and is unlikely.

- Saddam is prepared to order missile strikes against Israel, with chemical or biological warheads, in order to widen the war once hostilities begin.
- Saddam could order the use of CBW weapons in order to deny space and territory to Coalition Forces, or to cause casualties, slow any advance, and sap US morale.
- If not previously employed, Saddam will order the indiscriminate use of whatever CBW weapons remain available late in a ground campaign or as a final act of vengeance. But such an order would depend on the availability of delivery means and the willingness of commanders to obey."[114]

251. The Assessment stated that it had taken "account of new intelligence that has recently become available on Iraq's intentions". Unusually, it stated explicitly that it had "an intelligence cut off point of 4 September".

252. To provide context, the Introduction to the Assessment stated:

> "Recent intelligence casts light on Iraq's holdings of weapons of mass destruction and on its doctrine for using them. Intelligence remains limited and Saddam's own unpredictability complicates judgements about Iraqi use of these weapons. Much of this paper is necessarily based on judgement and assessment."

253. The JIC added:

> "Iraq used chemical weapons on a large scale during the Iran/Iraq War. Use on the same scale now would require large quantities of chemical weapons and survivable delivery means in the face of overwhelming US air superiority. Iraq did not use chemical weapons during the [1991] Gulf War. Intelligence suggests that Iraq may have used the biological agent, aflatoxin, against the Shia population in 1991. We do not believe that Iraq possesses nuclear weapons and there is no intelligence that Iraq is currently interested in radiological dispersal devices."

254. Other key elements of the Assessment are set out in the Box below.

JIC Assessment, 9 September 2002: 'Iraqi Use of Chemical and Biological Weapons – Possible Scenarios'

Chemical and biological capabilities

"Based on intelligence on the nature of Iraqi CBW weapons, known delivery means, continuing procurement activity, and experience from previous conflicts", the JIC judged:

- Iraq currently had available "either from pre Gulf War stocks or more recent production, a number of biological warfare (BW) and chemical warfare (CW) agents and weapons".

[114] JIC Assessment, 9 September 2002, 'Iraqi Use of Chemical and Biological Weapons – Possible Scenarios'.

- "following a decision to do so, Iraq could produce significant quantities of mustard agent within weeks … [and] the nerve agents sarin and VX within months (and in the case of VX … may have already done so)".
- Production of VX and sarin would be "heavily dependent on hidden stocks of precursors, the size of which are unknown".
- Iraq could produce "more biological agents within days".
- "the commencement of large-scale production of chemical and biological agents would probably go undetected, and a decision to do so may already have been taken. The location of production facilities is unknown."
- Even if stocks of weapons were "limited", that would "allow for focused strikes against key military targets or for strategic purposes (such as a strike against Israel or Kuwait)".
- Iraq "could deliver CW and BW agents by a variety of means including free fall bombs, airborne sprays, artillery shells, mortar bombs and battlefield rockets".
- Iraq had told UNSCOM that it had "filled 25 warheads with anthrax, botulinum toxin and aflatoxin" for the Al Hussein missile and "developed 50 chemical warheads" for the missile.
- Iraq retained "up to 20 Al Hussein and a limited number of launchers".
- "One intelligence report suggests that Iraq has 'lost' the capability to develop warheads capable of disseminating chemical and biological agent and that it would take six months to overcome the 'technical difficulties'".
- "an emergency operational capability with conventional warheads" was "probably available" for the Al Samoud and Ababil-100 short-range ballistic missiles.
- "Iraq may have other toxins, chemical and biological agents we do not know about".
- "the effectiveness of any CBW attack would depend on the method of delivery, concentration of the target, dissemination efficiency, meteorological conditions and the availability of suitable defensive counter measures".

"Other recent intelligence" indicated that:

- "production of chemical and biological weapons is taking place;
- Saddam attaches great importance to having CBW, is committed to using CBW if he can and is aware of the implications of doing so. Saddam wants it to dominate his neighbours and deter his enemies who he considers are unimpressed by his weakened conventional military capability;
- Iraq has learned from the Gulf War the importance of mobile systems that are much harder to hit than static sites. Consequently Iraq has developed for the military, fermentation systems which are capable of being mounted on road-trailers or rail cars. These could produce BW agent;
- Iraq has probably dispersed its special weapons, including its CBW weapons. Intelligence also indicates that chemical and biological munitions could be with military units and ready for firing within 20-45 minutes."

Intentions for use

"Intelligence indicates that Saddam has already taken the decision that all resources, including CBW, be used to defend the regime from attack. One report states that Saddam would not use CBW during the initial air phase of any military campaign, but would use CBW once a ground invasion of Iraq has begun. Faced with the likelihood of military defeat and being removed from power, we judge that it is unlikely there would be a way to deter Saddam from using CBW."

The JIC judged that "several factors could influence the timing of a decision … to authorise the use of CBW weapons":

"• the availability of stocks of CW and BW agents;
- the survivability of … delivery means … Once a military campaign is under way the pressure will increase to use certain assets before they are destroyed;
- the survivability of command and control mechanisms … Intelligence indicates that Saddam's son Qusay may already have been given authority to order the use of CBW … Saddam may … specify in advance … the specific conditions in which unit commanders should use these weapons e.g. once Coalition Forces have crossed a particular geographical line;
- the reliability of the units … Late in any campaign commanders may not be prepared to use CBW if they judge that Saddam is about to fall."

The JIC also examined possible scenarios for the use of CBW weapons.

- Before a conflict – The JIC stated that the aim "would be to incapacitate or kill Coalition troops in their concentration areas. Intelligence indicates that … Bahrain, Jordan, Qatar, Israel and Kuwait" had been identified as targets. "Turkey could also be at risk. Both chemical and biological weapons could be used … But the use of CBW weapons carries serious risks and Saddam will weigh up their military utility against the political costs. Use … would expose the lies and deception … The early, widespread use of CBW or non-lethal agents would affect Coalition military planning … On balance however we judge that the political costs of using CBW weapons would outweigh the military advantages and that Saddam would probably not use CBW … pre-emptively."
- During the ground phase – "There is no intelligence on specific Iraqi plans for how CBW would be used in a conflict. Large numbers of chemical munitions would need to be used to make a battlefield impact. BW could also be used although it is less effective as a tactical weapon … But the use of even small quantities of chemical weapons would cause significant degradation in Coalition progress and might contribute to redressing Coalition conventional superiority … Iraq could make effective use of persistent chemical agents to shape the battlefield … by denying space and territory to Coalition Forces. Booby-traps and improvised explosive devices could be used … to inflict local losses in urban areas. It is also possible that Saddam would seek to use chemical and biological munitions against any internal uprising; intelligence indicates that he is prepared to deliberately target the Shia population. One report indicates that he would be more likely to use CBW against Western forces than on Arab countries."
- Drawing Israel into the conflict – "… One intelligence report suggests that if Saddam were to use CBW, his first target would be Israel. Another … suggests that Iraq believes Israel will respond with nuclear weapons if attacked with CBW or conventional warheads. It is not clear if Saddam is deterred by this threat or judges it to be unlikely in the face of US pressure on Israel not to take such a course of action."

- Unconventional use of CBW – "Although there is no intelligence to indicate Iraq has considered using chemical and biological agents in terrorist attacks, we cannot rule out the possibility. […] Saddam could also remove his existing constraints on dealing with Al Qaida … Intelligence indicates that Saddam has specifically commissioned a team of scientists to devise novel means of deploying CBW."
- "At the death" – "In the last resort Saddam is likely to order the indiscriminate use of whatever chemical and biological weapons remain available to him, in a last attempt to cling on to power or to cause as much damage as possible in a final act of vengeance. If he has not already done so by this stage Saddam will launch CBW attacks on Israel. Implementation of such orders would depend on the delivery means still available, the survivability of the command chain and the willingness of commanders to obey."

255. The JIC acknowledged that much of the Assessment was "necessarily based on judgement and assessment".

256. The Butler Report highlighted that the new judgements relied heavily on inferences made by the JIC in its assessment of recently received intelligence reports.

257. Mr Scarlett told the Hutton Inquiry that the Key Judgements in a JIC Assessment:

> "… represent the formal view of the JIC on the central questions which are being considered in the Assessment itself. They are not a summary of the main points in the text. They are a bringing together and drawing on existing JIC Assessments, a wide body of information which may be outside, much of it open source, secret intelligence, in addition, and other relevant factors, such as past behaviour, past actions and so on."[115]

258. In response to the Intelligence and Security Committee (ISC) report in February 2004, the Government stated that the purpose of the Key Judgements section of JIC Assessments was "to highlight the judgements to be drawn from the intelligence assessed"; it was "not intended to be a summary of the main facts in the paper".[116]

259. The Butler Report stated that the JIC Assessment of 9 September "was prepared in parallel with the Assessment of 21 August", and that:

> "Its tone was set by its first Key Judgement, which reflected a significant change from previous JIC judgements on Iraqi possession of chemical and biological weapons."[117]

260. The first Key Judgement stated:

> "Iraq has a chemical and biological weapons capability and Saddam is prepared to use it."

261. The Butler Report commented:

> "The JIC made clear that much of the [9 September] Assessment was based on its own judgement, drawing on the work done for its Assessment of 21 August. But we were struck by the relative thinness of the intelligence base supporting the greater firmness of the JIC's judgements on Iraqi production and possession of chemical and biological weapons, especially the inferential nature of much of it."[118]

262. Sir John Scarlett explained to the Inquiry that the "relationship between collection, dissemination, comment, analysis, assessment and then policy-making was a subtle one".[119] Intelligence reports were issued by the collection agency and there was the possibility for that agency "to make a comment on the report and very often put it into context compared with what other reports have said on a given subject". Reports were then issued to customers across government "particularly … in the Defence Intelligence Staff who are … an important body of analysts". Those customers played a role in the Current Intelligence Groups, but it was the job of the Assessments Staff to bring it all together into a "big picture assessment".

263. Sir John Scarlett stated that the 9 September Assessment had a "separate judgement on the capabilities which existed"; and that it was not intended to be a worst case scenario. The change was the firm judgement on Iraq's current possession of agents and weapons which:

> "… referred to recent intelligence on the production of weapons now taking place, the development of mobile systems and then, importantly, on the regime and Saddam's intent. The great importance that he attached to the possession of chemical and biological weapons and his readiness to use them if necessary, including to defend the regime from attack.
> "He saw possession as a central feature of his regional power position and continued ability to project influence.
>
> "That intelligence on intent was significant – taken to be significant.
>
> "It was also noted that we did not know specific plans for CBW use in the event of conflict, the location of production facilities, the size of stocks."[120]

[119] Public hearing, 8 December 2009, pages 17-18.
[120] Public hearing, 8 December 2009, pages 39-40.

264. Addressing the judgements that had been reached, Sir John Scarlett stated that it was "not at all unusual for an intelligence base behind judgments to be limited or described as sporadic and patchy". The intelligence received in September was:

> "… judged against a set of standing judgments from the past which I'd been at pains to point out were already quite strong …"[121]

265. Sir John subsequently stated: "We thought there was a sound intelligence base, and we had a firm judgment. That's the point I want to make."[122]

266. Mr Miller added:

> "The discussion on 4 September at the JIC really was one that gelled with the very firm view amongst the community about both the possession and the readiness to use, on Saddam's part, these weapons.
> "We went away, in the light of that discussion, and wrote the paper which is the final Assessment and expressed those views really quite specifically and as very firm judgments which did, I think, pin down the view of the JIC community at that point. It was the moment which sticks with me as being quite an important one in terms of the arrival of new intelligence, and the precipitation of a discussion in the JIC which led to a very firm expression of the judgments it had reached on both possession and intent."

267. In response to a question about the categorical nature of the Key Judgements in comparison with the detailed text in the 9 September Assessment, Sir John Scarlett emphasised the importance of the distinction to be drawn between the strength of the intelligence base on which an Assessment drew and the firmness of the JIC's Key Judgements; and that the JIC had, in September 2002, made "quite firm judgements" despite the limitations in the intelligence.[123]

268. Mr Miller told the Inquiry that the document discussed by the JIC on 4 September:

> "… wasn't a full JIC Assessment, and it was full of … caveated language …
> "In the discussion, the point was made by one of the JIC members that at this stage we should, as a Committee, be very clear on what we were telling Ministers, and there was a view expressed in terms that, despite the caveats in the document prepared by the Assessment Staff, the view was that Saddam did possess the weapons and would be ready to use them, and that was the view that was shared around the JIC table, and which the JIC specifically wanted set out in those terms as the advice that Ministers should read from their intelligence committee.

> "So you are absolutely right to distinguish between the body of the paper and the judgements, but it is a distinction which was made consciously and with deliberation."[124]

269. Sir John Scarlett told the Inquiry that the 9 September Assessment "stayed in place as the confirmed view of the JIC in the months that followed and it didn't change significantly".[125]

270. The Assessments Staff and most members of the JIC were not aware at the time of the details of the sourcing chains and that little of the information provided by "reliable sources" was based on first-hand knowledge.

271. In the context of comments on the intelligence underpinning the judgements in the Assessment of 9 September, the Butler Report stated:

> "… the JIC did not reflect in its Assessment, even if only to dismiss it, material in one of those reports suggesting that most members of the Iraqi leadership were not convinced that it would be possible to use chemical and biological weapons."[126]

272. Commenting on the Assessment, the Butler Review concluded that:

> "By mid-September 2002, therefore, readers of JIC assessments will have had an impression of continuity with, but also some change from, the JIC assessment of 15 March:
> a. The continuing clear strategic intent on the part of the Iraqi regime to pursue its nuclear, biological, chemical and ballistic missile programmes.
> b. Continuing efforts by the Iraqi regime to sustain and where possible develop its indigenous capabilities.
> c. The apparent considerable development, drawing on these capabilities, of Iraq's 'break-out' potential. Although Iraq's nuclear programme continued to be constrained, there was strong evidence of continuing work on ballistic missiles, including the development and production of systems with ranges in excess of limits set by the United Nations. There was also evidence from one source, supported by one complementary report, of Iraq having the ability to produce biological agent in mobile facilities, and additional evidence of activity at one site formerly associated with Iraq's biological warfare programme. Finally, there were recent intelligence reports, albeit mainly inferential, that Iraq was producing chemical agent. For analysts, intelligence on Iraqi production of biological and chemical agent would have been put alongside Iraq's proven ability to weaponise agent onto at least some delivery systems, and separate intelligence reports on Saddam Hussein's intention to use chemical and biological weapons if attacked."[127]

273. The Butler Report stated that the "more definite judgements inside the Assessment" were based on:

"… significant new intelligence in August and September 2002 … Four reports were received in total, from three sources, which were influential … The first provided material from a range of original informants reporting via an intermediary to the source.[128] We have noted, however, that the individual items from the informants did not confirm directly that Iraq had chemical weapons. They came from senior Iraqi officials who were believed at the time to have direct knowledge of Iraq's intentions, use, deployment or concealment of chemical weapons, but were based for most of the informants on an assumption (not direct knowledge) that Iraq had such weapons."[129]

274. The Butler Report added:

"The second and third [reports] were from a source who had previously reported reliably and who continued to do so in the following months. This source, too, could not confirm from direct experience that Iraq had chemical weapons, resting on reporting 'common knowledge' within his circle that chemical agent production was taking place. The second report from this source seems to us to duplicate much of the first."[130]

275. The fourth intelligence report described in the Butler Report:

"… was a single report, from a reliable and established source reporting a new subsource who did not subsequently provide any further reporting, which was described as 'confirming' the intelligence on Iraqi mobile biological agent production facilities received from the liaison service. Contrary to the JIC view at the time, we believe that this report would have been more accurately described as 'complementary' to, rather than 'confirming', it."[131]

276. Mr Miller told the Inquiry that the intelligence reports were from:

- "one established and reliable source, which was quoting senior Iraqi officers, […], about the use of CBW";

- "another one of the very well established sources […] about the determination of the Iraqi regime to have CBW capable missiles, and the reliance on those weapons as being a contributor or an important part of the ability to project power in the region, to establish Iraq as a regional power"; and
- "a reliable source", "about the use of CBW against the Shia population internally".[132]

277. Mr Miller added:

> "So there was a body of reporting by September that was talking not about technical details of production, but about an understanding that these weapons were available, and that there was a clear place for them in Iraq's thinking about how to conduct itself and how to maintain regional influence."

278. Mr Miller concluded:

> "As the Assessment said, the intelligence was patchy. It was sporadic. It didn't flow through in great volumes routinely, particularly prior to the summer of 2002. But I think the sense of the community was that yes, we are not getting a full picture, but we are getting here a pretty consistent picture, even if it is a rather patchy one, sufficient to inform these judgements, but certainly as additional intelligence came through in the course of 2002, the sense was that that did then begin to provide a weightier basis for reaching the conclusions that were set out in September."[133]

279. Asked about the sources, their background and reliability and whether they were providing hearsay evidence, Mr Miller explained:

> "There were different sources. In the Assessment Staff we didn't seek to have expertise in the sourcing of the intelligence. So we relied on rather summary accounts of the sourcing given in the reports, which tended to characterise it as new or established, reliable or not yet proven, and we give some indication of whether the reporting was direct or indirect."

280. Mr Miller told the Inquiry that reporting which influenced the Assessment came from six new reports, "from apparently solid sources".[134]

281. Sir John Scarlett stated that "at the time, the separation of the different streams of reporting wasn't always clear to the Assessment Staff", and that:

> "… with the slight benefit of hindsight, I can say now that essentially we are talking about three different streams of reporting … which were coming through in a two-week period at the time the 9 September Assessment was being prepared and discussed."[135]

282. Sir John stated that:

- the source who had produced "the 45-minute report as well", was "an established and reliable reporting [source], but reporting from a line of … named sub-sources"; and
- that source "was quoting his knowledge" and had been "speaking in very definite terms about their continued possession [of chemical and biological weapons]".[136]

283. The "45 Minute" report "quoting the sub-sources on the intention to use [CBW]" was withdrawn on 28 September 2004 (see Section 4.3).[137] Sir John said he had known "in about May 2004" that there was "a big question mark about that report".

284. In relation to the production of biological agent, Sir John Scarlett stated that a report in early September:

> "… from an established and reliable source … referred to a … fermentation system, which … was judged to be very likely to be a reference to the same general capability and the same focus on mobile production capabilities, and that was referred to in assessments after that as corroboration for the mobile reporting.
> "So a lot of weight was placed upon the reporting […] from that source."[138]

285. Sir John stated that the reporting on mobile production facilities was withdrawn on 29 September 2004.[139]

286. Mr Miller told the Inquiry:

> "… we were the recipients of the intelligence on the basis described and we gave weight to those descriptions, but we didn't try to get underneath the surface of what had led to a conclusion particularly about the reliability of any particular stream."[140]

287. Asked how much the JIC had known about the sources, Mr Miller added:

> "Generally not a great deal. From time to time, when there was a particular source which the agencies attached great weight to, there was some briefing given on why they were attaching particular weight to a source. But it was all at a fairly high level of generality, and there was, for the bulk of the reporting, nothing more than the descriptors on the individual reports."

> "… at that time none of us in the Assessment Staff, including me, knew the details of this sourcing. Nor were we clear how many lines of reporting there were, and I know that because just before the conflict I was asking … how many lines of reporting are we actually talking about? …"[141]

289. The withdrawal, in September 2004, of reporting on Iraq intentions for the use of CBW and earlier reporting on mobile biological production facilities, is addressed in Section 4.3.

IISS Assessment, 9 September 2002

The International Institute for Strategic Studies (IISS) published a dossier, Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction: A Net Assessment, on 9 September.[142]

In his press statement, the Director of the IISS, Dr John Chipman, said that the IISS objective had been "to assess, as accurately and dispassionately as possible, Iraq's current WMD capabilities".[143] The task was challenging: "Iraq made every effort to obscure its past, obstruct dismantlement of its present assets, and retain capabilities for the future."

Other comments made by Dr Chipman included:

- UNSCOM's experience showed that no on-site inspections could succeed "unless inspectors develop an imaginative and carefully co-ordinated counter-concealment strategy".
- UNMOVIC would need "time to develop and refine the unique inspection techniques required" and to develop "considerable field experience to develop the necessary tradecraft to deal with Iraqi obfuscation efforts".
- The "strength of Baghdad's commitment to possess WMD" was "measurable in part by its efforts to resist unfettered UN inspections".

The IISS dossier identified the differences in view amongst experts as to whether Iraq was focused on reconstituting its biological and chemical warfare capabilities or was "prepared to risk detection and re-invest massive resources in pursuit of nuclear weapons".[144] There was, however, "general agreement" that it was "very unlikely to have achieved the ability to produce sufficient fissile material for nuclear weapons". But if Iraq:

> "… were able to acquire sufficient fissile material from foreign sources, it could probably produce nuclear weapons on short order, perhaps in a matter of months. This is based on the plausible assumption that Iraqi designers, working from the 1991 baseline, have been able to complete the preparations for building a nuclear weapon …"

[142] IISS Dossier, 9 September 2002, Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction: A Net Assessment.
[143] IISS Press Statement Dr John Chipman, 9 September 2002, Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction: A Net Assessment.
[144] IISS Dossier, 9 September 2002, Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction: A Net Assessment.

The IISS stated that Iraqi acquisition of fissile material was "not a high probability", but "it has to be seen as a real risk that could dramatically and quickly shift the balance of power".

The IISS regarded Iraq's biological weapons programme as "the least understood and accounted for by 1998". Iraq could "plausibly" have retained substantial quantities of growth media and BW agent. It was "not known for certain" whether Iraq had resumed production of agent, but it seemed "a safe bet that it has, or will, in the face of an impending attack".

The IISS judged that, from Baghdad's perspective, biological weapons presented "Iraq's closest approximation to nuclear weapons as an instrument of deterrence or terror". But, in practice, "the magnitude of Iraq's BW threat depends on its delivery capability, which appears limited".

The IISS stated, however, that even if Iraq had not advanced the designs for missile warheads since 1991, and depending on the agent used and a number of ambient factors, "casualties in an unprotected population could run in the hundreds or even thousands". If Iraqi aircraft could survive opposing air forces and air defences, delivery by airborne spray devices would be "even more deadly".

The IISS described Iraq's chemical weapons arsenal as "better known and less threatening". It had "probably retained a few hundred tonnes of mustard and enough stable precursors to produce a few hundred tonnes of sarin/cyclosarin and perhaps a similar amount of VX". It could have mobilised production facilities to produce fresh CW agent, but its current capability probably comprised "hundreds of tonnes of agent … and perhaps a few thousand munitions". Before 1991 it had had "thousands of tonnes of agent and tens of thousands of effective munitions". Iraq had an ability to "deliver chemical warheads on its rocket and artillery pieces, as well as aerial bombs", but its capability effectively to deliver chemical munitions with missiles or aircraft over longer distances was "questionable". Unless Iraq had advanced its pre-1991 designs, its ability efficiently to disseminate chemical agent with missile warheads was "extremely limited".

The IISS concluded that Iraq most likely had a small force of ballistic missiles, "perhaps a dozen or so", with a range of 650km and capable of delivering CBW warheads.

Finally, the IISS stated:

> "As in the past, the threat or use of force may compel Iraq to extend greater co-operation, but signs of weakness and division in the Security Council are likely to invite Iraqi backsliding …
>
> "Either course of action carries risks. Wait and the threat will grow. Strike and the threat may be used …"

Confirmation of Mr Scarlett's responsibility for producing the dossier

290. On 9 September, it was confirmed that Mr Scarlett and the Assessments Staff would be responsible for the production of the Iraq dossier.

291. After a discussion with Mr Scarlett, Mr Campbell wrote setting out the process by which the dossier would be produced:

> "The first point is that this must be, and be seen to be, the work of you and your team, and that its credibility depends fundamentally on that.
> "The second is that you are working on a new dossier, according to the structure we agreed at the meeting last week, to meet the new circumstances which have developed over recent weeks and months. Therefore, the rush of comments on the old dossier are not necessary or totally relevant. People should wait for the new one which will be more detailed and substantial."[145]

292. Mr Campbell wrote that the structure agreed the previous week was "roughly":

- why the issue arose in the first place
- why the inspection process was necessary
- the history of concealment and deception
- the story of inspectors, leading to their departure
- the story of weapons unaccounted for, and what they could do
- a section on ballistic missile technology
- CW/BW
- nuclear
- the sanctions regime, and how the policy of containment has worked only up to a point
- illicit money
- the repressive nature of the regime
- why the history … makes us worried he cannot be allowed further to develop these weapons."

293. Much of the content of the dossier would be "obviously historical", and that was "a vital part of the overall story". Mr Campbell added:

> "The media/political judgement will inevitably focus on 'what's new?' and I was pleased to hear from you and your SIS colleagues that, contrary to media reports today, the intelligence community are taking such a helpful approach to this in going through all the material they have. It goes without saying that there should be nothing published that you and they are not 100 percent happy with."

---

[145] Minute Campbell to Scarlett, 9 September 2002, [untitled].

294. Mr Campbell also wrote:

> "Our public line is that the dossier will set out the facts which make HMG judge Iraq/WMD to represent a real threat. It will be detailed and comprehensive."

295. Mr Campbell set out the need to avoid leaks and comments to the media which might "talk up the dossier", adding:

> "We should be making clear that even with the intelligence material, the picture can never be a complete one because the inspectors have been out for so long."

296. "[M]ost of the draft material" would be available later that day, "with the Agencies providing the sections relevant to the middle part of our structure [Iraq's chemical, biological, nuclear and ballistic missile programmes], and the FCO providing the more historical material". Mr Scarlett would "want to go through the material before submitting a consolidated draft to No.10 and others".

297. Mr Campbell would "chair a team", including officials from the FCO and No.10, who would "go through the document from a presentational point of view and make recommendations" to Mr Scarlett, who would decide whether they would be incorporated in the dossier.

298. Once Mr Scarlett had reached a view on what would be "incorporated", a "judgement" would be needed on "whether a single person should be appointed to write the final version".

299. Mr Blair had "expressed an interest in seeing an advanced draft". The timing and arrangements for the launch of the document, including the involvement of Mr Blair and other Ministers, were to be addressed once an advanced draft of the document was available.

300. Mr Campbell concluded by referring to US intent to produce "a series of dossiers" and wrote that he was "confident" that the UK dossier could complement rather than conflict with them.

301. Mr Campbell's minute was sent to Mr Straw and Mr Hoon as well as to the intelligence Agencies, Sir David Omand, Security and Intelligence Co-ordinator, and senior officials in the FCO and the MOD.

302. Mr Campbell wrote that he had had a meeting with Mr Scarlett on the dossier before being "joined by three SIS people", and they had "agreed a process for writing the report". He and Mr Scarlett had agreed that "the FCO was trying to take it over", and Mr Scarlett wanted ownership.[146]

303. Mr Campbell also wrote that he told Mr Straw that Mr Williams "should be part of the team, not the writer".

304. In a minute to Mr Blair in June 2003 Mr Scarlett wrote that, following Mr Blair's announcement on 3 September, the structure of the dossier had been discussed between Sir David Manning, Mr Campbell and himself and their respective teams.[147] The purpose of the dossier was "to present a more detailed account of Iraqi capabilities to be placed in the wider context".

305. Mr Scarlett added:

> "Unlike the previous drafts, it would refer specifically to intelligence material. It was agreed that since this would now be an intelligence-based document I, as JIC Chairman, rather than OD Secretariat would be in charge of the process. These agreements were set out in detail in Alastair's note to me of 9 September …"

306. Mr Scarlett added that the drafting of the revised document was co-ordinated by Mr Miller, "working with representatives of Departments, including DIS, SIS, GCHQ, and FCO". The draft had been discussed at "two meetings of two to three hours each" and there had been "numerous exchanges of drafts and constant consultation between the experts concerned". The intelligence Agencies had agreed to the involvement of Mr Daniel Pruce, a Press Officer in No.10, and Mr Williams and others from the FCO Press Office. JIC members were asked to consult Ministers during the drafting process "as appropriate".

307. Mr Scarlett also wrote:

> "The aim was to ensure that the public assessment deployed the intelligence effectively, taking account of the reliability of the information and the demands of source protection."

308. Mr Scarlett told the Hutton Inquiry that he had had a discussion with Mr Campbell before the meeting on 9 September to say that:

> "… it was very important that only one person and one unit had ownership and command and control of this exercise, that that should be me, that I wanted it stated clearly in writing; and I wanted that to be the outcome of the meeting …"[148]

309. Mr Blair told the Hutton Inquiry:

> "… the whole purpose of having the JIC own this document was in order to provide the absolute clarity and certainty … that in the end they were perfectly happy with this. And I think it was … it was essential that anything we said … in the dossier we could hand on heart say: this is the assessment of the Joint Intelligence Committee."[149]

Draft dossier, 10 September 2002

310. A DIS record of a meeting held by Mr Miller on 9 September recorded that the DIS had been asked to address a number of points including:

- "the provision of more detail on Iraq's military capability to use WMD";
- "the provision of more information on the retention of experts and expertise relating to WMD";
- "to provide information if possible on the diversion and attempted illicit procurement of dual-use materials and equipment"; and
- "the provision of a timeline for the development of a nuclear weapon by Iraq if it were to acquire fissile material."[150]

311. Mr Scarlett produced a first draft of the new dossier on 10 September which drew on the 9 September JIC Assessment and the recent intelligence reports about Saddam Hussein's willingness to use chemical and biological weapons. The draft stated that Iraq could deploy such weapons within 45 minutes of the order being given for their use.

312. A first draft of the revised dossier was produced on 10 September and sent to Mr Campbell, Mr Powell, Sir David Manning, Sir David Omand, the Private Secretaries to Mr Straw and Mr Hoon, Mr Desmond Bowen, who succeeded Mr McKane as Deputy Head of OD Sec in the week beginning 9 September, and to Mr John Williams.[151]

313. Mr Scarlett wrote that he had had "considerable help from John Williams and others in the Foreign Office". The draft required further work and he could not confirm that he was "content with the overall tone … and the balance between the main text and the Annexes", but it had "now reached the stage where it would be useful" to have advice on presentation from Mr Campbell. Mr Williams might also offer further views.

314. Mr Scarlett added that the draft drew "on all the available intelligence identified so far". He was "most grateful for the co-operation of the SIS, GCHQ and the DIS in constructing the key section on Iraq's capabilities"; and the drafters continued to "check for any further intelligence for inclusion in the text".

315. Mr Scarlett concluded by asking recipients to "hold the text very tight" and to "continue to refrain from public reference to its contents".

316. The draft Foreword drew heavily on Mr Williams' 5 September revisions to Mr McKane's draft "capping piece".

317. The Executive Summary stated that the paper set out the Government's "knowledge" of Iraq's programmes to acquire weapons of mass destruction, traced their history, and, “Drawing on very sensitive intelligence”, set out the assessment of current capabilities and showed how the picture was “continuing to develop as new information becomes available”.

318. Specifically, the Executive Summary stated that recent intelligence had added to the picture of Iraq’s capabilities and indicted that Iraq:

- attached “great importance to the possession of weapons of mass destruction and that Saddam Hussein is committed to using them if necessary”;
- envisaged “the use of weapons of mass destruction in its current military planning and could deploy such weapons within 45 minutes of the order being given for their use”;
- had “begun dispersing its most sensitive weapons, equipment and material because Saddam is determined not to lose the capabilities developed in the last four years”;
- was “preparing plans to conceal evidence of its weapons of mass destruction from any renewed inspections, including by dispersing incriminating documents”;
- had “acquired mobile laboratories for military use, corroborating earlier report[ing] about the mobile production of biological warfare agents”;
- had “purchased large quantities of uranium ore, despite having no civil nuclear programme that could require it”.

319. The draft comprised six sections:

- Saddam Hussein’s regime and his rise to power;
- Saddam Hussein’s wars;
- Iraq’s WMD programme – the threat in 1991;
- The response of the international community;
- The history of UN weapons inspectors;
- Iraqi chemical, biological, nuclear and ballistic missile programmes: the current position.

320. The section on Iraq’s current capabilities stated:

> “Intelligence plays a central role in informing government policy towards Iraq’s weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missile programmes. The reports are often very sensitive … But, taken with Saddam’s record of using chemical weapons and the evidence from UN weapons inspections, the intelligence builds a compelling picture of Saddam’s capabilities.
> “This section sets out what we now know …”

321. Other statements in the section included:

- Iraq could "deliver chemical and biological agents using an extensive range of artillery shells, free-fall bombs, sprayers and ballistic missiles".
- "Intelligence from reliable and well-informed sources has become available in the last few weeks. This has confirmed that Iraq has chemical and biological weapons and the Iraqi leadership has been discussing a number of issues related to them."
- "[T]he order to produce … chemical and biological agents has been given".
- Intelligence had confirmed that the Iraqi military had acquired mobile facilities to produce biological agent.
- "If Iraq acquired sufficient fissile material from abroad we judge it would take at least two years to make a working nuclear device. However, Iraq could produce an improvised nuclear device within a few months but this would be unreliable."

322. Addressing the specific issue of the use of intelligence "about the deployability of CBW within 45 minutes", Mr Scarlett wrote in his minute to Mr Blair in June 2003:

> "This intelligence came from a line of reporting judged to be reliable and was consistent with standing JIC judgements it was included by the drafters and approved by the JIC. It's [sic] inclusion was not suggested by No.10. The report was highlighted in the same terms in a JIC Assessment of 9 September."[152]

323. Mr Scarlett added that the 9 September Assessment reflected other recently received intelligence and that was "recorded in the dossier under the heading, 'Recent Intelligence'".

THE VIEW OF THE JIC

324. The JIC discussed the dossier on Iraq in its meeting on 11 September, including that:

- the Committee's authority would lend important weight to the dossier's content and enhance its impact; and
- the dossier needed to "convey accurately but dramatically the rising concern about Iraq's weapons programmes" and that recent intelligence had shed light on progress since 1998.

325. Mr Scarlett wrote to JIC members on 10 September asking for comments on an additional section which he had agreed with Mr Campbell "would be considered for inclusion in the 'dossier'".[153] It gave "an account of the JIC assessment of developments in Iraqi WMD programmes since UNSCOM inspectors were withdrawn in late 1998", which would "demonstrate that this question has been the subject of continuous assessment throughout the four years and has been brought to the regular attention of the Government".

326. Mr Scarlett wrote that he "hoped to be able to brief you further at JIC on 11 September" and that he "would particularly welcome your comments on the attachment", which set out key points from relevant JIC Assessments.[154]

327. Mr Scarlett also sent the 10 September draft of the dossier to the members of the JIC on 11 September. Describing it as "very much work in progress", Mr Scarlett wrote:

> "… several sections … are already being rewritten. Nevertheless, you need to see where we have got to. I would be grateful if you could study the intelligence-related sections … and let me or Julian Miller have your views by mid-day tomorrow, if not at this afternoon's JIC. We particularly need advice on any remaining security implications of publishing … We also need to be sure that overall the balance of the judgements remains consistent with those previously reached by the JIC."[155]

328. A member of the DIS expressed concern about the reference in the draft to Iraq producing an improvised nuclear device (IND).[156]

329. The DIS official wrote:

> "As I feared, the whole issue of Iraq considering the development of an IND has gained momentum. I would like to delete all mention of INDs in the dossier, but the CO [Cabinet Office] consider it vital to the picture for no sensible reason. Unfortunately an Iraqi JIC paper referred to it (against DI52 advice) and that is being used as a justification. This will probably grow as the dossier is released to the press, with the result that the spotlight will be diverted from the real, important issues. However, this does not concern the CO. If you have a chance to advise CDI [Chief of Defence Intelligence] before this afternoon's JIC, I would appreciate your support on the removal of all mention of INDs …"

330. The DIS official stated that he had only agreed language saying that Iraq would not go down this route.

331. There is no mention of INDs in the published version of the dossier.

332. A separate email from the same DIS official stated that a member of his team would "not give the idea of an IND time of day" and assessed there were only two scenarios to consider:

> "(a) If Saddam still thinks he has time on his side, he will try to develop a nuclear weapon … Iraq won't succeed while sanctions are in place, and will take at least five years once sanctions are removed …
> "(b) In the last resort – when his regime and he are about to fall with the US infantry on the doorstep, he will use what ever he can do rapidly – eg indiscriminate spreading of CB agents and toxic chemical … One point which I believe everyone has missed in the ridiculous debate on INDs is that there will be one obvious last ditch action that Saddam will take in the spirit of torching the oilfields as he retreated in 1991 … demolish the store of natural and low-enriched yellowcake … in the southern outskirts of Baghdad .. There is no risk of a nuclear blast … However … Saddam would want to play on the irrational fears in Western opinion as he heads for a safe haven. He would, of course, blame … the US …"[157]

333. The DIS official also provided draft language explaining how difficult nuclear weapons were to make.

334. At the JIC on 11 September, Mr Scarlett explained that his "purpose in circulating the draft, and in tabling it for discussion, was to invite comments on its content. In particular on the question of whether or how best to describe or present the work the JIC had done in the last several years to assess Iraq's weapons of mass destruction capabilities and intentions."[158]

335. The minutes record that the main points which were made were:

"a. the part of the draft that looked at what was known or assessed from intelligence was at the heart of the dossier with the potential to have a significant impact. It needed to be as factual as possible, and to convey accurately but dramatically the rising concern about Iraq's weapons programmes. It needed in particular to emphasise the importance of recent intelligence in shedding light on the progress Iraq had made since 1998, and on Saddam Hussein's readiness to deploy and use these weapons;

b. it made good sense both to describe the way that the JIC and the central intelligence machinery had kept Iraq's weapons of mass destruction programme under regular review, and to outline in the main body of the text what the Committee's key judgements or messages to Ministers and policy makers since 1998 had been. The Committee's authority would lend important weight to the dossier's content and enhance its impact. But on balance, to avoid setting unhelpful precedent, it would be better not to quote directly from specific or identified JIC Assessments themselves."

336. It was also suggested that it would be a good idea to keep the Intelligence and Security Committee informed of what was proposed.

337. Mr Scarlett invited Mr Miller:

"… to lead on preparing a revised version of the dossier for further comment, to be circulated later in the week. The new draft would in particular describe the impact of recent intelligence and explain the evolution and significance of the JIC's assessments. The Committee's agreement to the section of the draft dealing with the intelligence assessment would be sought before the dossier was finalised."

338. There is no record of any discussion of the substance of specific points in the draft dossier.

339. Sir Richard Dearlove, Sir Francis Richards, Air Marshal Joe French (Chief of Defence Intelligence), Sir David Omand, Sir David Manning, Mr Simon Webb (MOD Policy Director), Mr Bowen, Ms Eliza Manningham-Buller (Deputy Director General of the Security Service), and Mr Mike Grannatt (Cabinet Office Director General, Government Information and Communication Service (GICS)), were among those present at the meeting.

340. In its discussion of the future work programme, the JIC "agreed that there was an increasing appetite for papers on aspects of the Iraqi question".

341. Mr Scarlett told the Hutton Inquiry that his instructions from the JIC were "to keep what we were writing in line with standing JIC Assessments and also with recent intelligence".[159]

342. Mr Scarlett also stated that the JIC had given its formal agreement to taking on the dossier; and that it had responded with several important points. It wanted the drafters to:

- "… convey the rising level of concern on which the JIC took its view about Iraq's programmes and development of weapons of mass destruction."
- "… in particular … to highlight the progress which was being made since 1998, despite sanctions."
- "… make it clear the JIC assessment that Iraq was ready to use these weapons."
- "… take full account of the recent intelligence which had been coming in."[160]

343. Sir Richard Dearlove told the Hutton Inquiry that he had seen the draft dossier before the JIC meeting, and that it was "normal practice" for him "to be closely briefed" before JIC meetings.[161] He added that the process of producing the dossier had been "covered very closely on a day-to-day basis" by an SIS team, and that he had been "kept closely involved".

344. Asked if any comments from the DIS had been raised on the 45 minutes point at the JIC discussion on 11 September, Sir Richard Dearlove told Lord Hutton on 15 September: "Not that I can recall. It was not raised."[162]

345. An SIS officer, who was not an expert in the issues addressed in the dossier, sent a colleague unsolicited general views about the draft. The officer questioned the language used in the draft, which he thought needed to be more convincing in answering the questions "Why Iraq?" and "Why now?". The minute was also sent to senior managers. It was drawn to the attention of Sir Richard Dearlove, by his Private Secretary, before a meeting with Mr Blair on 12 September.[163]

346. Sir Richard Dearlove's Private Secretary recorded that Sir Richard found the comments useful and timely, and that Sir Richard had drawn on them extensively in his meeting with Mr Blair.[164]

347. The meeting with Mr Blair is addressed later in this Section.

OTHER COMMENTS ON 10 SEPTEMBER DRAFT DOSSIER

348. Mr Bowen pointed out that it was unclear what Saddam Hussein intended to do with any weapons of mass destruction and long-range ballistic missiles.

349. Commenting on the draft dossier of 10 September, Mr Bowen wrote:

- "The bit of the jigsaw that doesn't quite hang together is what Saddam intends to do with the WMD he has been so intent on acquiring. It is one thing to ask the rhetorical question: what could they be used for except making mischief regionally; it is another to be able to point to stated objectives either from the intelligence or public documents. It is, of course, the case that you point to the facts of Saddam's aggression and repression and use of WMD; perhaps we can make more of this and his unpredictability."
- "In looking at the WMD sections, you clearly want to be as firm and authoritative as you can be. You will need to judge the extent to which you need to hedge your judgements with … caveats. I appreciate that this can increase the authenticity of the document in terms of it being a proper assessment, but that needs to be weighed against the use that will be made by the opponents of action who will add up the number of judgements on which we do not have absolute clarity."

- "… [T]here are two key sections … which will need to be given proper prominence … Why Are We Concerned and the Conclusions."
- "I think it would be helpful to draw together the state of advancement of both chemical and biological capability, with military thinking and the delivery means."
- "It would be helpful if there was more about where ballistic missiles are likely to be targeted rather than what countries are in range."[165]

350. Mr Bowen concluded:

> "Finally the question which we have to have in the back of our minds is 'Why Now?'. I think we have moved away from promoting the idea that we are in imminent danger of attack and therefore intend to act in pre-emptive self defence. The approach is rather that Saddam has failed to abide by the UNSCRs and his flouting of international law and continuing acquisition of WMD cannot be tolerated any longer. This difference is important because the focus shifts to Saddam's continuing efforts to equip himself with WMD, which is what the evidence shows."

351. Mr Bowen's comments on the draft Foreword are addressed later in this Section.

352. Asked whether he had felt under pressure to firm up the judgements in the draft as a result of Mr Bowen's comments, Mr Scarlett told the Inquiry that he had "no memory" of seeing the document and no action had been recorded on it.[166]

353. Mr Sedwill asked the UK Permanent Mission in New York for advice on whether the UK should table the dossier in the Security Council in support of a US resolution on Iraq.

354. In advice for No.10 on 27 August, Mr Straw had addressed a possible draft resolution containing an ultimatum to Iraq to readmit inspectors, and what President Bush might say in his speech to the UN General Assembly on 12 September as part of a wider challenge to the UN to demonstrate that it could tackle the problem of WMD in the hands of rogue states.[167] He suggested that a subsequent Security Council discussion might provide "a peg for publishing via the UN the long-awaited 'Iraq Dossier'".

355. On 11 September, Mr Sedwill reported that he had sent the draft dossier to Mr Straw's "party" in New York, to check whether they think it is along the right lines".[168] He had also asked Sir Jeremy Greenstock, UK Permanent Representative to the United Nations in New York, to advise on whether any or all of it might be tabled in the Security Council to support the UK intervention when the US tabled their resolution.

It is clear from the email that the timing of publication was uncertain, and that Mr Sedwill and Mr Campbell had discussed the possibility of publication in the week beginning 17 September.

356. Mr Sedwill commented that the draft was "much better than earlier drafts" and "could move further in the direction of factual analysis". The document needed to "set out the problem, rather than the solution"; people "should conclude that for themselves". He made a number of detailed suggestions for additions and amendments to the draft. His suggestions included:

- The Executive Summary could be "tweaked a bit" to "explain the centrality of WMD" to Saddam Hussein's rule, for example his projection of power.
- "Crucially", Section 2 needed to "explain the role of WMD in the political mythology which has sustained the regime, implicitly why giving it up would amount to a change of regime and how responsibility for WMD rests with those parts of the apparatus on which Saddam depends for his own security. People need to understand that for Saddam giving up WMD is not like a British Govt deciding we don't need Trident any more …"
- Section 3 should be depersonalised "a bit", with references to "the regime" rather than Saddam Hussein.
- The effects of chemical and biological agents could be explained "more vividly".
- Sections 3 and 4 should be combined to "demonstrate more explicitly the link between UNSC [UN Security Council] action and persistent Iraqi obstruction".
- The history of weapons inspections was "an interesting story and would give the media a better feel for the difficulties they faced and the persistence of the Iraqi obstruction". It should be expanded.
- Section 6, setting out the detail of Iraq's programmes, was the "crux" of the dossier and should be as factual as possible.

357. Mr Sedwill subsequently reported that Mr Straw had endorsed his comments and offered a number of additional points.[169]

358. Mr Straw's suggestion that the Foreword should be signed by Mr Blair is addressed later in this Section.

359. A junior official in the UK Permanent Mission to the UN in New York (UKMIS New York) replied that it would "probably be a bit much to deposit the whole report with the Security Council, though we could deposit something like Section 6 if this were felt useful".[170]

360. The official also commented that the draft was "a substantial improvement" and suggested adding a number of points, including:

- "Something showing the elaborate Iraqi apparatus of concealment would demonstrate to just what lengths this government is going to keep its hands on WMD".
- It "would be desirable to give more detail of dodgy procurements … We need to show the lengths Iraq has been willing to go to get its hands on WMD components".
- Explaining why Iraq's unilateral destruction of WMD was of such concern, "ie it allowed Iraq to obscure its WMD stocks and capabilities, eg by claiming to have destroyed more items than was actually the case".

INSTRUCTIONS FROM NO.10

Mr Blair's speech to the TUC, 10 September 2002

In the first section of his speech to the Trades Union Congress (TUC) on 10 September, Mr Blair set out the rationale for tackling the problem of Iraq – "why I say Saddam is a threat that has to be dealt with".[171]

Mr Blair stated that "when the weapons inspectors were evicted from Iraq in 1998 there were still enough chemical and biological weapons remaining to devastate the entire Gulf region". He also stated that Saddam Hussein had a nuclear programme, which he had denied and which had been "disrupted" by inspections. He was in breach of "23 outstanding UN obligations requiring him to admit inspectors and disarm".

361. The Assessments Staff reported that No.10 was understood to want the dossier to be as strong as possible within the available intelligence, subject to it being owned by the Joint Intelligence Committee.

362. On 11 September, Mr Blair wrote to the Speaker of the House of Commons, and to the Lord Chancellor, asking for Parliament to be recalled in the week beginning 23 September (see Section 3.4).[172] Mr Blair wrote:

> "By then, important discussions at the UN will have taken place. And the Government will be in a position to publish the dossier on what we know of the Iraqi regime and its WMD programme."

[172] Letter Blair to Martin, 11 September 2002, [untitled].

363. An email from an official in the Assessments Staff at 1pm on 11 September stated:

> "We have now received comments back from No.10 … Unsurprisingly they have further questions and areas they would like expanded."[173]

364. The official wrote that the "main comments" from No.10 were:

> "1. They liked the use of a specific personality … in the paras on CW. Can we add any more personalities, related to BW, nuclear, BM [ballistic missiles], who are doing jobs now that are suspiciuos [sic] because of their previous role …
>
> "2. Is there any intelligence that Iraq has actively sought to employ foreign experts, in particular in the nuclear field?
> "3. They want more details on the items procured for their nuclear programme – how many did they buy, what does this equate to in terms of significance to a nuclear programme?
>
> "4. Can we say how many chemical and biological weapons Iraq currently has by type! If we cant give weapons numbers can we give any idea on the quantity of agent available!
>
> "I appreciate everyone, us included, has been around at least some of these buoys before, particularly item 4."

365. The official concluded:

> "But No.10 through the Chairman want the document to be as strong as possible within the bounds of avaialable [sic] intelligence. This is therefore a last (!) call for any items of intelligence that agencies think can and should be included."

366. In a postscript, the official added:

> "[…] we have already discussed the continuing need to say something about Iraq's capability to make INDs [Improvised Nuclear Devices] (as per March JIC paper)."

367. The email was not specific about who in No.10 was being quoted or how the message was conveyed.

368. A series of internal emails within No.10 on 10 and 11 September, some of which were written after the email from the Assessments Staff, discussed the approach to be taken in the dossier.

---

[173] Email Assessments Staff [junior official] to "agencies and departments", 11 September 2002, 'Iraqi dossier – Questions from No.10'.

369. Mr Pruce commented on 10 September that he thought the dossier should focus on Saddam Hussein as much as possible and use personal witness statements about Saddam's abuses and quotations from Saddam's speeches. He added:

> "In the public's mind the key difference between this text and the IISS text will be the access to intelligence material I like the idea of a history of JIC Assessments Might we also include a general statement on the nature of the intelligence services and their role …"[174]

370. On 11 September, Mr Pruce wrote:

> "Who will issue the text? Us? The Cabinet Office? Why don't we issue it in the name of the JIC? Makes it more interesting to the media."[175]

371. Mr Pruce suggested that:

- The draft should be personalised onto Saddam "as much as possible".
- The aim should be to "convey the impression that … over the past decade he [Saddam Hussein] has been aggressively and relentlessly pursuing WMD while brutally repressing his own people".
- Wherever there was a reference to weapons, there should be a description of their destructive capacity.

372. Mr Pruce commented that the section on intelligence would be:

> "… the one that readers will go to first. This draft already plays up the nature of intelligence sourcing. I think we could play this up more The more we advertise that unsupported assertions (eg Saddam attaches great importance to the possession of WMD) come from intelligence the better The history of JIC Assessments will help too …"

373. Mr Pruce's comments on the Foreword are set out later in this Section.

374. Mr Philip Bassett, a Special Adviser in No.10, commented:

> "Very long way to go I think … we're in a lot of trouble with this as it stands now".[176]

375. Mr Tom Kelly, the Prime Minister's Official Spokesman, wrote that the draft had "one central weakness", it did "not differentiate enough between capacity and intent":

> "We know he is trying to get WMD – and this shows those attempts are intensifying But can we show why we think he intends to use them aggressively, rather than in self-defence We need that to counter the argument that Saddam is bad, but not mad

We also … need more direct argument on why containment is breaking down In other words, putting the emphasis as much (maybe more) on the present and future, as the past

"The key must be to show that Saddam has the capacity, and is intent on using it in ways that threaten world stability, and that our ability to stop him is increasingly threatened."[177]

376. Mr Rycroft responded:

"yes, part of the answer to 'why now?' is that the threat will only get worse if we don't act now – the threat that Saddam will use WMD, but also the threat that Iraq's WMD will somehow get into the hands of the terrorists […] This all links into the illicit money, since the more funds he has – and his cash pile is growing all the time – the more likely he is to buy fissile material etc".[178]

377. Mr Godric Smith, the Prime Minister's Official Spokesman, wrote:

"I think there is material here we can work with but it is a bit of a muddle and needs a lot more clarity in the guts of it in terms of what is new/old In each area we need to distinguish between the two and better source (as much as we can) to intelligence It needs to be more factual if anything, less assertion based, with the rhetoric stripped out as I think this undermines it".[179]

378. Mr Bassett responded that he agreed with Mr Smith and suggested that the language of the dossier was "too journalistic", it needed to be written "more in officialese" and "much more weight and detail":

"- crucially though, it's intelligence-lite … All intelligence material tends to read like unevidenced assertion, and we have to find a way to get over this a) by having better intelligence material […], b) by having more material (and better flagged-up), and c) more convincing material …"[180]

379. There was a meeting between Mr Campbell and Mr Scarlett, and others from No.10, at 6pm on 11 September.[181]

380. In his diaries Mr Campbell wrote that he:

"… gave some suggestions later re a different structure. We had the basic story and now had to fill it out. TB looked at it and said it was pretty compelling stuff."[182]

381. When Mr Miller asked to talk to someone in No.10 about the latest thinking on the dossier, "without getting into circulating copies just so as they are on the right track", Mr Smith suggested he should speak to Mr Campbell or Mr Tom Kelly on 13 September.[183]

382. On 13 September, Mr Campbell wrote:

> "Meeting with Julian Miller … to go through the new structure. I was worried that it was going to have to rely too much on assertion …"[184]

383. In relation to the recall of Parliament, Mr Campbell also wrote:

> "I was worried that the dossier was going to be too assertive and that even though the agencies presented it as their work, it would be seen as us trying to spin them a line."

384. Mr Campbell told the Hutton Inquiry that, in relation to the dossier, he had told Mr Scarlett: "The drier the better, cut the rhetoric"; and that "the more intelligence based it was, the better". There was a need to distinguish between material in the Government's dossier and the IISS publication.[185]

385. Asked about the emails from Mr Pruce, Mr Smith and Mr Bassett, Mr Campbell said that he could not recall seeing them.[186]

386. Mr Campbell was not asked about the emails from Mr Kelly and Mr Rycroft.

387. Mr Scarlett told the Hutton Inquiry that he had not seen the No.10 emails at the time but he could see from the documents presented to him that some of the main comments had been made orally in the discussion that had taken place in Mr Campbell's office at 6pm on 11 September 2002.[187]

388. Asked whether he had received the comments from No.10 orally from Mr Campbell, Mr Scarlett stated that the person who had drafted the email recalled only that Mr Scarlett had said to him that the points were from No.10. Mr Scarlett had "no recollection" and "no record" of receiving the points, or who they were received from.[188]

389. Mr Campbell subsequently told the Hutton Inquiry that, in relation to the content of the emails between Mr Bassett, Mr Smith and Mr Pruce, he stood by what he had said on 19 August 2003; and that he could not recall pointing out any of the sentiments to Mr Scarlett in their meeting on 11 September.[189]

390. Mr Scarlett stated that he remembered Mr Bassett being at the meeting with Mr Campbell, but he did not remember what Mr Bassett had said and he did not remember taking any notice of it.[190] Mr Scarlett added:

> "… the general advice that I took away from Alastair Campbell, from nobody else … was that the … draft … needed, ideally, to have more detail in it, needed to be less assertive, less rhetorical … And indeed the 16th September draft was clearly striking a slightly different tone in its language."

391. Asked about the views expressed in the emails and their impact, Mr Campbell told the Inquiry:

> "That may have been their honestly held opinions, but I didn't agree with them. I actually thought that the paper that John Scarlett produced on September 10 was … a very, very good piece of work. So, as I said at the Hutton inquiry, they are all perfectly entitled to make those points, if that's their opinion, but, ultimately, it would not be their decision …"[191]

392. Mr Blair told the Hutton Inquiry that he was aware of the process for producing the dossier, and his view was that it was "important that it made the best case we could make subject, obviously, to it being owned by the Joint Intelligence Committee".

393. There is no evidence that Mr Blair saw the emails on the issue between officials in No.10.

394. Asked, in the light of the comment that No.10 had wanted the dossier "to be as strong as possible within the bounds of available intelligence", whether he was aware that process (the email exchange) was going on, Mr Blair told the Hutton Inquiry that he had been aware of that, and "it was important that it [the dossier] made the best case we could make subject, obviously, to it being owned by the Joint Intelligence Committee".[192]

395. Mr Blair added that, as Parliament was being recalled and he would be presenting the dossier, he had been concerned to make sure the dossier made the "best case":

> "Provided that is clearly understood as meaning that it is only if the intelligence agencies thought both that the actual intelligence should be included and that there was not improper weight being given to any aspect of that intelligence."[193]

THE US PERSPECTIVE

396. The discussions with the US about President Bush's speech to the UN General Assembly on 12 September are addressed in Section 3.4. Key points from the speech are set out in the Box below.

President Bush's speech, 12 September 2002

In his speech to the UN General Assembly on 12 September, President Bush set out his view of the "grave and gathering danger" posed by Saddam Hussein and challenged the UN to act to address Iraq's failure to meet the obligations imposed by the Security Council since 1990.[194]

President Bush made clear that, if Iraq defied the UN the world must hold Iraq to account and the US would "work with the UN Security Council for the necessary resolutions".

But the US would not stand by and do nothing in the face of the threat.

President Bush set out Iraq's failure to meet those obligations imposed by the UN, including:

- "Right now, Iraq is expanding and improving facilities that were used for the production of biological weapons."
- UN inspections had revealed that Iraq "likely maintains stockpiles of VX, mustard and other chemical agents, and that the regime is rebuilding and expanding facilities capable of producing chemical weapons".
- Iraq continued "to withhold important information about its nuclear program"; employed "capable nuclear scientists and technicians"; and retained "the physical infrastructure needed to build a nuclear weapon". It had "made several attempts to buy high-strength aluminium tubes used to enrich uranium for a nuclear weapon". If Iraq acquired fissile material, "it would be able to build a nuclear weapon within a year".
- Iraq's "state controlled media" had "reported numerous meetings between Saddam Hussein and his nuclear scientists, leaving little doubt about his continued appetite for these weapons".
- Iraq also possessed "a force" of SCUD-type missiles with greater than permitted range and was "building more … that can inflict mass death throughout the region".
- Iraq had "subverted" the Oil-for-Food programme "to buy missile technology and military materials".
- Despite the UN's demands for the return of inspectors, Iraq had had "four years … to plan and to build and to test behind the cloak of secrecy".

Challenging the UN to act, President Bush stated:

> "We know that Saddam Hussein pursued weapons of mass murder even when inspectors were in his country. Are we to assume that he stopped when they left? The history, the logic and the facts lead to one conclusion: Saddam Hussein's regime > is a grave and gathering danger. To suggest otherwise is to hope against the evidence. To assume … good faith is … a reckless gamble … [T]his is a risk we must not take.

>
> "We have been more than patient … Saddam Hussein has defied all these efforts and continues to develop weapons of mass destruction. The first time we may be completely certain he has … nuclear weapons is when … he uses one. We owe it to all our citizens to prevent that day from coming."

397. Mr Scarlett discussed the draft dossier with US Administration officials on 12 September.

398. Sir Christopher Meyer, British Ambassador to the US, reported that, in meetings on 12 September, US Administration officials had welcomed Mr Scarlett's briefing on the UK plan to publish a dossier on Iraqi WMD on 24 September.[195]

399. Mr Scarlett had "stressed the importance of co-ordinating UK and US public presentation strategies". The issues discussed included:

- recent Iraqi attempts to procure aluminium tubes; and
- the differences between US and UK assessments of the timelines for Iraq to acquire a nuclear weapons capability. President Bush had said publicly, notably in his speech to the UN General Assembly, that, if it obtained fissile material, Iraq could build a nuclear weapon within a year.

400. Sir Christopher Meyer also wrote:

> "US interlocutors all pointed more generally to the need not to get trapped into juridical standards of proof. The bulk of the case should rest on history and common-sense argument, rather than specific new intelligence. When it came to Saddam's WMD, absence of evidence was not the same as evidence of absence. We should not be afraid to argue that, just as in 1991, Iraq's programmes were probably much further advanced than we knew."

401. One official in the National Security Council suggested:

> "… setting out convincing arguments as to why Saddam continued his costly pursuit of WMD. Deterring attacks on the regime was not a full explanation. For Saddam, WMD were weapons of choice, not of last resort. In particular … [he] believed, Saddam wanted nuclear weapons so that he could threaten or use CW or BW in the region, and use his nuclear capability to deter nuclear retaliation … we should not be afraid to make this argument publicly."

402. Mr Scarlett also discussed the draft with the CIA:

> "The WMD section of the 10 September draft was also shown to the US Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) and they made comments."[196]

SIS report, 11 September 2002

403. On 11 September, SIS issued a report stating:

- Iraq had accelerated the production of chemical and biological agent;
- it had built further facilities throughout Iraq; and
- Saddam Hussein was determined to maintain his CBW capability.

404. SIS expected to receive additional material through the same source.

405. Reflecting concerns about source protection, the report was given a very limited distribution to named senior officials.

406. The report did not make clear that SIS was not itself in contact with the source whom it considered had direct access to Iraq's programmes.

407. The Butler Report stated:

> "One further intelligence report which has been described to us as being significant was received between the production of the JIC's Assessment of 9 September and the publication of the Government's dossier. This … reported that production of biological and chemical agent had been accelerated by the Iraqi regime, including through the building of further facilities throughout Iraq."[197]

408. Notes of a telephone discussion between Sir Richard Dearlove and Mr Scarlett on 11 September recorded that Sir Richard told Mr Scarlett:

- SIS was "on the edge of [a] significant intel breakthrough". The intelligence was from a "first contact with BCW phenomenal access". It could be the "key to unlock" Iraq's BCW programme.
- Asked whether the source definitely had "the access", Sir Richard replied "yes".
- Sir Richard expected "additional material in 3-4 weeks time". He mentioned a "CD with everything in it".
- Sir Richard believed that it would be too risky to include the material from the new source [in the dossier]: "The moment we publish Saddam will lock up his BCW scientists."

[197] Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction ["The Butler Report"], 14 July 2004, HC 898, paragraph 305.

- Sir Richard was reported to have "summarised the report", stating: "Production closed down but sufficient stocks already."
- Mr Scarlett agreed that the report would not be fed into "today's discussion [of the draft dossier]". He was: "Not happy with draft. Section 6 & 7 are keys."[198]

409. A letter from Sir Richard Dearlove's Private Secretary to Sir David Manning, with two copies of the report (one for Sir David and one for Mr Powell) recorded that Sir Richard had "referred" to the report during his meeting with Sir David on 10 September.[199]

410. Sir Richard Dearlove told the Butler Review that he had been aware of the report and had mentioned it to Sir David Manning at a meeting on 10 September.[200] He had subsequently arranged for the report to be sent to No.10.

411. SIS issued the new intelligence report on 11 September.[201]

412. The report stated that, in early September, a senior official who had a background of involvement in Iraq's CW programme described a particular military establishment's participation in BW and CW programmes, including:

- "The regime had demanded accelerated production of BCW substances. Senior workers were working a seven day week and safety measures, which were common in the 1980s, were now being ignored …"
- "Although BW and CW production is centred on Baghdad, the regime has built further facilities throughout Iraq. There was now excess capacity, with more production facilities than there were suitably qualified and trusted staff to operate them."
- Chlorine gas produced at the facility was "shipped to 'Iraq Atomic Energy'".
- "… [A]nthrax was being produced at a separate facility …"
- "Approximately two weeks ago, an order was received to stop producing prohibited substances at … [the establishment]. All machinery producing these substances was to be decontaminated and the remaining prohibited substances sent to storage. The same order had been sent to all MIC [Military Industrial Commission] factories involved in producing BCW in Iraq."

[201] Report [SIS], 11 September 2002, 'Iraq: Accelerated production of Chemical and Biological Warfare (BCW) Substances throughout Iraq suspended end of August'.

413. The report stated that the SIS source had commented that:

- "Saddam Hussein was determined to maintain his CBW capability. If the major production centres near Baghdad were attacked and damaged, the regime would order staff to relocate to an alternative undamaged site."
- Iraq "was concentrating its efforts on the production of anthrax and that Iraq had received a lot of help from neighbouring and friendly countries".
- The action was "in preparation for the admission of weapons inspectors".
- "New accommodation for senior scientists and their colleagues was being built near to the major BW and CW production sites. The families of those scientists would, in effect, be held hostage. They would be discouraged from deserting or from leaking information about activities at their facilities that might lead to the sites being targeted for bombing by allied forces."

414. An SIS comment informed readers that:

- Chlorine was "one of the base chemicals for the production of CW agents such as mustard and the nerve agent sarin".
- Chlorine was also used in the production of uranium trichloride "which in turn may be used as a feed material for the electromagnetic isotope separation process (EMIS) to enrich uranium for weapons production". Iraq had previously admitted, in its declarations to UNSCOM, "attempting to pursue this route to produce weapon grade highly enriched uranium" before 1991; and, "Although Iraq encountered problems in scaling up the production capability, it had succeeded in producing a small quantity of lower enrichments and was continuing to resolve the problems before the EMIS programme was halted by Coalition air strikes."

415. The report was described as "high impact" and the source was described as: "A new source on trial with direct access." SIS advised that readers would "receive relevant briefing as soon as can be arranged".

416. The report was sent to Mr Simon McDonald (Mr Straw's Principal Private Secretary), Sir Michael Jay, Mr Wright, Mr Chaplin, Mr Ehrman, Sir David Manning, Mr Scarlett, Mr Bowen, Mr Miller, Mr Peter Watkins (Mr Hoon's Principal Private Secretary), Sir Kevin Tebbit (MOD Permanent Under Secretary) and Mr Webb.

417. It was not sent to Sir David Omand, AM French, Mr Tony Cragg, MOD Deputy Chief of Defence Intelligence (DCDI), or the Heads of GCHQ or MI5.

418. Documents seen by the Inquiry state that the distribution was approved personally by Sir Richard Dearlove.

419. A minute for the file written by SIS9 recorded that he and Sir Richard Dearlove had briefed Mr Blair on the sources of the report (of 11 September) on 12 September.[202] The sources were not named but Mr Blair was given details of the source's background and his access, and his relationship with the sub-source.

420. Mr Blair was also briefed on two other sources who had provided recent reports.

421. Sir David Manning, Mr Powell and Mr Campbell were present.

422. Mr Campbell wrote:

> "Meeting with TB, Jonathan, DM, AC, C and a SIS colleague re chemical and biological weapons, and what Blix would be looking for if the inspectors went in. It showed what was going on was really bad and getting worse, that he [Saddam Hussein] was determined to keep WMD for reasons of regional power. They were strategically vital and he was going to keep them come what may. C said we could use some of the material through assertion.
> "They were confident this stuff was real, not being run against us. SIS believed the regime would collapse and there would be lots of defections etc. Very interesting meeting."[203]

423. Sir Richard Dearlove told the Butler Review in 2004 that he had had a meeting with Mr Blair on 12 September to brief him on SIS operations in respect of Iraq, and that he had briefed the Prime Minister on each of SIS' main sources including the new source on trial.[204]

424. Sir Richard also told the Butler Review that he had:

> "… underlined to the Prime Minister the potential importance of the new source [of the 11 September report] and what SIS understood his access to be; but also said that the case was developmental and that the source remained unproven."

425. The Butler Report stated that SIS had hopes that this source would become a major asset.[205] In particular, the source had indicated to SIS that he would be able to provide substantial and critical additional intelligence in the near future.

426. SIS4 suggested that Mr Blair had already known about the intelligence before the meeting between Mr Blair and Sir Richard Dearlove on 12 September, and that he wanted to see the product.[206]

427. Sir Richard Dearlove told the Inquiry that "it would have been very rare" for him to have talked to Ministers or Mr Blair "about our source base".[207]

428. Asked about Mr Blair's reaction, Sir Richard told the Inquiry that Sir David Manning had asked him to give Mr Blair a briefing "which would give him [Mr Blair] more of a flavour for what was actually going on on the ground".[208] Mr Blair "had an appetite for that sort of briefing which was a pretty rare event", and had had a "fair amount of general discussion" with SIS9 "about the difficulties and problems we were facing".

429. Asked whether, as some witnesses had suggested, he had been precipitate in going to Ministers with the report so quickly, Sir Richard replied:

> "I think in the circumstances, I don't agree … because if you issue a report like that in the middle of a crisis, you're going to get a phone call from a Ministerial office within a short period of time."[209]

430. Sir Richard also stated that in the circumstances it would have been "impossible" not to issue the report; SIS could not "sit on something as potentially important" as that.[210]

431. The SIS report of 11 September was used by Mr Scarlett and Mr Miller in reaching key judgements about Iraq's chemical and biological weapons capabilities included in the Government dossier published on 24 September.

432. Specifically it provided the assurance for the judgements that Iraq had:

- "continued to produce chemical and biological agents";
- "military plans for the use of chemical and biological weapons …"

433. The judgements on Iraq's production of chemical and biological weapons and the circumstances in which they could be used became the baseline for subsequent advice to Ministers and public statements on the threat posed by Iraq.

434. The Butler Report concluded that the intelligence report (of 11 September) had "a major effect on the certainty of the statements in the Government's dossier of September 2002 that Iraq possessed and was producing chemical and biological weapons".[211]

435. The Butler Report added that the SIS report had provided "significant assurance to those drafting the … dossier that active, current production of chemical and biological agent was taking place".[212]

436. In the context of Sir Richard Dearlove's evidence, that he had told Mr Blair on 12 September 2002 that the SIS report issued on 11 September was developmental and the source unproven, the Butler Report stated:

> "Nevertheless, it may be that, in the context of the intense interest at that moment in the status of Iraq's prohibited weapons programmes, and in particular continuing work on the dossier, the concurrence of events caused more weight to be given to this unvalidated new source than would normally have been the case."[213]

437. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Sir Richard Dearlove maintained that material from the report of 11 September had not been used in the dossier:

> "… maybe I should add now, because I'm sure you are going to question me … I think this is an important point, so we don't waste too much time on it. I can say very authoritatively there was no material in the dossier [from the new source on trial in September 2002].
> "I can also say, if you actually look at the introduction to the dossier, it refers to assessed intelligence, specifically assessed intelligence. [The new source on trial] was not assessed intelligence, and therefore are actually authoritatively excluded because they don't fall into that category, and I had put my foot down and said this material could not be used."[214]

438. Sir Richard subsequently told the Inquiry that he had insisted that the September reporting was not included in the dossier because he wanted to retain the source for use during inspections.[215]

439. Sir John Scarlett told the Inquiry that the "further intelligence" reporting on the "acceleration" of the "production of chemical and biological agent" was "regarded as significant".[216]

440. Sir John subsequently stated that the report issued on 11 September was "influential" and "did famously influence what was said in the dossier".[217] He also referred to a further report from the same source in late September and that "a composite version" of the two reports had been "issued in early April 2003" and that it "was still considered to be sound reporting as of that date".

441. The SIS report of 23 September is addressed in the Box below.

SIS report, 23 September 2002

On 23 September, SIS issued a second report from the same sourcing chain as the 11 September report. That stated VX, sarin and soman had been produced at Al-Yarmuk, and were loaded into a variety of "containers", including "linked hollow glass spheres". The source commented that there had been "accelerated production of CW substances at Al-Yarmuk for several years". It was described by SIS as expanding and clarifying the intelligence in the first report, and that it was "valuable intelligence".[218]

The report was circulated to the same restricted group as the report on 11 September, with the addition of Mr Mark Bowman, Mr Brown's Private Secretary.

It arrived too late to have influenced the conclusions in the dossier.

442. When the reporting was reissued in April 2003 Mr Scarlett was not informed that SIS had doubts about the reliability of the reporting chain. That is addressed in Section 4.3.

443. The potential impact of the reporting on Mr Blair's statement to the House of Commons on 24 September is addressed later in this Section.

Mr Straw's speech, 14 September 2002

Mr Straw's speech to the UN General Assembly on 14 September focused on the critical role the UN had to play in world affairs, and the "three rising challenges" of failing states, terrorism and weapons of mass destruction.[219]

Addressing the threat from proliferation, Mr Straw stated: "Nowhere is the case for universal support for the enforcement of the UN's law stronger than in the field of weapons of mass destruction." He added:

> "… with one infamous exception – no States have resorted to these, the world's worst weapons.
>
> "That exception is Iraq. For two decades, Saddam has defied and frustrated every attempt to enforce the international rule of law. Iraq is the only country to be condemned by the United Nations for breaching the Convention on Chemical Weapons. Iraq has fought two wars of aggression … No country has deceived every other country in the world as systematically and cynically as Iraq. And no country presents as fundamental a challenge to the United Nations …"

Draft dossier, 16 September 2002

444. In a note to No.10 officials covering a range of issues on 15 September, Mr Blair wrote on Iraq:

> "The dossier is crucial. The expectations must be right. Remember the case we need to make is for the return of a tough inspection regime, not that he [Saddam Hussein] is about to launch a strike. In my view, advice to me from the JIC is sufficiently persuasive."[220]

445. Mr Blair told the Hutton Inquiry:

> "The purpose of the dossier was to respond to the call to disclose the intelligence we knew but at that stage the strategy was not to use the dossier as the immediate reason to go to conflict, but as the reason why we had to return to the issue of Saddam and weapons of mass destruction …"[221]

446. There were a number of significant changes in the revised draft of the dossier of 16 September, including giving prominence in the Executive Summary to:

- the IISS judgement that Iraq could obtain a nuclear weapon within months if it obtained fissile material, rather than the JIC's more conservative view of one to two years which was not mentioned in the Summary;
- Saddam Hussein's readiness to use weapons of mass destruction and his determination to retain them; and
- a statement that the JIC judged that Iraq continued to produce chemical and biological agents.

447. Mr Scarlett sent a revised version of the dossier to JIC members on 16 September, which put the description of Iraq's chemical, biological, nuclear and ballistic missile programmes first.[222]

448. The draft did not contain a draft Foreword; the development of the text signed by Mr Blair is discussed later in this Section.

449. The key additions to the Executive Summary from the previous draft were references to:

- the "valuable assessment" in the IISS paper of 9 September, including that it judged "Iraq could assemble nuclear weapons within months of obtaining fissile material from foreign sources";

- intelligence providing a "fuller picture of Iraq's plans and capabilities" and showing that Saddam Hussein did "not regard them only as weapons of last resort"; he was "ready to use them … and determined to retain them"; and
- intelligence allowing the JIC to judge that Iraq had "continued to produce chemical and biological agents"; and that Saddam Hussein and his son Qusay had "the political authority to use" WMD.

450. The draft included a new Chapter 1 on the role of intelligence, which stated:

> "Intelligence rarely offers a complete account of activities which are designed to remain concealed. And the nature of Saddam's regime makes Iraq a difficult target … Nonetheless, we have been able to develop a range of well positioned sources. The need to protect and preserve these sources inevitably limits the detail that can be made available. But intelligence has provided important insights into Iraqi programmes, and into Iraqi military thinking. Taken together with what is already known from other sources, this builds our understanding of Iraq's capabilities and adds significantly to the analysis already in the public domain.
> "Iraq's capabilities have been regularly reviewed by the … JIC, which has provided advice to the Prime Minister on the developing assessment on the basis of all available sources … [T]his paper includes some of the most significant views reached by the JIC between 1999 and 2002."

451. The text on Iraq's programmes was significantly expanded. As well as more detail on Iraq's attempts to procure material that could be used for prohibited programmes, and judgements from JIC Assessments, changes to the previous text included:

- a box describing the effect of detonating a 20-kiloton nuclear warhead over a city;
- the addition of statements that: there had been "recent production of chemical and biological agents"; intelligence confirmed that Iraq continued to produce chemical agents; and "we know from intelligence that Iraq has continued to produce biological warfare agents";
- a statement that intelligence had provided "Confirmation" that chemical and biological weapons played an important role in Iraqi military thinking;
- two separate statements that the Iraqi military "may be able to deploy" chemical and biological weapons within 45 minutes of a decision to do so;
- the replacing of the judgement that, if Iraq obtained fissile material, it would take at least two years to make a working nuclear device, by a statement that it would be "much shorter" than the five years Iraq would require to produce a nuclear weapon once sanctions were lifted or became ineffective, and, "depending on the effectiveness of Iraqi weapons design", that could be "between one and two years"; and

- the replacing of the reference to an ability to produce an unreliable IND within a few months, by a reference to Iraqi experimentation with radiological dispersal devices (RDDs) during 1987, but the programme "never progressed beyond the research stage and was dropped". A box described such devices as an "ineffective weapon".

452. The draft also contained a new "Conclusion" summarising the current position.

453. Mr Scarlett asked that the "representatives" of JIC members attending a meeting to be chaired by Mr Miller at 0900 the following morning, should "come armed with suggested additions/ deletions/amendments to be decided at the meeting".[223] He also asked for "final comments" by 1300 on 17 September.

454. Mr Scarlett cautioned:

> "In public presentation terms, this draft remains a highly sensitive document. I would therefore be grateful if you each retain very tight control over its distribution …"

455. Mr Scarlett held a meeting "to work up a strategy on Iraq" later that day.[224]

456. A minute from Mr Kelly to Mr Campbell on 17 September suggests that this discussion was essentially about plans for printing and publishing the document and preparing supporting material.[225]

457. Mr Miller told the Hutton Inquiry that the draft dossier was discussed in a meeting he chaired on 17 September.[226]

458. The Defence Intelligence Staff expressed concerns that some of the statements in the draft on Iraq's chemical and biological weapons could not be substantiated by the intelligence it had seen.

459. A member of the Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) wrote to the Assessment Staff early on 17 September reflecting concerns that some of the statements on chemical and biological weapons in the draft could not be substantiated by the intelligence seen by the DIS.[227] The comments included:

- "Executive Summary, Para 3 – 1st Bullet: The judgement 'has continued to produce chemical and biological agents' is too strong with respect to CW. 'has probably' would be as far as I would go. And 'continued to produce BW agents'. This is quite strong considering what the int actually says. [Iraq has a biological production capability and can produce at least anthrax, botulinum toxin, aflatoxin

- "Executive Summary, Para 3 – 2nd Bullet: The judgement 'has military plans for the use of chemical and biological weapons, some of which could be ready within 45 minutes of an order to use them'. Is also rather strong since it is based on a single source. 'Could say intelligence suggests …'"
- "Part 1, Chapter 2, Para 16: The statement '… Iraq continues to produce chemical and biological agents.' This is too strong. See comment above. Suggest 'may continue to produce' even 'probably continues to produce'."
- "Part 1, Chapter 3, Para 1 – 1st Bullet: The statement 'which has included recent production of chemical and biological agents;' is too strong from the CW perspective. This is based on a single source."
- "Part 1, Chapter 3, Para 5 Recent Intelligence: From the CW perspective the language is too strong since the information is based on single sources. The wording 'intelligence shows that' is too strong and inappropriate" 'reports that', 'indicates that', 'suggests that' would be more appropriate."
- "Part 1, Chapter 3, Para 8 – Line 1: The statement 'Intelligence confirms that Iraq has continued to produce chemical agent.' This is far too strong considering the available evidence. The word confirms is totally inappropriate. "Intelligence suggests that …' would be better".
- "Part 1, Chapter 3, Para 12: The statement 'We know from intelligence that Iraq has continued to produce BW agents'. This is quite strong considering what the int actually says …"
- "Part 1, Chapter 3, Para 16: The statement 'Iraq has continued to produce CBW agent'. Some elements of the summary repeat the same overly strong statements as in the rest of this chapter."

460. The response to the DIS concerns is addressed later in this Section.

461. Mr Blair and officials within No.10 offered a number of comments on the draft.

462. Mr Pruce commented that the new draft:

- "re-ordered the text, with the new intell nearer the front (might be able to bring it further forward)";
- "added a short chapter on JIC and intelligence", which was "Good but could give more details";
- "kept in the longer nuclear timelines … We need to think carefully about how these will appear to compare with the IISS figure of a weapon within a few months"; and

- "added a short conclusions table – not sure this adds a lot to the Executive Summary".[228]

463. Mr Pruce summarised:

> "The re-organised material paints a more convincing picture, but the facts remain thin on nuclear".

464. Mr Campbell sent Mr Scarlett his and Mr Blair's comments on the draft dossier on 17 September.[229]

465. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair thought it was "a very good job and it was convincing", but had a number of comments. These included that Mr Blair:

- thought the chapter on the current position on Iraq's chemical, biological, nuclear and ballistic missile programmes "should be re-ordered, to build towards the conclusion through detail";
- "like me, was worried about the way you have expressed the nuclear issue … Can we not go back … to 'radiological device' in months; nuclear bomb in 1-2 years with help; 5 years with no sanctions";
- "thought we should make more of the 'no civil nuclear' point, and list dual-use products"; and
- "felt we don't do enough on human rights".

466. Mr Campbell's own comments included:

- "… we should make more of the point about current concealment plans."
- The Executive Summary "would be stronger if we said that despite sanctions and the policy of containment, he [Saddam Hussein] has made real progress".
- The statement that Saddam's sons "may have" the authority to use chemical and biological weapons in the text was weaker than the statement in the Summary that they had that authority.
- "Can we say that he [Saddam] has secured uranium from Africa?"

467. Mr Campbell also asked for Mr Scarlett's views on the draft Foreword for Mr Blair. This is addressed later in this Section.

468. In his diaries Mr Campbell wrote:

> "I got the new dossier draft and did detailed comments … TB also read it and made some comments. Nuclear was the most difficult part. Scarlett and I chatted away re that."[230]

469. In an email to Mr Scarlett on 17 September, Mr Powell wrote:

> "The dossier is good and convincing for those who are prepared to be convinced
>
> "I have only three points, none of which affect the way the document is drafted or presented
>
> "First the document does nothing to demonstrate a threat, let alone an imminent threat from Saddam In other words it shows he has the means but it does not demonstrate he has the motive to attack his neighbours let alone the west We will need to make clear in launching the document that we do not claim to have evidence that he is an imminent threat The case we are making is that he has continued to develop WMD since 1998, and is in breach of UN resolutions The international community has to enforce those resolutions if the UN is to be taken seriously
> "Second we will be asked about connections with Al Qaida […]
>
> "Third, if I was Saddam I would take a party of western journalists to the Ibn Sina factory or one of the others pictured in the document to demonstrate there is nothing there How do we close off that avenue to him in advance?"[231]

470. In his response Mr Scarlett stated:

- A note was being prepared on Iraq and Al Qaida.
- The dossier stressed the problems [in identifying prohibited activities], posed by dual-use facilities and the ease of concealment. That "applied to trained inspectors let alone journalists".[232]

471. Mr Campbell commented:

> "I think we risk complicating the issue if we get into links with Al Qaida The dossier, and the debate in Parliament, are explicitly about Iraq/WMD On the question of sites, we should in our briefing make clear that we assume he will sanitise one of them for the media, and pull some stunt, but remain robust re our judgements Re the 'imminent threat', point, that is why TB's foreword sets out 'the case I am making'. John, I will show him your revisions and hopefully get the Foreword signed off today".[233]

472. In a further email on 18 September, Mr Powell emphasised that he was "not suggesting any changes to the dossier, just flagging up points where we are going to need to mould expectations in advance of publication and on publication".[234]

473. Mr Powell concluded:

> "The threat argument will be a major problem in the press/parliamentary assault after the dossier comes out and we need to flag up the point in the preface at publication and during the debate We need to set the test for ourselves at a level we can meet".

474. Later on 18 September, Mr Campbell sent Mr Scarlett the impressions of a member of his team whom he had asked to read the draft.[235] Mr Campbell wrote that "Overall, she found it convincing", "CW/BW in particular". She had, however, found the nuclear section confused and unconvincing, and it had left her thinking that there was "nothing much to worry about". The section "lacked the clarity of the rest of the document".

475. Mr Campbell added:

> "Sorry to bombard on this point, but I do worry that the nuclear section will become the main focus and as currently drafted is not in great shape."

476. Mr Scarlett informed Mr Campbell that he had seen the comments and was taking account of them in the revision of the dossier.[236]

477. Commenting on the Executive Summary, Mr Ed Owen, Mr Straw's Special Adviser, wrote that it did not read "well enough to give a sceptical reader the confidence to believe that the dossier provides the necessary information".[237]

Draft dossier, 19 September 2002

478. Mr Scarlett informed the JIC on 18 September of the latest position on the draft dossier, and that "a final version would have to be agreed and with the printers by the end of the following day".[238]

479. The co-ordination arrangements for producing the draft and deciding on its handling had "gone well". Mr Scarlett also "said he wanted to thank all those from the intelligence community who had played a part in the document's production. Their helpful, balanced, co-operative and collaborative approach had been much appreciated."

480. There is no record of any substantive points being raised.

481. Sir Stephen Lander, Director General of the Security Service, Sir Francis Richards, Sir Richard Dearlove, Mr Webb, Mr Cragg, and Sir David Omand were amongst those present. Sir David Manning, AM French and Mr Bowen were not present.

482. Mr Scarlett told the Hutton Inquiry that at the JIC on 18 September:

> "The Committee also noted that some new intelligence had come in on nuclear matters which would need to be incorporated in the draft.
> "The Committee raised no particular point – no points of further debate or contention."[239]

483. On 18 September, Mr Scarlett sent Mr Campbell detailed responses to his and Mr Blair's comments.[240]

484. The response to Mr Blair's comments included:

- The revised restructuring suggested by Mr Blair would have "less impact than the original".
- Mr Scarlett had explained "the decision to drop earlier references to an improvised nuclear device, on which there is no intelligence".
- No change had been made to the timelines for Iraq to acquire a nuclear weapon which summarised the JIC position, but one paragraph had been revised to bring out the judgements more clearly.
- Dual-use products had been listed separately; and the impact was "much improved".
- Material on human rights abuses had been added and the issue was given "a little more prominence" in the Executive Summary.

485. Mr Scarlett also addressed Mr Campbell's more detailed comments, including that the language on current concerns and plans had been strengthened and the Summary brought out the point suggested by Mr Campbell – that Iraq was making progress despite sanctions and containment.

486. Addressing comments in Mr Campbell's minute of 17 September, Mr Scarlett told the Hutton Inquiry:

> "… we looked again at what we were saying in the draft about Iraq's concealment plans and activities – what the intelligence was saying, and also how we were expressing the success or otherwise of sanctions and the policy of containment.
>
> "This, of course, was a point that we had been expressly asked to highlight by the JIC at its meeting of 11 September.
>
> "… [I]ntelligence … was very clear about Iraq's confidence that it could learn lessons from its past experience with the inspectors, and pursue effective concealment plans."[241]

487. In his diaries, Mr Campbell recorded that, on 18 September, he also:

> "… went through nuclear section with Julian Miller, which was OK. JS [Jack Straw] was keen to keep in the very downbeat assessment."[242]

488. In an email on 19 September, Mr Campbell recorded that he told Mr Miller:

> "… it would be simpler to have just one clearer section on nuclear timelines, perhaps along the following lines …
> "It is impossible to be precise about nuclear timelines We can be clear however, that provided sanctions and export controls remain in place and effective, it is not possible for Iraq to develop nuclear weapons. This is because although they have the expertise, the design data, the planning and the intent they do not have the material necessary for the production of fissile material. This contrasts with CW/BW, which they can produce indigenously. Even if sanctions were removed, we assess that it would take up to five years for them to develop nuclear weapons. The timelines are considerably shortened however if Iraq manages to obtain fissile material illegally from overseas In these circumstances, the JIC assessed in early 2002 that they could produce nuclear weapons in between one and two years".[243]

489. Mr Scarlett sent the draft dossier to Mr Campbell on 19 September.[244]

490. The minute was also sent to JIC members "on a personal basis, reflecting the continuing sensitivity of the document and the imperative need to avoid leaks". They were asked to let Mr Scarlett have "any essential further comments on this draft by 15:00 today".

491. Mr Scarlett wrote:

> "I should draw your attention to some changes to the Executive Summary reflecting comments from the Foreign Office; to a simplified account of Saddam's nuclear programme; and to a restructuring of the final section on Saddam's Iraq to bring out the human rights issues more clearly. In particular you should note that we have toned down the reference to aluminium tubes … and removed it from the Executive Summary. This reflects some very recent exchanges on intelligence channels. Finally, I have recast the conclusion to remove the chart, which a number of readers considered to lack impact."

[244] Minute Scarlett to Campbell, 19 September 2002, 'Iraqi WMD: Public Presentation of Intelligence Material' attaching Paper, 19 September 2002, 'Iraq's Programme for Weapons of Mass Destruction: The Assessment of the British Government'.

492. A concluding paragraph in the Executive Summary, stating that Saddam Hussein would "use his weapons of mass destruction to protect and eventually project his power", reflected a revised Conclusions section at the end of the paper which stated:

> "Four themes dominate even the most sober account of Saddam Hussein's rule in Iraq:
>
> - Brutality … against his own people,
> - Aggression against neighbour states,
> - Cynicism in dealing with the Iraqi people, regional states and the International Community; and,
> - Single minded pursuit of military power and above all weapons of mass destruction as the most effective means of exercising that power.
> "This paper has set out our assessment of Saddam's current holdings … as well as his programmes for their development. Although our knowledge is partial, the paper concludes that he possesses mass destruction weapons and the means to produce them and to deliver them. His development programmes continue. An analysis of what he will do with these weapons now and in the future, must rest upon his record and our current information, including intelligence. It is reasonable to conclude that he will use whatever weaponry he has to hand to protect his power and eventually to project it when he feels strong enough to do so."

493. Other changes included:

- the firming up of the judgement on the timeline for deploying chemical and biological weapons, from "may be able" to deploy within 45 minutes to "are able";
- the addition of a statement that Iraq had learned lessons from its previous experience with inspections to identify and exploit weak points and that sensitive equipment and papers were easily concealed;
- the addition of a statement that the "possession of mobile biological agent production facilities" would "also aid concealment efforts"; and
- the omission of the box explaining the difficulties of producing a nuclear weapon and the inclusion of one which described the elements of a nuclear programme and the process to convert those elements into a reliable weapon. The only comment on the difficulty was that the complexity was "much greater for a weapon that can fit into a missile warhead than for a larger Nagasaki-type [free fall] bomb".

494. In an email to Mr Scarlett, Mr Campbell commented that he did not think the revised Conclusion worked and that he would "either revert to, and strengthen" the previous format (a box summarising key points), or drop the section.[245] Mr Campbell also wrote that the Foreword covered most of the points made in the Conclusion.

---

[245] Email Campbell to Scarlett, 19 September 2002, [untitled].

495. In an email to Mr Campbell and Mr Scarlett on the afternoon of 19 September, Mr Powell wrote that he agreed with Mr Campbell that the Conclusion should be dropped.[246]

496. Mr Powell also:

- asked what headline "we want" in the Standard on the day of publication; and
- pointed out that the statement that Saddam Hussein was "prepared to use chemical and biological weapons if he believes his regime is under threat is a bit of a problem", because it backed up the argument that there was "no CBW threat and we will only create one if we attack him".

497. Mr Powell added:

> "My memory of the intelligence is that he has set up plans to use CBW on western forces and that these weapons are integrated into his military planning."

498. In further comments later on 19 September, Mr Campbell raised three further points in relation to nuclear weapons.[247]

499. In relation to the time required to produce a nuclear weapon, the draft text on nuclear timelines (paragraph 23) stated:

> "In early 2002, the JIC assessed that UN sanctions on Iraq were hindering the import of crucial goods for the production of fissile material. The JIC judged that while sanctions remain effective, Iraq would not be able indigenously to produce a nuclear weapon. If they were removed or proved ineffective, it would take Iraq at least five years to produce a weapon. But we know that Iraq retains expertise and design data relating to nuclear weapons. We therefore judge that if Iraq obtained fissile material and other essential components from foreign sources, the timeline for production of a nuclear weapon would be shortened and Iraq could produce a nuclear weapon in between one and two years."[248]

500. Apologising for not having spotted the point earlier, Mr Campbell wrote:

> "If we are saying that it would take between one and 2 years for them to build a nuclear weapon by illegal means, why would it take 5 years with no sanctions? A lay reader may assume that no sanctions would mean he could do what he wanted and therefore, presumably, what he needed between 1 and 2 years
> "If the answer is that it would take 5 years to go from planning to reality, whereas he could purchase ready-made material from overseas, and so cut the timelines, I think that should be made explicitly clear".

501. Secondly, Mr Campbell commented that the draft text on radiological dispersal devices added little.

502. Finally, Mr Campbell suggested that the text of the draft relating to attempts to purchase two different machines which "could be used" in a gas centrifuge uranium enrichment process (paragraph 21, fourth and fifth bullets), might be amended to read "is required to".[249]

503. In his diaries on 19 September, Mr Campbell wrote:

> "Most of my work at the moment was on the dossier. Nuclear timelines just about sorted … I agreed to drop the conclusion. Some people reasonably convinced, others not. We'd end up convincing those who wanted to be and not those who didn't."[250]

504. Sir Richard Dearlove told the Hutton Inquiry that he "reported to my directors, I think on 19 September that we had had full visibility of the process of preparing the dossier and that the whole process had gone extremely well".[251]

Preparation of Mr Blair's Foreword

505. The Foreword for the dossier was largely written by Mr Campbell, following conversations with Mr Blair. It was produced in the week before publication separately from the main text of the dossier.

506. Mr Scarlett and the JIC were asked for comments.

507. In comments on the Foreword in the draft dossier of 10 September, Mr Pruce wrote:

> "… the Foreword is good but whose voice is it? Do we need a Minister to sign it off? Probably not".[252]

508. Mr Sedwill wrote that the Foreword needed to make Saddam Hussein's defiance of the UN "a key issue".[253] This was what distinguished him "from other dictators and holders of WMD".

[253] Email Sedwill to Gray, 11 September 2002, 'Dossier 10/9 Version - Comments'.

509. Mr Owen agreed with Mr Sedwill. He suggested that the Foreword needed:

> "… to refer to the UN in the first sentences. This is after all, about the authority of the UN and international law. This is the only way we can win the argument in Parliament and elsewhere …"[254]

510. Mr Straw suggested that the Foreword for the dossier "should be in a narrative form" by Mr Blair, and that it needed "a killer" paragraph on "Saddam's defiance of the UN, only annexation of another member state and unprecedented use of WMD".[255]

511. Writing before the decision had been taken that Mr Blair would sign the Foreword or the text had been drafted, Mr Bowen wrote:

> "I take it as read that the Foreword is a political piece, signed by the Prime Minister or another Minister. In that text it would be useful to make the point that what follows is the work of officials drawing on sensitive intelligence material. The Foreword can be as loaded as we like in terms of the political message (provided it is consistent with the dossier itself), whereas the text itself should be the judgement of the experts."[256]

512. The minute was copied to Mr Campbell, Mr Powell and Sir David Manning.

513. Mr Campbell produced a draft Foreword for Mr Blair on 16 September.[257] The draft began:

> "The document published today is the work of the Joint Intelligence Committee …"

514. Referring to the intelligence which had "formed the judgements" in the dossier, the draft stated:

> "I and other Ministers have been briefed in detail on the sources, and are satisfied as to their authority, and the authority of the information they have disclosed.
>
> "What I believe they established beyond doubt is that Saddam has continued to produce chemical and biological weapons that he continues in his efforts to develop nuclear weapons, and to extend the range of his ballistic missile programme.
> "This picture … has become more not less worrying. Faced with the picture put before me on seeing a succession of JIC papers on the subject, as Prime Minister I have a choice: do I ignore this evidence or do I act to address the threat?

"I am in no doubt that the threat is serious, and current; and that he has made progress on WMD and that he has to be stopped."

515. The draft concluded:

"The case I make is not that Saddam could launch a nuclear attack on London or another part of the UK (He could not). The case I make is that the UN resolution[s] demanding he stops his WMD programme are being flouted; that since the inspectors left four years ago, he has continued with this programme; and the inspectors must be allowed in to do their job properly.

"It is the minimum necessary to ensure that he does not get to use the weapons he has, or get hold of the weapons he wants."

516. A draft was sent to Mr Powell and Sir David Manning on 17 September, asking for comments as soon as possible before it was shown to Mr Blair or Mr Scarlett.[258]

517. Mr Powell offered three comments on the Foreword:

- "I think it is worth explicitly stating, as TB keeps saying, this is the advice to him from the JIC. On the basis of this advice what other action could he as PM take. Something like 'I am today taking the exceptional step of publishing the JIC's advice to me because I want MPs and the British public to see the advice on which I am acting. When you have read this I ask you to consider what else a responsible PM could do than follow the course we have in the face of the advice?'"
- "We need to do more to back up the assertions. We cannot of course publish the detailed raw intelligence on which this report is based without endangering the lives of agents. But all the statements in this report are backed up by detailed intelligence reports, the veracity and sources of which have been verified by the intelligence agencies. Is there any independent verification we can cite?"
- "In the penultimate para you need to make it clear Saddam could not attack us at the moment. The thesis is he would be a threat to the UK in the future if we do not check him."[259]

518. When Mr Campbell sent his and Mr Blair's comments on the draft dossier to Mr Scarlett on 17 September, he also asked Mr Scarlett for his views on the draft Foreword.[260]

519. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair:

> "… has also read my draft Foreword, which I enclose (he will want another look at it before finally signing it off but I'd appreciate your views at this stage)."

520. The draft Foreword was sent to Mr Scarlett by Mr Campbell's office.[261]

521. The original version of the final paragraph had been amended to read:

> "I believe that faced with the information given to me by the JIC in recent months, the UK Government has been right to support the demands that this issue be confronted and dealt with. We must ensure that he does not get to use the weapons he has, or get hold of the weapons he wants."

522. Mr Scarlett sent suggested changes to the draft Foreword to Mr Campbell on 18 September.[262] The changes included:

- The first sentence was revised to state: "The document published today is based, in large part, on the work of the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC), which is chaired by the Cabinet Office …"
- The second sentence of the second paragraph was revised to make clear that it was the Government, not the JIC, which was publishing the document.
- The fifth sentence of the fourth paragraph was amended to remove the reference to Mr Blair and Ministers having been briefed on the sources of intelligence and having been satisfied as to the authority of their information. It was amended to state: "I and other Ministers have been briefed in detail on the intelligence and are satisfied as to its authority."
- A new final sentence was added to the fifth paragraph stating: "I also believe that, as stated in the document, Saddam will now do his utmost to try to conceal his weapons from the UN inspectors."
- A new final sentence was added to the eighth paragraph stating: "I am quite clear that he will go to extreme lengths, indeed has already done so, to avoid giving them up."
- The reference to information from the JIC "in recent months", in the first sentence of the final paragraph, was replaced by the words "over the past three years".

523. Mr Scarlett also wrote:

> "For me the key points are the references to the JIC and the use of intelligence. I am now seeking views of JIC colleagues on this amended text and will revert as soon as possible."

524. The same version of the Foreword was sent to members of the JIC with the following message from Mr Scarlett:

> "This is under active discussion now and reflects amendments I have made. The aim is to have the text agreed by close of play today. Please come ready to discuss at this afternoon's JIC meeting."[263]

525. The Government has been unable to find the original document but an email to Sir David Omand and Mr Miller indicates that it was dispatched late morning on 18 September.[264]

526. Mr Campbell informed Mr Scarlett on 18 September that Mr Blair had "signed off" the Foreword, and that it incorporated "all the points you made on the draft I sent yesterday".[265]

527. Sir David Omand responded to Mr Scarlett on 18 September:

> "Coming on well. You will have more than enough comment. Highlighted on the attached copy are a few suggested polishings."[266]

528. The changes proposed by Sir David included amending:

- the text in the first sentence of the first paragraph, to read: "… in large part, on secret intelligence, as assessed by the Joint Intelligence Committee …";
- the third paragraph to read: "In recent months, I have been increasingly alarmed by the evidence from inside Iraq that despite sanctions, despite the damage done to his capability in the past, and despite the UNSCRs expressly outlawing it, and despite his denials, Saddam Hussein is continuing to develop WMD …";
- the fifth paragraph by replacing the words "the JIC reports to me have" in the first sentence with the words "the assessed intelligence has";
- the eighth paragraph by replacing the reference in the second sentence to Saddam Hussein seeing "possession of WMD" as vital to his strategic interests with the phrase "building up of his WMD capability", and adding a reference in the final sentence to hiding weapons as one of the ways to avoid giving them up; and
- the final paragraph by replacing the reference to information given to Mr Blair by the JIC over the last three years with a reference to the information "available" to Mr Blair.

529. Sir David Omand told the Inquiry that he did not recall the JIC discussing the text of the Foreword at its meeting on 18 September.[267]

530. Mr Webb recorded that he had asked for the reference to [JIC] "papers" in the draft to be replaced by "work", "to reduce the risk of a FOIA [Freedom of Information Act] action succeeding".[268]

531. The Inquiry has not seen comments from any JIC members other than Sir David Omand and Mr Webb.

532. Sir David told the Inquiry that he had "highlighted bits that needed polishing" and "sent it back" to Mr Scarlett.[269] Some of his comments had been incorporated and some had not.

533. Comparison of the draft texts shows that almost all Sir David Omand's comments were reflected in a further version of the draft Foreword sent by Mr Scarlett to Mr Campbell on 19 September.[270]

534. Mr Campbell replied to Mr Scarlett on 19 September:

> "Re the foreword, I don't like the first sentence which makes him sound a bit James Bond-y. Can we discuss?"[271]

535. In the published version of the Foreword, the first sentence did not include Sir David Omand's proposed amendment.[272]

536. Mr Scarlett sent a "final draft version of the dossier" to Mr Campbell on 20 September.[273] He wrote that the Prime Minister's Foreword was "now incorporated within the overall document".

537. In his letter to Mr Blair of 4 June 2003, Mr Scarlett wrote:

> "The Foreword was drafted by you. I and some JIC members, commented on your draft before it was finalised."[274]

538. In a letter to Mr Tam Dalyell on 16 July 2003, Mr Blair wrote:

> "I have always made it clear that the Foreword was signed by me and was separate to the Executive Summary and the body of the text of the … dossier …
>
> "The Foreword was put to the Chairman of the JIC who confirmed at the time that there was nothing which conflicted with the contents of the dossier."[275]

539. Asked whether he had drafted the Foreword, Mr Campbell told the ISC that normally he, "Jonathan Powell and others would have ideas and we'd probably have a discussion with the Prime Minister".[276] In relation to the Foreword in the dossier, Mr Blair had been "very 'hands on' in terms of what was produced and what was sent … to John Scarlett".

540. Mr Scarlett told the ISC that he had checked and amended the draft Foreword "for factual accuracy and consistency with the text", but he regarded it "as a policy statement by the Prime Minister".[277]

541. Mr Campbell told the Hutton Inquiry that he had "prepared a draft [of the Foreword] based upon a discussion with the Prime Minister, and with others, about what should go into that draft".[278]

542. Asked about how the Foreword had been produced, Mr Blair told the Hutton Inquiry:

> "… as I say in my statement … I would have told Alastair Campbell what are the items I think that are important, specific points that should be in it, on the basis of the drafts produced … I should say at this point that probably my statement [to Parliament on 24 September] was the thing I was concentrating most upon."[279]

543. In his subsequent evidence to the Hutton Inquiry, Mr Campbell confirmed that the Foreword had been drafted on the basis of a discussion with Mr Blair and Mr Campbell's colleagues.[280]

544. Mr Campbell told the Inquiry that Mr Blair had:

> "… said in terms intelligence can't give you the whole picture, intelligence is not necessarily always going to be right, but the intelligence he saw … and as it was explained to him and as he had repeated discussions and

545. Sir Richard Dearlove told the Inquiry that he did not recall seeing the Foreword.[282]

The final version of the dossier

546. Mr Scarlett sent a "final draft version of the dossier" to Mr Campbell on 20 September.[283] He wrote that he had taken account of additional comments received over the last 24 hours, and that he was:

> "… content that the text now reflects as fully and accurately as possible the intelligence picture on Saddam's mass destruction weapons."

547. Copies of the minute and draft dossier were sent to Mr Powell, Sir David Manning, Sir David Omand and "JIC Members".

548. The draft included Mr Blair's Foreword. Other changes from the previous draft included:

- the omission of the Conclusions section;
- amendment of the text on nuclear timelines to clarify that "while sanctions remain effective Iraq would not be able to produce a nuclear weapon. If they were removed or prove ineffective, it would take Iraq at least five years to produce sufficient fissile material for a weapon indigenously";
- removal of the reference to RDDs; and
- omission of the phrase "if he believes his regime is under threat", in relation to the statement that Saddam Hussein would be willing to use chemical and biological weapons.

549. The text in the published version relating to machines which could be used in a gas centrifuge process was not changed.

550. In response to questioning about his decision to omit the qualifying phrase in relation to Saddam Hussein only using chemical and biological weapons if his regime was under attack, and the impact of that omission on the perception of the threat, Mr Scarlett told Lord Hutton that the change "was as a result of the exercise of my professional judgement and that of my colleagues in [the] Assessment Staff".[284] They had been "prompted to look again" at that passage by Mr Powell's email, of 19 September, in the context of the "instructions from the JIC to keep what we were writing in line with standing JIC assessments and also with recent intelligence":

> "When we looked at it again, we realised … that there was no standing JIC assessment which made it clear whether we were defining Saddam's threat … or CW posture … as defensive or offensive. More to the point, there was recent reporting, in addition, which was not reflected here, but which was quite clear reporting, which placed his attachment to CBW and the importance that he placed on it very much in the context of his perception of his regional position, his plan to acquire and maintain regional influence and, as one report, and maybe more, put it: to dominate his neighbours. In other words, the recent intelligence was more complex … Bearing those points in mind, we concluded that this was not right and therefore we took that out."

551. Mr Webb sent Mr Hoon a copy of the draft dossier on 20 September, advising that it had been "given an extremely restricted circulation (essentially JIC members only)" and that he had "no discretion to copy this document further".[285] Arrangements were being made to brief Opposition leaders, Select Committee chairs and junior ministers on 23 September before the debate on 24 September, and key allies.

552. Mr Webb told Mr Hoon that AM French's staff had been "closely associated with the preparation of the detail of the dossier" and he understood they were "content from a professional DIS point of view with the judgements" it contained. The paragraphs on the acquisition of aluminium tubes and nuclear timelines were "more cautious" than US Department of Defence views and no consultation with the US was planned "outside intelligence and White House channels".

553. Mr Webb concluded that he had:

> "… some reservations as a JIC member about citing the Committee's views explicitly (lest we become less usefully direct in our future judgements) but the way this has been achieved has reassured me.
>
> "Overall I am content to recommend the material …"

554. The record of Mr Scarlett's meeting at 1300 on 20 September stated that copies of the dossier would be made available for Cabinet on 23 September.[286]

555. Mr Blair had "committed" Mr Scarlett to provide "an intelligence briefing" for the Chairs of the Foreign Affairs and Defence Select Committees and the Intelligence and Security Committee in the week of 16 September.[287]

556. In a minute to Mr Blair in June 2003, Mr Scarlett wrote:

> "As is natural in the JIC drafting process, there was a debate about a number of issues … but agreement was reached on the final text …"[288]

557. Mr Scarlett also wrote:

> "The JIC agreed that all intelligence-based sections in the document would be submitted to it before they were finalised. The draft assessment was discussed at the JIC on 11 and 18 September. The final draft was circulated to JIC members on 19 September and subsequently agreed by them. It was sent to me by Alastair Campbell on 20 September[289] … I regarded this as the formal moment at which I was taking responsibility for its contents. I noted to Alastair that the draft Conclusion … which had been drafted by me and formed part of earlier versions of the document, had been dropped. I regarded it as superfluous."

558. Mr Scarlett added:

> "At no stage in the drafting process set out above was there an attempt, from No.10 or elsewhere, to overrule the judgements of the JIC or my judgement as the person in charge."[290]

559. Mr Scarlett stated that the minute had been seen by his colleagues on the JIC.

Iraq's denial that it had weapons of mass destruction

Iraq informed Mr Kofi Annan, the UN Secretary-General, on 16 September that it had decided to allow the return of inspectors and that it was ready to discuss the practical arrangements with the UN.[291]

In his speech to the UN General Assembly on 19 September, Dr Naji Sabri, the Iraqi Foreign Minister, offered Iraq's "condolences to the American people, especially the families of the victims" of the 11 September 2001 attacks and told the Security Council that he had been instructed by President Saddam Hussein to convey excerpts from his letter to the General Assembly, which presented "Iraq's position on the latest developments in the relationship between Iraq and the Security Council".[292]

Iraq's position in its letters and statements to the UN, and the UK responses, are addressed in more detail in Section 3.5.

Mr Blair's Foreword

560. In the Foreword to the dossier, Mr Blair emphasised Iraq's WMD capabilities and the potential threat they posed.[293] The full text of the Foreword is set out in the Box below. The Inquiry has highlighted in bold text the points it regards as particularly important in relation to the assessment of Iraq WMD capabilities and intent.

Mr Blair's Foreword to the 24 September dossier

The document published today is based, in large part, on the work of the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC). The JIC is at the heart of the British intelligence machinery. It is chaired by the Cabinet Office and made up of the heads of the UK's three Intelligence and Security Agencies, the Chief of Defence Intelligence, and senior officials from key government departments. For over 60 years the JIC has provided regular assessments to successive Prime Ministers and senior colleagues on a wide range of foreign policy and international security issues.[294]

Its work, like the material it analyses, is largely secret. It is unprecedented for the Government to publish this kind of document but in the light of the debate about Iraq and Weapons of Mass Destruction (WMD), I wanted to share with the British public the reasons why I believe this issue to be a current and serious threat to the UK national interest.

In recent months, I have been increasingly alarmed by the evidence from inside Iraq that despite sanctions, despite the damage done to his capability in the past, despite the UN Security Council resolutions expressly outlawing it, and despite his denials, Saddam Hussein is continuing to develop WMD, and with them the ability to inflict real damage on the region, and the stability of the world.

Gathering intelligence from inside Iraq is not easy. Saddam's is one of the most secretive and dictatorial regimes in the world. So I believe people will understand why the Agencies cannot be specific about the sources, which have formed the judgements in this document, and why we cannot publish everything we know. We cannot, of course, publish the detailed raw intelligence. I and other Ministers have been briefed in detail on the intelligence and are satisfied as to its authority. I also want to pay tribute to our Intelligence and Security Services for the often extraordinary work that they do.

[293] Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction. The Assessment of the British Government, 24 September 2002, page 3.
[294] The role and composition of the JIC is set out in Section 2.

What I believe the assessed intelligence has established beyond doubt is that Saddam has continued to produce chemical and biological weapons, that he continues in his efforts to develop nuclear weapons, and that he has been able to extend the range of his ballistic missile programme. I also believe that, as stated in the document, Saddam will now do his utmost to try to conceal his weapons from UN inspectors.

The picture presented to me by the JIC in recent months has become more not less worrying. It is clear that, despite sanctions, the policy of containment has not worked sufficiently well to prevent Saddam from developing these weapons.

I am in no doubt that the threat is serious and current, that he has made progress on WMD, and that he has to be stopped.

Saddam has used chemical weapons, not only against an enemy state, but against his own people. Intelligence reports make clear that he sees the building up of his WMD capability, and the belief overseas that he would use these weapons, as vital to his strategic interests, and in particular his goal of regional domination. And the document discloses that his military planning allows for some of the WMD to be ready within 45 minutes of an order to use them.

I am quite clear that Saddam will go to extreme lengths, indeed has already done so, to hide these weapons and avoid giving them up.

In today's interdependent world, a major regional conflict does not stay confined to the region in question. Faced with someone who has shown himself capable of using WMD, I believe the international community has to stand up for itself and ensure its authority is upheld.

The threat posed to international peace and security, when WMD are in the hands of a brutal and aggressive regime like Saddam's, is real. Unless we face up to the threat, not only do we risk undermining the authority of the UN, whose resolutions he defies, but more importantly and in the longer term, we place at risk the lives and prosperity of our own people.

The case I make is that the UN resolutions demanding he stops his WMD programme are being flouted; that since the inspectors left four years ago, he has continued with this programme; that the inspectors must be allowed back in to do their job properly; and that if he refuses, or if he makes it impossible for them to do their job, as he has done in the past, the international community will have to act.

I believe that faced with the information available to me, the UK Government has been right to support the demands that this issue be confronted and dealt with. We must ensure that he does not get to use the weapons he has, or get hold of the weapons he wants.

Key points in the dossier

561. As discussed by the JIC on 11 September, the dossier highlighted the contribution which recent intelligence had made to the assessment of Iraq's activity since 1998 and on Saddam Hussein's readiness to deploy and use chemical and biological weapons.

562. The Executive Summary of the Iraq dossier stated that, in addition to the public evidence on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missiles, the Government had "significant additional information … from secret intelligence sources" which, although it could not "tell us about everything", provided "a fuller picture of Iraqi plans and capabilities".[295]

563. In the chapter on the role of intelligence, the dossier stated that intelligence had "provided important insights into Iraqi programmes and Iraqi military thinking", and that:

> "Taken together with what is already known from other sources, this intelligence builds our understanding of Iraq's capabilities and adds significantly to the analysis in the public domain."

564. The dossier stated that the chapter on the current position set out "what we know of Saddam Hussein's chemical, biological, nuclear and ballistic missile programmes, drawing on all the available evidence".[296] It drew "heavily on the latest intelligence about Iraqi efforts to develop their programmes and capabilities since 1998" to support a list of "main conclusions", including that Saddam Hussein continued:

> "… to attach great importance to the possession of weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missiles which he regards as being the basis for Iraq's regional power. He is determined to retain these capabilities …"

CHEMICAL AND BIOLOGICAL WEAPONS

565. The dossier stated that, by 1991, Iraq had produced more than 16,000 free-fall bombs and more than 110,000 artillery rockets and shells for the delivery of chemical and biological agents.[297] It had also admitted to having 50 chemical and 25 biological warheads available for ballistic missiles.

566. UNSCOM had destroyed 30 of the warheads filled with chemical agents.[298] It had also destroyed chemical munitions, agent and precursors and biological seed stocks and growth media, and dismantled or destroyed chemical and biological production facilities.

567. The dossier challenged Iraq's claims that chemical agents produced before 1991 would have deteriorated sufficiently to render them harmless and that it had destroyed all its biological weapons and agent.[299]

[299] Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction. The Assessment of the British Government, 24 September 2002, page 19.

568. Addressing the chemical and biological weapons and material Iraq might have produced or obtained, which UNSCOM had been unable to account for when it left, the dossier quoted the figures given to Parliament by Mr Straw on 2 May 2002, including "over 30,000 special munitions for delivery of chemical and biological agents.[300] It added:

> "The departure of UNSCOM meant that the international community was unable to establish the truth behind these large discrepancies and greatly diminished its ability to monitor and assess Iraq's continuing attempts to reconstitute its programmes."

569. In respect of chemical and biological weapons, the Executive Summary stated:

> "As a result of that intelligence, we judge that Iraq has:
>
> - continued to produce chemical and biological agents;
> - military plans for the use of chemical and biological weapons, including against its own Shia population. Some of these weapons are deployable within 45 minutes of an order to use them;
> - command and control arrangements in place to use chemical and biological weapons. Authority ultimately resides with Saddam Hussein. (There is intelligence that he may have delegated this authority to his son Qusay);
> - developed mobile laboratories for military use, corroborating earlier reports about the mobile production of biological warfare agents;
> - pursued illegal programmes to procure controlled material of potential use in the production of chemical and biological weapons programmes …"[301]

570. In its "main conclusions", the dossier stated:

- "Iraq has a usable chemical and biological weapons capability … which has included recent production of chemical and biological agents."
- "Iraq can deliver chemical and biological agents using an extensive range of artillery shells, free-fall bombs, sprayers and ballistic missiles."
- "Iraq's military forces are able to use chemical and biological weapons, with command, control and logistical arrangements in place. The Iraqi military are able to deploy these weapons within 45 minutes of a decision to do so."[302]

571. In the main text, the dossier stated that the JIC had, in the last six months, "confirmed its earlier judgements on Iraqi chemical and biological warfare capabilities and assessed that Iraq has the means to deliver chemical and biological weapons".[303]

[303] Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction. The Assessment of the British Government, 24 September 2002, page 18.

572. In a section on "Recent Intelligence", the dossier stated:

"Subsequently intelligence has become available from reliable sources which complements and adds to previous intelligence and confirms the JIC assessment that Iraq has chemical and biological weapons. The intelligence also shows that the Iraqi leadership has been discussing a number of issues related to these weapons. This intelligence covers:

- Confirmation that chemical and biological weapons play an important role in Iraqi military thinking: intelligence shows that Saddam attaches great importance to the possession of chemical and biological weapons which he regards as being the basis for Iraqi regional power. He believes that respect for Iraq rests on its possession of these weapons and the missiles capable of delivering them. Intelligence indicates that Saddam is determined to retain this capability and recognises that Iraqi political weight would be diminished if Iraq's military power rested solely on its conventional military forces.
- Iraq's attempts to retain its existing banned weapon systems: Iraq is already taking steps to prevent the UN weapons inspectors finding evidence of its chemical and biological weapons programme. Intelligence indicates that Saddam has learnt lessons from previous weapons inspections, has identified possible weak points in the inspections process and knows how to exploit them. Sensitive equipment and papers can easily be concealed and in some cases this is already happening. The possession of mobile biological agent production facilities will also aid concealment efforts. Saddam is determined not to lose the capabilities that he has been able to develop further in the four years since inspectors left.
- Saddam's willingness to use chemical and biological weapons: intelligence indicates that as part of Iraq's military planning Saddam is willing to use chemical and biological weapons, including against his own Shia population. Intelligence indicates that the Iraqi military are able to deploy chemical and biological weapons within 45 minutes of an order to do so."[304]

573. In a section on "Chemical agent: production facilities", the dossier stated: "Intelligence shows that Iraq has continued to produce chemical agent."[305]

574. In a similar section on "Biological agent: production facilities", the dossier stated: "We know from intelligence that Iraq has continued to produce biological warfare agents."[306]

[306] Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction. The Assessment of the British Government, 24 September 2002, page 21.

575. The dossier also stated:

"UNSCOM established that Iraq considered the use of mobile biological agent production facilities. In the past two years evidence from defectors has indicated the existence of such facilities. Recent intelligence confirms that the Iraqi military have developed mobile facilities."[307]

576. Summarising the section on chemical and biological weapons, the dossier stated:

"Intelligence shows that Iraq has covert chemical and biological weapons programmes … and has continued to produce chemical and biological agents. Iraq has:

- chemical and biological weapons available, both from pre-Gulf War stocks and more recent production;
- the capability to produce the chemical agents …
- a biological agent production capability … Iraq has also developed mobile facilities to produce biological agents;
- …"[308]

NUCLEAR WEAPONS

577. The dossier stated that Iraq's aim pre-1991 "was to produce a missile warhead with a 20-kiloton yield and weapons designs were produced for the simplest implosion weapons".[309] Iraq had pursued a number of programmes to produce highly enriched uranium, for the warhead. The enrichment programmes had made little progress before the Gulf Conflict, but the nuclear programme was supported by a large body of expertise, programme documentation and databases and manufacturing infrastructure.

578. In respect of nuclear weapons, the Executive Summary stated:

"Iraq had:

- tried covertly to acquire technology and materials which could be used in the production of nuclear weapons;
- sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa, despite having no active civil nuclear power programme that could require it;
- recalled specialists to work on its nuclear programme".[310]

[310] Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction. The Assessment of the British Government, 24 September 2002, page 6.

579. In its "main conclusions", the dossier stated:

> "Iraq continues to work on developing nuclear weapons … Uranium has been sought from Africa that has no civil nuclear application …"[311]

580. The dossier stated that the JIC assessed that Iraq had continued its nuclear research after 1998 and "drew attention to intelligence that Iraq had recalled its nuclear scientists to the programme in 1998". "Since 1998 Iraq had been trying to procure items that could be for use in the construction of centrifuges …"[312]

581. In a section on "Iraq's nuclear weapons expertise", the dossier stated:

- The IAEA had dismantled the physical infrastructure of Iraq's nuclear weapons and removed the remaining highly enriched uranium, "But Iraq retained, and retains many of its experienced nuclear scientists and technicians who are specialised in the production of fissile material and weapon design. Intelligence indicates that Iraq also retains the accompanying programme documentation and data."
- "Intelligence shows that the present Iraqi programme is almost certainly seeking an indigenous capability to enrich uranium for a nuclear weapon …"
- "Following the departure of the inspectors in 1998 there has been an accumulation of intelligence indicating that Iraq is making concerted covert efforts to acquire dual-use technology and material with nuclear applications."
- "Iraq's known holdings of processed uranium are under IAEA supervision. But there is intelligence that Iraq has sought the supply of significant quantities of uranium from Africa. Iraq has no … legitimate reason to acquire uranium."
- Intelligence showed that Iraq had attempted to purchase other items that could be used in a nuclear programme, including "repeated attempts covertly to acquire a very large quantity (60,000 or more) of specialised aluminium tubes" with a "potential application in the construction of gas centrifuges used to enrich uranium, although there is no definitive intelligence that it is destined for a nuclear programme".[313]

582. The judgements in the dossier about the timelines Iraq would need to acquire a nuclear weapon are addressed earlier in this Section.

BALLISTIC MISSILES

583. In respect of ballistic missiles, the Executive Summary stated:

"As a result of that intelligence, we judge that Iraq has:

- illegally retained up to 20 Al Hussein missiles, with a range of 650km, capable of carrying chemical or biological warheads;
- started deploying its Al Samoud liquid propellant missile, and has used the absence of weapons inspectors to work on extending its range to at least 200km …
- started producing the … Ababil-100, and is making efforts to extend its range to at least 200km …
- constructed a new engine test stand for the development of missiles capable of reaching the UK Sovereign Base Areas in Cyprus and NATO members (Greece and Turkey), as well as all Iraq's Gulf neighbours and Israel;
- pursued illegal programmes to procure materials for use in its illegal development of long-range missiles …"[314]

584. In its "main conclusions", the dossier stated:

"Iraq possesses extended-range versions of the SCUD ballistic missile … which are capable of reaching Cyprus, Eastern Turkey, Tehran and Israel. It is also developing longer-range missiles …"[315]

585. The dossier stated that the JIC:

- drew attention in mid-2001 to a "step change" in progress on Iraq's missile programme over the preceding two years, and that "work was under way on larger engines for longer-range missiles"; and
- concluded in early 2002 that "Iraq had begun to develop missiles with a range of over 1,000kms", but it assessed that "if sanctions remained effective", Iraq "would not be able to produce such a missile before 2007".

586. In a section on Iraq's ballistic missile programme since 1998, the dossier stated:

- Iraq had retained up to 20 Al Hussein missiles that "could be used with conventional, chemical or biological warheads and, with a range of 650km are capable of reaching a number of countries in the region including Cyprus".
- "Intelligence has confirmed that Iraq wants to extend the range of its missiles systems to over 1,000km, enabling it to threaten other regional neighbours."
- "Iraq's missile programmes employ hundreds of people."

- The engine test facility being constructed at al-Rafah would "be capable of testing engines" with ranges over 1,000km and "would not be needed" for systems within the 150km permitted range.
- Iraq had "managed to rebuild much of the missile production infrastructure" destroyed in 1991 and 1998 and new missile-related infrastructure was "under construction".
- "Despite a UN embargo, Iraq has also made concerted efforts to acquire additional production technology …"[316]

FUNDING FOR THE WMD PROGRAMME

587. The Executive Summary of the dossier stated that Iraq had an illegal income of some US$3bn from "illicit earnings generated outside UN control".[317]

588. The dossier acknowledged that the proportion of those funds that was used to develop or acquire military equipment was unknown, but stated:

> "… we have seen no evidence that Iraqi attempts to develop its weapons of mass destruction and its ballistic missile programme … has been inhibited in any way by lack of funds. The steady increase [in illicit funds] over the last three years in the availability of funds will enable Saddam to progress the programmes faster."

Questions about the judgements in the dossier

589. The judgements expressed in the dossier and how they were reached have already been examined by the Foreign Affairs Committee, the Intelligence and Security Committee (ISC) and Inquiries led by Lord Hutton and Lord Butler.

590. The report of the House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee (FAC), The Decision to go to War in Iraq (HC 813-1), was published on 7 July 2003.[318] It sought to "establish whether the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO), within the Government as a whole, presented accurate and complete information to Parliament in the period leading up to military action in Iraq, particularly in respect of weapons of mass destruction".

591. The report of the Intelligence and Security Committee (ISC), Iraqi Weapons of Mass Destruction – Intelligence and Assessments (Cm 5972), was published in September 2003.[319] The ISC stated that it had "looked at the supporting intelligence in critical areas to ensure that the [JIC] Assessments reflected the intelligence correctly".

592. The Report of the Inquiry into the Circumstances Surrounding the Death of Dr David L Kelly CMG by Lord Hutton ("The Hutton Inquiry", HC 247), was published on 28 January 2004.[320]

593. In relation to the question of whether the judgements were improperly influenced by Mr Campbell or No.10, Lord Hutton concluded:

> "Mr Campbell made it clear to Mr Scarlett on behalf of the Prime Minister that 10 Downing Street wanted the dossier to be worded to make as strong a case as possible in relation to the threat posed by Saddam Hussein's WMD, and 10 Downing Street made written suggestions to Mr Scarlett as to changes in the wording of the draft dossier which would strengthen it. But Mr Campbell recognised, and told Mr Scarlett that 10 Downing Street recognised, that nothing should be stated in the dossier with which the intelligence community were not entirely happy.
> "Mr Scarlett accepted some of the drafting amendments suggested to him by 10 Downing Street but he only accepted those suggestions which were consistent with the intelligence known to the JIC and he rejected those suggestions which were not consistent with such intelligence and the dossier … was approved by the JIC.
> "As the dossier was one to be presented to, and read by, Parliament and the public … I do not consider that it was improper for Mr Scarlett and the JIC to take into account suggestions as to drafting made by 10 Downing Street and to adopt those suggestions if they were consistent with the intelligence available to the JIC. However I consider that the possibility cannot be completely ruled out that the desire of the Prime Minister to have a dossier which, whilst consistent with the available intelligence, was as strong as possible in relation to the threat posed by Saddam Hussein's WMD, may have subconsciously influenced Mr Scarlett and other members of the JIC to make the wording of the dossier somewhat stronger than it would have been if it had been contained in a normal JIC Assessment. Although this possibility cannot be completely ruled out, I am satisfied that Mr Scarlett, the other members of the JIC, and the members of the Assessment Staff engaged in the drafting of the dossier were concerned to ensure that the contents of the dossier were consistent with the intelligence available to the JIC.

> "The term 'sexed-up' is a slang expression, the meaning of which lacks clarity in the context of the discussion of the dossier. It is capable of two different meanings.

> It could mean that the dossier was embellished with items of intelligence known or believed to be false or unreliable … or it could mean … that the dossier was drafted in such a way as to make the case against Saddam Hussein as strong as the intelligence contained in it permitted. If the term is used in this latter sense, then because of the drafting suggestions made by 10 Downing Street for the purpose of making a strong case against Saddam Hussein, it could be said that the Government 'sexed up' the dossier. However … I consider that the allegation … that the dossier had been embellished with intelligence known or believed to be false or unreliable, which was not the case."[321]

594. The Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction by a Committee of Privy Counsellors chaired by Lord Butler of Brockwell ("The Butler Report", HC 8980), was published on 14 July 2004.[322]

595. Describing the purpose of the dossier, the Butler Report stated:

> "… the dossier was not intended to make the case for a particular course of action in relation to Iraq. It was intended by the Government to promote domestic and international understanding of, and gain support for, the general direction in which Government policy had been moving since the early months of 2002, away from containment to a more proactive approach to enforcing Iraqi disarmament."[323]

596. The Butler Report also stated:

- "The Government wanted a document on which it could draw in its advocacy of its policy. The JIC sought to offer a dispassionate assessment of intelligence and other material on Iraqi nuclear, biological, chemical and ballistic missile programmes."[324]
- "… the language of the dossier may have left with readers the impression that there was fuller and firmer intelligence behind the judgements than was the case: our view, having reviewed all of the material, is that judgements in the dossier went to (although not beyond) the outer limits of the intelligence available. The Prime Minister's description in his statement to the House of Commons … [on 24 September] of the picture painted by the intelligence services in the dossier as 'extensive, detailed and authoritative' may have reinforced this impression."[325]

597. The Iraq Inquiry has drawn on the evidence offered to those Inquiries, and their analysis and conclusions, in reaching a view on the aspects of the dossier addressed in the following paragraphs.

Defence Intelligence Staff concerns

598. During the drafting of the dossier, questions were raised by staff in the DIS about the basis for the judgements on Iraq's chemical and biological weapons capabilities and its intent to use chemical and biological weapons.

599. The DIS comments on the draft dossier on 17 September, expressing concerns that some of the statements on chemical and biological weapons in the draft could not be substantiated by the intelligence seen by the DIS, which were discussed in Mr Miller's meeting that morning, are set out earlier in this Section.

600. Mr Miller confirmed that no minute was taken of the meeting.[326]

601. Mr Scarlett told the Hutton Inquiry that the DIS comments had been discussed by the formal drafting group on 17 September and that:

> "They were dealt with within that process and they were not brought forward by the DIS senior management to the level of the JIC."[327]

602. Mr Cragg told the Hutton Inquiry that, at the meeting on 17 September, "it was agreed that the SIS representative would make further representations" to the DIS about the "very tightly held intelligence [the report of 11 September]" and that the SIS representative had spoken to Dr Paul Roper, DIS Director of Science and Technology, and told him that "SIS believed it was good intelligence".[328]

603. Mr Cragg told Lord Hutton that it was reported to him that the concern about the discontinuity between the main text of the dossier and the Executive Summary had been:

> "… put … down to the fact that the Executive Summary pulled together or reflected not merely recent intelligence which was … contained in the main text, but also the general context of the new intelligence which had been received, such as the knowledge, which we had had for many years, of the capabilities of the Iraqis in their use of chemical weapons and also our knowledge that they had commander control arrangements for the use of these weapons in place."[329]

604. Mr Scarlett subsequently told the Hutton Inquiry that, after the meeting on 17 September, Mr Miller had reported the DIS concerns about the statements on the production of "CW agent", because it related to "the existence of additional compartmented intelligence [the SIS report of 11 September]", which had not been seen by the DIS, "which was underpinning the judgement".[330] He had been told that arrangements had been made to brief "DIS management" on the intelligence. Mr Scarlett added that, in the absence of comment on that point in the DIS comments on the draft dossier on 19 September, silence had been taken as assent.

605. Sir John Scarlett told the Iraq Inquiry that he "was aware that there had been questioning from within the DIS about the fact that they hadn't seen the compartmented [11 September] report". He and Mr Miller had "agreed that it would be necessary" for the DIS to be shown the report and, as far as he was concerned, "that happened" and there was "no further awareness" on his part.[331]

606. In a minute on 19 September to Dr Roper, Dr Brian Jones, the branch head of the nuclear, biological and chemical section in the Scientific and Technical Directorate of the Defence Intelligence Staff, wrote:

> "1. … the generation of the Iraqi dossier which, in the last two weeks has involved a number of iterations which have incorporated new intelligence. It is my understanding that some of the intelligence has not been made available to my branch. Because of this they have had to express their reservations on several aspects of the dossier. Most of these have been resolved. However a number remain … and it is important that I note for you at this stage the remaining areas where we are unable to confirm the statements made on the basis of the information available to my branch.
> "2. Although we have no problem with a judgement based on intelligence that Saddam attaches great importance to possessing WMD we have not seen the intelligence that 'shows' this to be the case. Nor have we seen intelligence that 'shows' he does not regard them only as a weapon of last resort, although our judgement is that it would be sensible to assume that he might use them in a number of other scenarios. The intelligence we have seen indicates rather than 'shows' that Iraq has been planning to conceal its WMD capabilities, and it would be … reasonable to assume that he would do this.
> "3. We have a number of questions in our minds relating to the intelligence on military plans for the use of chemical and biological weapons, particularly about the times mentioned and the failure to differentiate between the two types of weapon.
> "4. We have not seen intelligence which we believe 'shows' that Iraq has continued to produce CW agent in 1998-2002, although our judgement is that it has probably done so. Whilst we are even more convinced that Iraq has continued to produce BW agent (on the basis of mobile production intelligence) we would not go so far as to say that we 'know' this to be the case.

> "5. Finally … we are pleased that the claim that Iraq used aflatoxin against the Shia uprising has been excluded from the dossier but we are concerned that the claim in relation to mustard remains as we consider the evidence to be weak."[332]

607. Dr Jones sent a copy of his minute to the office of Mr Cragg and others in the Defence Intelligence Staff.

608. The following day, the chemical warfare expert in Dr Jones' team wrote to Dr Roper setting out in detail his concerns about aspects of the dossier.[333]

609. In relation to the statement in the draft Foreword, that Mr Blair believed that the "assessed intelligence has established beyond doubt" that "Saddam has continued to produce chemical and biological weapons", the minute stated:

> "I acknowledge that in this statement the Prime Minister will be expressing his own 'belief' about what the assessed intelligence has established. What I wish to record is that based on the intelligence available to me it has NOT established beyond doubt that Saddam has continued to produce chemical [and biological] weapons."

610. Addressing the statement in the Foreword that "military planning allows for some of the WMD to be ready within 45 minutes of an order to use them", and a "similar statement" in the dossier, the minute stated:

> "This is reported as a fact whereas the intelligence comes from a single source. In my view the intelligence warrants no stronger a statement than '… intelligence suggest that military planning allows …'"

611. Addressing the judgement in paragraph 6 of the Executive Summary, that Iraq had "continued to produce chemical and biological agents", the minute stated:

> "I have seen intelligence that suggests that production of chemical agents has continued but in my judgement this warrants no stronger statement than 'Iraq has … probably continued to produce chemical [and biological] agents.'"

612. Addressing the judgement in paragraph 6 of the Executive Summary, that "Some of these weapons are deployable within 45 minutes of an order to use them", the minute stated:

> "It is not clear what is meant … The judgement is too strong considering the intelligence on which it is based."

---

[332] Minute Jones to Roper, 19 September 2002, 'Iraq Dossier'.
[333] Minute [DIS junior official] to DIST, 20 September 2002, 'Iraq Dossier'.

613. In relation to statements in Chapter 3 of the dossier, the minute stated:

- Paragraph 1, first bullet: the "statement about 'recent production of chemical [and biological] agents'" could not "be supported" by the intelligence available to the author.
- Paragraph 5, first bullet: the author believed that the statement that "Intelligence shows that Saddam attaches great importance to the possession of chemical [and biological] weapons" was "far too strong" and "in contrast to other statements in this paragraph which use the term 'intelligence indicates that' which is more balanced".
- Paragraph 8, first bullet: the intelligence available to the author warranted a statement "no stronger" than "Iraq has probably continued to produce chemical agent", not the statement that "Intelligence shows that Iraq has continued to produce chemical agent."

614. The minute was copied to Mr Cragg's office and to Dr Jones.

615. Dr Jones told Lord Hutton that the "problems" with the 45 minutes report of 30 August "fell into three categories". The information was "second-hand"; it "did not differentiate between … chemical … or … biological weapons"; and there was "a lack of collateral intelligence".[334]

616. Dr Jones explained that the circumstances in which it would be important to deliver biological weapons within 45 minutes "would be fairly special circumstances" and that "had pushed us into thinking perhaps we were talking about chemical weapons". It was "easy" to put chemical and biological weapons:

> "… together in a collective term … But there was an element of doubt coming into our analysis … We would have looked, normally, for further definitions to feel really comfortable …"

617. Dr Jones also stated that they had been "worried" by the absence of evidence relating to the production of chemical agents and that:

> "We had not seen the weapons being produced. We had no evidence of any recent testing or field trials … So that all cast some doubts in our mind on that particular piece of intelligence."

618. Dr Jones told Lord Hutton that he thought the intelligence was "important" but the references in the draft dossier were "too strong". It was:

> "… reasonable to say that the intelligence indicated that this was the case … but … we did not think the intelligence showed it absolutely beyond any shadow of doubt."

---

[334] The National Archives, 28 January 2004, Report of the Inquiry into the Circumstances Surrounding the Death of Dr David Kelly ["The Hutton Report"], paragraph 190.

619. Dr Jones told Lord Hutton that he had been informed of the concerns of his staff about the statements on the "continued production of chemical and biological agents"; and that there "was said to be additional intelligence that actually had it been available to us would have removed those concerns".[335] He had discussed the issue with his Director, Dr Roper. Dr Roper had not seen the intelligence but "a senior official from one of the … agencies" had "suggested to him that the intelligence judgements that were being made in the dossier were in fact okay because … they were supported by the additional intelligence". Dr Jones added that he had said the DIS should express a reservation about the language.

620. Dr Jones subsequently stated that his staff had "no evidence that significant production had taken place either of chemical warfare agent or chemical weapons".[336]

621. Dr Jones also stated that the DIS had "not seen the weapons being produced. We had no evidence of any recent testing or field trials …"[337]

622. Asked what he had done following receipt of Dr Jones' minute, Mr Cragg told the Hutton Inquiry that he had:

> "… taken the view that on the question of the 45 minutes and of the chemical weapon production, this had already been considered at length with the Cabinet Office in their meeting of 17 September and that I was satisfied with the decisions reached and consequently with the wording of the dossier at that point. On the … importance attached to the possession of chemical weapons, the absence of proof … they are not seen … as weapons of last resort. And the absence of … definitive proof, that efforts are being made to conceal them. I took the view on each of those there had been much intelligence over the years, not merely in the last few weeks … which sustained the view taken in the dossier."[338]

623. Asked whether Dr Jones' minute of 19 September 2002 was "strong language for intelligence personnel", Mr Cragg replied:

> "Yes. I was quite surprised to receive the minute because … we had tried to explain what the situation was, certainly on the production issue and, as far as I can tell also perhaps, although I am not certain, on the 45 minutes."[339]

624. Mr Cragg stated that he had "taken the view that since all the issues had either been discussed with the Cabinet Office or were well within the general thrust of known intelligence that it was not necessary to raise the issue with Mr Scarlett".[340]

625. Mr Cragg stated:

> "… the dossier reflected the JIC Assessments on the recent intelligence; and the JIC Assessments were an accurate reflection, put into context, of the intelligence itself. So it was a flow of perfectly reputable intelligence conveyed by the Assessment Staff and ourselves into the JIC Assessment and thence into the dossier.
>
> "… I am quite sure … the dossier … does not go beyond … available intelligence."[341]

626. Mr Cragg stated that he had subsequently held a meeting with the Director of Global Issues, the Director of Science and Technology and the DIS staff who had attended the Assessment Staff meeting. He had been told, in relation to the 45 minute intelligence:

> "… firstly, on the actual detailed intelligence, recent intelligence underpinning the main text and partly the Executive Summary, that the Secret Intelligence Service, SIS, were satisfied that the source was established and reliable and … they supported the reporting, which had already been included in a JIC Assessment on 9 September.
>
> "… My staff also reported … there had been a discussion … of the general context in which the new intelligence had appeared which convinced them that it was quite reasonable to take the line they did in Executive Summary concerning the likelihood or the capability of the Iraqis to deploy weapons of mass destruction within 45 minutes of a decision to do so.
>
> "… I understand from my staff that there was a discussion of the validity of the source, which would almost certainly have included whether it was single source."

627. Mr Cragg added that a:

> "… single source has to be looked at with some care; but this was a known source, established and reliable with a good reporting record. And the statements he was making, the intelligence he was providing was well in context of known Iraqi approaches.
>
>
> "So in that sense – I think Mr Scarlett said it fairly clearly – there were no qualms about including this reporting."

---

[341] The National Archives, 28 January 2004, Report of the Inquiry into the Circumstances Surrounding the Death of Dr David Kelly ["The Hutton Report"], paragraph 197.

628. AM French confirmed to the Hutton Inquiry that, having seen Dr Jones' minute of 19 September, he had been content with the dossier.[342]

629. In response to a question about whether Mr Scarlett had "tightened" the language in the dossier in the draft of 18 September, to take account of the points raised by Mr Campbell in his minute of 17 September rather than the points raised by the DIS the same day, Mr Cragg replied: "Yes."[343]

630. Asked about the way in which he had dealt with the comments provided by the DIS and Mr Campbell on 17 September, Mr Scarlett told the Hutton Inquiry that the issues raised by the DIS had been discussed in Mr Miller's meeting before Mr Campbell's minute was received.[344]

631. Mr Scarlett told Lord Hutton that the intelligence on weapons being available for use within 45 minutes "came from an established and reliable source quoting a senior Iraqi military officer in a position to know this information".[345] It had been "judged straight away that the intelligence was consistent with established JIC judgements on the command control and logistical arrangements and capabilities of the Iraqi armed forces … [F]or the first time in our reporting it gave a particular time, gave some precision."

632. Mr Scarlett stated that:

- It had been agreed that the Assessments Staff would look again at the Assessment and the intelligence report to "bring the text … into line with what the Assessment and the intelligence said".
- In relation to the DIS suggestion that the wording in the Executive Summary should be qualified by adding "intelligence suggests that", the Assessments Staff had taken the view that "it was not possible to qualify" its judgement in that way: "It was not a summary of the main points in the text, it was a judgement."

633. Mr Scarlett stated that the main text in the dossier was redrafted to reflect the "original intelligence which contained no caveat of uncertainty" and the JIC Assessment.[346]

634. The JIC Assessment of 9 September stated:

> "Iraq has probably dispersed its special weapons, including its CBW weapons. Intelligence also indicates that chemical and biological munitions could be with military units and ready for firing within 20-45 minutes."[347]

635. In response to a series of questions intended to elicit whether the "assessors" should have had regard to the fact that they did not know to which munitions the report referred, where they were, and that the information was second-hand, albeit relayed through a reliable intermediary, Mr Scarlett replied:

> "You are talking as if the assessors … operate in a vacuum. They do not. They are assessing individual reports against the background of their knowledge. This was a point of precision, to an assessment which already existed about the capability of the Iraqi armed forces in this area."[348]

636. Mr Scarlett subsequently stated: "The sentence in the [JIC] Assessment was referring to the intelligence report … It was not looking at it in the wider context." That was "taken into account in the main body of the text" but the judgement in the Executive Summary "was a different point"; it did "not just confine itself to one intelligence report".

637. The Iraq Inquiry wrote to Air Chief Marshal Sir Joe French, Mr Cragg, and Dr Roper asking a number of specific questions about whether they had seen or been briefed on the report of 11 September, and with whom they had discussed the issues that arose.

638. In his statement, ACM French confirmed that he had seen the 11 September report but he "did not receive any further briefing on it".[349] He had not discussed the distribution of the report with either Mr Cragg or Dr Roper and could not "remember receiving any advice or briefing" on it from them. Nor could he "remember detail of the discussion" at any JIC meeting.

639. Asked whether he had asked for the report to be made available to the relevant experts in the DIS for their assessment, ACM French wrote:

> "Given the way the compilation of the dossier was being handled with the involvement of the specialists/experts from across the intelligence community, including the DIS, I would have expected them to [be] given the background to this intelligence if not access to the report itself. This was a regular occurrence where intelligence initially on limited distribution would be shared at the experts level to allow common understanding of issues for the drafting of cross intelligence community reports and studies commissioned by the JIC."

640. ACM French also wrote that he had not discussed the concerns raised by DIS staff with Mr Scarlett, Mr Miller, or any member of the Assessments Staff. He could not "remember the specific discussion" with Mr Cragg or Dr Roper but added:

"… in the regular staffing of JIC papers, the dossier included, it was not unusual for subject matter experts to have differences of opinion over the emphasis given to specific strands of intelligence and those concerns would be raised with me for consideration before final clearance."

641. Asked on what basis he had given formal DIS endorsement to the judgements in the dossier given the advice of some members of the DIS that the final draft was, in some respects, stronger than the intelligence indicated, ACM French wrote:

"The fact that individuals expressed concern was part of the usual process of debate and assessment which went on regularly within the DIS and within the wider intelligence community as a prelude to a consensus being reached by the JIC. My judgement was that the well tried due process had been followed and I was content with the final draft of the dossier."

642. In his statement to the Iraq Inquiry, Mr Cragg wrote that he had not seen the report and that he had had "no discussions at the time" with "anybody" about its contents and implications because he "had not received it or had any knowledge of its contents or source".[350] He had "asked Dr Roper to inform Dr Jones … of the strict compartmenting of the report at the earliest opportunity".

643. Asked about his response to the concerns raised by DIS staff, Mr Cragg wrote that he had had "a brief discussion with Dr Roper on 17 September about the [DIS] comments on the draft of 16 September". He had "interrupted a meeting" he was holding with Dr Roper and the DIS Director of Global Issues on 17 September to allow them to hear an account of the meeting held by Mr Miller. The DIS officials who had attended the meeting reported that "the SIS participant had informed them that particularly sensitive intelligence on the production of chemical and biological agent had very recently been received which supported the formulation in the draft"; and that Mr Miller "had concurred" with that. The SIS representative had also informed them that the distribution would be extremely limited.

644. Mr Cragg did not attend the JIC meeting on 11 September. He wrote that the 11 September SIS report was not discussed at the JIC meeting on 18 September.

645. Mr Cragg saw a copy of Dr Jones' minute to Dr Roper of 19 September in which he stated that he and his staff "considered that in their judgement Iraq was probably producing chemical and biological agents but they had not seen the intelligence to 'show' this". Dr Jones also reported that they "were even more convinced that Iraq had continued to produce biological agents but that they would not go so far as to say that they 'know' this".

646. Mr Cragg wrote that he had not discussed the minute with Dr Jones or Dr Roper "because I read it after the working day and saw it as reiterating that neither he [Dr Jones] nor his staff had seen the compartmented intelligence to support the formulation in the draft, while at the same time confirming that the judgement of the dossier on this issue was probably right". He did not raise the matter with Mr Scarlett, Mr Miller or the Assessments Staff, "because it was well known to the drafters of the dossier that the DIS' scientific staff had not seen the recent compartmented intelligence on the current production of chemical and biological agent".

647. Mr Cragg was absent from the office from 20 to 24 September. He wrote that he was:

> "… satisfied with the draft of 19 September, which was substantially the same as that of 20 September. I took the view that the judgement in the dossier on the current production of chemical and biological agent in the Executive Summary and the formulation in the main text was justified by the available intelligence on production, including in the JIC Assessment of 9 September and my awareness that the compartmented intelligence was seen as reliable. It was also consistent with our overall assessment of Iraqi WMD capabilities."

648. In his statement to the Iraq Inquiry, Dr Roper confirmed that he had discussed Dr Jones' minute of 19 September with him on 23 September and that he could not:

> "… recall all that was discussed; I sensed he was annoyed that so much had been happening whilst he had been away. I do remember asking him a specific question along the lines of 'Are you telling me you do not believe there is WMD in Iraq?' His reply was along the line: 'No I am not saying that, on balance I believe there is WMD in Iraq but not with the degree of conviction implied in the draft dossier'."[351]

649. Dr Roper wrote that Mr Cragg had raised Dr Jones' letter with him "possibly later that day [23 September]". Dr Roper described Mr Cragg as "annoyed" that the letter had been sent; and that Mr Cragg "seemed content" when Dr Roper relayed the gist of his conversation with Dr Jones.

---

[351] Statement, 27 May 2011.

650. Dr Roper wrote that he was "more concerned" by a letter sent by the chemical warfare expert in Dr Jones' team on 20 September, which they had discussed with the CW expert the following week. The CW expert had:

> "… explained his understanding of the CW position in Iraq noting that there had been thousands of tonnes of chemical agent, much of it destroyed by UNSCOM, but he noted that he couldn't rule out the existence of a few hundred tonnes of unaccounted stock some of which could retain potency. However his key point was that he had seen no evidence that Iraq had resumed any production of chemical agent since the Gulf War."

651. Dr Roper wrote that he "was alerted to the existence of new sensitive material on CW production" by an SIS officer by telephone. The conversation was short but Dr Roper recalled that he was told "it referred to evidence of resumption in CW production". Dr Roper also wrote that he had been "assured" that Air Marshal French and Mr Cragg had seen the document. Dr Roper could not recall the precise date of that conversation, but he thought it had "probably" taken place before 23 September.

652. Dr Roper wrote that he had not discussed the existence of the new intelligence with either AM French or Mr Cragg, or with anyone else. His conversation with the CW expert on 23 September:

> "… was very late in the dossier production process and only minor editorial comments on the wording were being called for at this stage. I concluded the conversation with [name of expert] suggesting that those responsible for forming the final judgement no doubt had access to this new intelligence and would take it into consideration. I took no further action."

653. The Inquiry shares the view of the Butler Review that the dossier contained a stronger assessment in relation to Iraqi chemical weapons production than was justified by the available intelligence.

654. The SIS report of 11 September was a factor in that.

655. Sir Richard Dearlove's concerns about ensuring the protection of such an important potential source of evidence were, in the circumstances, understandable.

656. But the Inquiry shares the conclusion of the Butler Review that it should have been shown to the experts in the Defence Intelligence Staff who could have commented on the credibility and validity of that report and the subsequent report issued on 23 September and advised their senior managers and the Assessments Staff.

657. Sir Richard Dearlove's personal intervention, and its urgency, gave added weight to a report that had not been properly evaluated and would have coloured the perception of Ministers and senior officials. The report should have been treated with caution.

658. The withdrawal after the conflict of three streams of reporting underpinning the judgements in the dossier on Iraq's chemical and biological warfare capabilities and intentions, including the reports of 11 and 23 September and the "45 minutes" report, is addressed in Section 4.3.

659. The Inquiry has identified a number of lessons which arise from the way in which the dossier was produced at the end of this Section.

660. The details of the JIC Assessments on Iraq's WMD between December 2000 and September 2002 demonstrate that the JIC consistently stated in those Assessments that the intelligence on most aspects of Iraq's activity in relation to chemical, biological and nuclear weapons programmes was limited, and that many of its judgements were inferential.

661. The intelligence on Iraq's ballistic missile programmes was more extensive, but there were still significant uncertainties about Iraq's capabilities.

662. In relation to the concerns expressed by the DIS, Lord Hutton concluded:

> "… the concerns expressed by Dr Jones were considered by higher echelons in the Intelligence Services and were not acted upon, and the JIC … approved the wording in the dossier. Moreover, the nuclear, chemical and biological weapons section of the Defence Intelligence Staff, headed by Dr Brian Jones, did not argue that the intelligence relating to the 45 minutes claim should not have been included in the dossier but they did suggest that the wording in which the claim was stated was too strong and that instead of the dossier stating 'we judge' that 'Iraq has: – military plans for the use of chemical and biological weapons, including against its own Shia population. Some of those weapons are deployable within 45 minutes of an order to use them', the wording should state 'intelligence suggests'."[352]

663. The Butler Report stated that the 9 September JIC Assessment had been "written to inform military and other contingency planning" but its "precautionary judgements", which were appropriate for that purpose:

> "… were subsequently taken up into the dossier, and were taken up in an abbreviated form in which points were run together and caveats on the intelligence were dropped …
> "…The same was true of the 21 August and 15 March Assessments …

[352] The National Archives, 28 January 2004, Report of the Inquiry into the Circumstances Surrounding the Death of Dr David Kelly ["The Hutton Report"], paragraph 228.

> "Experienced readers would have seen these warnings in the original JIC Assessments and taken them into account … But the public … would not have known … The dossier did include a first chapter on the role of intelligence, as an introduction for the lay reader. But rather than illuminating the limitations of intelligence … the language of this Chapter may have had the opposite effect … Readers may, for example have read language in the dossier as implying that there was fuller and firmer intelligence behind the judgements than was the case: our view, having reviewed all the material, is that judgements in the dossier went to (although not beyond) the outer limits of the intelligence available."[353]

664. The Butler Report also stated that the dossier:

> "… did not refer explicitly to the JIC's uncertainty about the size of stocks of sarin and VX precursors, and hence Iraq's ability to produce these agents. Nor did it, like the JIC Assessments, refer explicitly to the lack of intelligence on the location of facilities for producing biological and chemical agent, although it did draw attention to the difficulty of assessing the use made of 'dual-use' facilities."[354]

665. The Butler Report concluded that: "Partly because of inherent difficulties", including the complications created by dual-use programmes, the JIC assessments of Iraq's chemical and biological programmes were "less assured" than the assessments of Iraq's nuclear capabilities, and that they:

> "… tended to be over cautious and in some areas worst case. Where there was a balance of inference to be drawn, it tended to go in the direction of inferring the existence of banned weapons programmes. Assessments were as a consequence less complete, especially in their considerations of alternative hypotheses, and used a different burden of proof."[355]

666. The Butler Report stated:

> "The intelligence community will have had in mind that Iraq had not only owned but used its chemical weapons in the past. It will inevitably have been influenced by the way in which the Iraqi regime was engaged in a sustained programme to try to deceive United Nations inspectors and to conceal from them evidence of its prohibited programmes. Furthermore, because SIS did not have agents with first-hand knowledge of Iraq's nuclear, chemical, biological or ballistic missile programmes, most of the intelligence reports on which assessments were being made were inferential. The Assessments Staff and JIC were not fully aware of the access and background of key informants, and could not therefore read their material against the background of an understanding of their motivations for passing on information."[356]

667. The Butler Report also addressed the fact that the SIS report of 11 September had been given a very restricted circulation and drew attention to the:

"… evidence of difficulties that arose from the unduly strict 'compartmentalisation' of intelligence which meant that experts in DIS did not have access to an intelligence report which became available in September 2002 and played a major role for the JIC in confirming previous intelligence reports that Iraq was producing chemical and biological weapons."[357]

668. Sir Richard Dearlove told the Butler Review that:

"… SIS were concerned to minimise knowledge of the existence of the source during what they expected to be an initial, very sensitive, period of development. The source's intelligence about chemical weapons production was therefore distributed to an extremely limited circle of senior readers."[358]

669. The Butler Report stated that:

- It understood "SIS's concern to give maximum protection to their source in those particular, and transitional, circumstances".
- It had been "told that in-house SIS technical experts took a preliminary and provisional view that the report should be issued, as being from 'A new source on trial'".
- "But the exclusion of Dr Jones and his staff from readership of the original report meant that this intelligence was not seen by the few people in the UK intelligence community able to form all-round, professional technical judgements on its reliability and significance."[359]

670. The Butler Report added:

- We recognise that circumstances arise in which it is right for senior officials to take a broad view that differs from the opinions of those with expertise on points of detail.
- We do not, however, consider that the report held back from Dr Jones and his staff (which Dr Jones's superiors regarded as justifying the certainty of the language in the dossier) was one to which such considerations should have applied.

- The judgement reached by the JIC in this case should have been able to depend on detailed, expert analysis of the intelligence.
- In the event, the JIC had no reason to know that that had not happened.
- It was understandable that SIS should have wanted to give greater than normal protection to the human intelligence source on this occasion.
- But a problem arose because it was kept from the relevant DIS analysts who had a wider perspective.[360]
- It would have been more appropriate for senior managers in the DIS and SIS to have made arrangements for the intelligence to be shown to DIS experts rather than their making their own judgements on its significance.
- The fact that it was not shown to them resulted in a stronger assessment in the dossier in relation to Iraqi chemical weapons production than was justified by the available intelligence.
- It also deprived SIS of key expertise that would have helped them to assess the reliability of their new source.
- We have not been presented with any evidence that persuades us that there was an insuperable obstacle to allowing expert-level DIS access to the intelligence."[361]

671. The Butler Report stated:

"We accept the need for careful handling of human intelligence reports to sustain the security of sources … We accept that this report was from a new source who was thought to be of great potential value and was therefore of extreme sensitivity. Nevertheless, it was wrong that a report which was of significance in the drafting of a document of the importance of the dossier was not shown to key experts in the DIS who could have commented on the validity and credibility of the report."[362]

672. The Butler Report added:

"… arrangements should always be sought to ensure that the need for protection of sources should not prevent the exposure of reports on technical matters to the most expert available analysis."[363]

[360] The Inquiry infers that that is a reference to wider knowledge of chemical and biological weapons programmes.

673. Asked by the Iraq Inquiry whether, in the light of the view expressed at the JIC meeting on 4 September that the 9 September Assessment needed to make clearer where there were remaining major gaps in the UK's knowledge and understanding of Iraq's capabilities, he had felt that this should have been an integral part of the dossier, Sir John Scarlett replied:

> "… there was no sort of discussion or conscious decision made to leave out references to limited intelligence. There was no deliberate intention to do that.
>
> "The reason it happened may be because of the way the dossier was structured, and the fact that it began with an Executive Summary, which was explicitly a collection of judgements, as opposed to a sort of listing of intelligence.
>
> "The place where it could have happened would have been in the introduction [Chapter 1: The Role of Intelligence], where we were talking about the nature of intelligence …"[364]

674. Sir John added:

> "But … the judgements and confidence in the judgements [in the 9 September Assessment] was high, in spite of the areas where we didn't have knowledge. So it was the gaps in detailed knowledge, rather than [gaps] in confidence about basic judgements."

675. Mr Miller added:

> "The intelligence was not all encompassing … What we tried to do in the Assessment and in the dossier was to describe the intelligence as directly as we could, and then set out clearly and distinctly the judgements which had been reached.
> "… We felt it was right that the firmness of the judgements that had been expressed in the classified Assessment [of 9 September] should be echoed in the published … [dossier]."[365]

676. Subsequently, in response to a question about the absence of caveats in the Key Judgements of Assessments, which were what Ministers were "meant to read", Sir John Scarlett told the Inquiry:

> "… this is… the issue that effectively arose around the drafting of the dossier … it wasn't because they had deliberately been left out. It was because of the use of the Executive Summary as the equivalent of the [JIC's] Key Judgements."[366]

[365] Private hearing, 5 May 2010, pages 72-73.
[366] Private hearing, 5 May 2010, page 86.

677. Sir John added that, after the publication of the Butler Report in July 2004, "all front pages of the Assessments [ie the page with the Key Judgements] have contained a box on the intelligence base" which "spells out the strengths and weaknesses of the intelligence". That allowed the Key Judgements to be made while flagging up the caveats.

678. Asked if he had expressed any concerns during the drafting of the dossier, for instance about caveats being dropped or because the text becoming more definite than a normal JIC report might have been, Sir Richard Dearlove replied:

> "… with the benefit of hindsight, I was happy with what the dossier said in terms of what we believed at the time that it was written."[367]

679. In the context of a reference to comment in the Butler Report that the language of the dossier may have left readers with the impression that there was fuller and firmer intelligence behind the judgements in the dossier than was the case, Sir Richard added:

> "Yes, I know it said that, but I think it is easy to write these things afterwards. I mean, you know, at the time when that dossier was published, it's what we believed on the evidence available, partly historical – significantly historical – partly based on the sources, […]
>
> "… I had been worried about the dossier for a very long time because I didn't feel that we had a very substantive picture from intelligence. We had a substantive picture from historical material.
>
> "By the time, you know, the draft was complete, I was, I think, surprised how much material had been assembled. I think you have to recall, when this document was published -- and I would actually refer you also to the Institute of Strategic Studies document. Both were felt to be rather conservative, rather reserved pictures of what Iraq's capability was at that time. You know, it's only now – and I'm also firmly of the view that we still don't have a complete picture of Iraq's WMD …"[368]

680. Sir Richard Dearlove's position on the very restricted circulation of the SIS reports of 11 and 23 September is set out earlier in this Section.

Mr Blair's Foreword

681. In its report, Iraqi Weapons of Mass Destruction – Intelligence and Assessment, published in September 2003, the ISC examined "whether the available intelligence, which informed the decision to invade Iraq, was adequately and properly assessed and whether it was accurately reflected in Government publications", including three of the statements made in the Foreword.[369]

---

[367] Private hearing, 16 June 2010, page 57.
[368] Private hearing, 16 June 2010, pages 57-58.

THREAT TO THE UK NATIONAL INTEREST

682. In relation to the statement in Mr Blair's Foreword that he believed Iraq, and its weapons of mass destruction, was "a current and serious threat to the UK national interest", the ISC stated:

> "On the question of what direct threat Saddam, his regime and his WMD posed to UK interests, the evidence is that UK forces deployed in the region to enforce the … No-Fly Zones were threatened by conventional weapons, and could have been threatened by any biological and chemical weapons that Saddam possessed. Additionally, if Al Hussein missiles had been retained and they were operational with conventional or chemical and biological warheads, they could have attacked UK forces in Cyprus or those conducting operations in the region. Saddam's WMD programmes and his continued support of them increased this threat."[370]

683. The ISC stated that the first draft of Mr Blair's Foreword had made clear that the Government recognised that Saddam Hussein did not pose a direct threat to the UK: "The case I make is not that Saddam could launch a nuclear attack on London or another part of the UK (He could not)."[371]

684. In the ISC's view, it was "unfortunate" that the point was removed in the published version, "and not highlighted elsewhere".

685. The ISC concluded:

> "Saddam was not considered a current or imminent threat to mainland UK, nor did the dossier say so."[372]

686. In its response to the ISC, the Government welcomed that conclusion, adding:

> "The dossier was not intended to make the case for military action against Iraq; it was intended to share with the public the intelligence being presented to the Government which (along with much open source information) showed that Iraq was in serious breach of several UNSCRs."[373]

687. The Government's response to the ISC addressed a different point to the issue of whether Iraq, and its weapons of mass destruction, was a "current and serious threat to the UK national interest" at the time the dossier was issued.

688. The statement that Mr Blair believed Iraq and its weapons of mass destruction was "a current and serious threat to the UK national interest" reflected his view.

689. But it did not reflect the view of the JIC, which had addressed the threat posed by Iraq and assessed that Iraq's capabilities and intentions were limited and related to the balance of power in the region and internal challenges.

690. JIC Assessments between January 2001 and September 2002 did not formally consider the threat posed by Iraq to UK interests.

691. In its Assessment of 1 December 2000, the JIC stated:

- "Although Iraqi forces are still large and well organised by regional standards, a military offensive outside Iraq's borders would be limited by shortfalls in equipment and logistics."
- "UN sanctions have successfully prevented the procurement of new weapon systems."
- "While US/UK forces remain deployed in the region and prepared to intervene militarily, an attack on Kuwait is very unlikely."
- "Iraq has probably [disassembled and] concealed a handful of 650km range ballistic missiles that could reach Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and even Israel … But even if Saddam has such weapons he is unlikely to use them except in extremis, in order to preserve his regime or as a final gesture of defiance."[374]

692. The JIC Assessment of 28 November 2001 stated:

- "… we judge Iraq had no responsibility for, or foreknowledge of, attacks in the US on 11 September."
- "Saddam has refused to permit any Al Qaida presence in Iraq. He is ideologically poles apart from the Sunni extremist networks linked to UBL [Usama Bin Laden] and fears their impact on the population."
- "Iraq has long seen terrorism as a potential weapon in its conflict with the US and regional enemies. […] Since September 11, however, Saddam is likely to have ruled out such attacks for the time being, for fear of a heavy US response."
- "But in the medium term the threat against Western interests and regional states remains credible. Saddam has not given up terrorism as a policy tool."[375]

[375] JIC Assessment, 28 November 2001, 'Iraq after September 11 – The Terrorist Threat'.

693. The JIC Assessment of 19 April 2002 stated:

> "… Iraq is rarely perceived as the greatest security threat within the region. Except for Kuwait, the Gulf States see Iran as the greater long-term security threat and want an Iran-Iraq balance …"[376]

694. The JIC Assessment of 9 September 2002 judged that the use of chemical and biological weapons before a military attack on Iraq was "unlikely".[377]

695. The Executive Summary of the dossier stated that intelligence showed:

> "… Saddam Hussein attaches great importance to possessing weapons of mass destruction which he regards as the basis for Iraq's regional power. It shows that he does not regard them only as weapons of last resort. He is ready to use them, including against his own population, and is determined to retain them …"[378]

696. The Executive Summary also stated:

> "But the threat from Iraq does not depend solely on the capabilities we have described. It arises also because of the violent and aggressive nature of Saddam Hussein's regime. His record of internal repression and external aggression gives rise to unique concerns about the threat he poses. The paper briefly outlines … Saddam's rise to power, the nature of his regime and his history of regional aggression. Saddam's human rights abuses are also catalogued …"[379]

697. Mr Powell explicitly cautioned that, while Iraq had the means, the dossier did not demonstrate that it posed an imminent threat. In his email to Mr Scarlett on 17 September, Mr Powell wrote that the dossier:

> "… does nothing to demonstrate a threat, let alone an imminent threat from Saddam In other words it shows he has the means but it does not demonstrate he has the motive to attack his neighbours let alone the west We will need to make clear in launching the document that we do not claim to have evidence that he is an imminent threat The case we are making is that he has continued to develop WMD since 1998, and is in breach of UN resolutions The international community has to enforce those resolutions if the UN is to be taken seriously".[380]

698. Addressing Mr Powell's comments about the "imminent threat", Mr Campbell replied that was "why TB's Foreword sets out 'the case I am making'".[381]

699. In a further email on 18 September, Mr Powell concluded:

> "The threat argument will be a major problem in the press/parliamentary assault after the dossier comes out and we need to flag up the point in the preface at publication and during the debate. We need to set the test for ourselves at a level we can meet".[382]

700. There is no indication that Mr Blair saw the emails from Mr Powell.

701. Commenting on the statement that Iraq "continued to produce chemical and biological weapons", the ISC stated:

> "The use of the phrase … and the absence of detail on amounts of agents produced in the executive summary and main text could give the impression that Saddam was actively producing both chemical and biological weapons and significant amount of agents."[383]

702. The ISC added:

> "However the JIC did not know what had been produced and in what quantities – it had assessed, based on intelligence, that production had taken place. We believe this uncertainty should have been highlighted to give a balanced view of Saddam's chemical and biological capacity."

703. Asked if the information available in early 2002 showed that Saddam Hussein's WMD programmes had changed very little since 1998, and that there were strong caveats about the reliability of the intelligence, Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

> "Yes, the principal intelligence … in March 2002, was that our knowledge was 'sporadic' and 'patchy'…"[384]

704. Mr Blair added that he thought the Assessment went on to say, "but it is clear that Saddam continues his programme".

705. Asked if it was "wise to say that intelligence is ever beyond doubt", and if that was "setting a higher standard of proof than it might be possible to sustain", Mr Blair replied:

> "I think what I said …
>
> 'What I believe the assessed intelligence has established beyond doubt is that Saddam has continued to produce chemical and biological weapons.'
>
> "I did believe it … and I did believe it, frankly, beyond doubt."[385]

[385] Public hearing, 29 January 2010, page 80.

706. Asked whether it was "beyond anybody's doubt", Mr Blair stated that the "March 2002 JIC Assessment", said: "It was clear that …"[386]

707. Mr Blair added:

> "… if I said, 'It was clear that' in the Foreword, rather than 'I believe, beyond doubt', it would have had the same impact."

708. Mr Blair added that, based on the Executive Summary and the information that followed in the Iraq dossier, it was "hard to come to any other conclusion than that this person [Saddam Hussein] has a continuing WMD programme". Mr Blair could not "see how anyone could come to a different conclusion".[387]

709. The JIC Assessment of 9 September stated that intelligence indicated that the production of chemical and biological weapons was taking place and the Executive Summary of the dossier stated that the JIC judged that Iraq had continued to produce chemical and biological agents. Neither supported the statement that the "assessed intelligence has established beyond doubt" that Saddam Hussein had "continued to produce chemical and biological weapons".

710. The questions raised by the DIS about the validity of these judgements by the JIC are addressed earlier in this Section.

711. The JIC Assessment of 1 December 2000 stated:

- Intelligence suggested "some biological and chemical warfare activity". Iraq was "rebuilding its civil chemical industry, including facilities formerly associated with chemical weapons". The JIC judged that "Iraq may already be producing biological agent and could produce a small number of chemical weapons within weeks of a decision to do so".
- Iraq could "build a large scale production capability within a few years" "were economic sanction lifted".
- The same was "probably true for biological weapons".
- Iraq "could produce small but significant amounts of mustard agent within weeks of a decision to do so. It could produce nerve agent within months … It could also produce small numbers of CW munitions and missile warheads."
- Iraq still had "sufficient expertise and material to produce BW without procurement from abroad. It could use legitimate civil or dedicated BW facilities, including mobile laboratories, for this work."[388]

[388] JIC Assessment, 1 December 2000, 'Iraq's Military Capabilities'.

712. The JIC Assessment of 10 May 2001 stated:

- Intelligence reports reflected "a continuing chemical warfare programme, including research and development, together with the possible production and weaponisation of agent".
- The JIC had "good intelligence of Iraq's former chemical and biological warfare (CBW) facilities, their limited reconstruction and civil production".
- The JIC had "good intelligence of Iraq's former CW associated facilities".
- Intelligence of "other related CW activity, including possible weaponisation" was "less clear".
- "Whilst the picture as regards biological weapons was unclear," there were indications of "continuing biological warfare research and the possible production of agent".[389]

713. The introduction to the CIG Assessment of 15 March 2002 stated:

> "Intelligence on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and ballistic missile programmes is sporadic and patchy. Iraq is also well practised in the art of concealment and exaggeration. A complete picture of various programmes is therefore difficult. But it is clear that Iraq continues to pursue a policy of acquiring WMD and their delivery means. Intelligence indicates that planning to reconstitute some of its programmes began in 1995. WMD programmes were then given a further boost in 1998 with the withdrawal of UNSCOM inspectors."[390]

714. On detailed points, the Assessment stated:

- "We continue to judge that Iraq has an offensive chemical warfare (CW) programme, although there is very little intelligence relating to it."
- "From the evidence available … we believe Iraq retains some production equipment, and some small stocks of CW agent precursors, and may have hidden small quantities of agents and weapons. Anomalies in Iraqi declarations to UNSCOM suggest stocks could be much larger."
- Intelligence on production facilities was "scarce" and "the reconstructed former precursor facility near Habbaniyah" was "insufficient to support large-scale CW agent production".
- "Other industrial chemical facilities could be used … but we have no intelligence to suggest they are currently being used in that role."
- "Intelligence has indicated an Iraqi interest in transportable production facilities for chemical weapons, but these could produce only small amounts of agent and we judge it more likely that the mobile units are filling munitions".

[389] JIC Assessment, 10 May 2001, 'Iraqi WMD Programmes: Status and Vulnerability'.
[390] CIG Assessment, 15 March 2002, 'The Status of Iraqi WMD Programmes'.

- There had been "one uncorroborated report" that Iraq had "filled some artillery rocket munitions with VX in the period 1996-1998, and another that a team of chemists was formed in 1998 to produce 5 tons of VX. The source was told this had been completed by the end of 1998".
- Work on biological warfare programmes had "continued throughout the period of UNSCOM inspections" and intelligence indicated "that this programme continues. Key figures from the pre-Gulf War programme are reported to be involved."
- Research and development was "assessed to continue under cover of a number of legitimate institutes and possibly in a number of covert facilities".
- There was "no intelligence on any BW agent production facilities, but one source indicates that Iraq may have developed mobile production facilities". The Assessment stated: "Though not corroborated, we judge the reporting is technically credible. Imagery has yet to provide firm collateral but has identified a number of sites that could be associated with this programme. The mobile production facilities have yet to be identified."
- The CIG did not know "which types of agent are produced by these facilities".
- "A decision to begin CBW production would probably go undetected."
- Iraq was "judged to be self-sufficient in the production of biological weapons".

715. In the Key Judgements, the CIG stated that, while research and development programmes continued, Iraq's actual capabilities were finite. There was no intelligence on the production of chemical and biological agents or weapons.

716. The JIC Assessment of 9 September 2002 judged that:

- "Iraq has a chemical and biological weapons capability and Saddam is prepared to use it."
- "Iraq currently has available, either from pre Gulf War stocks or more recent production, a number of biological warfare (BW) and chemical warfare (CW) agents and weapons …"[391]

717. The Assessment stated:

> "One intelligence report suggests that Iraq has 'lost' the capability to develop warheads capable of disseminating chemical and biological agent and that it would take six months to overcome the 'technical difficulties'".

[391] JIC Assessment, 9 September 2002, 'Iraqi Use of Chemical and Biological Weapons – Possible Scenarios'.

718. The Assessment also stated:

"Other recent intelligence indicates that:

- production of chemical and biological weapons is taking place;
- …"

719. The Executive Summary of the dossier stated:

"As a result of the intelligence we judge that Iraq has:

- continued to produce chemical and biological weapons;
- military plans for the use of chemical and biological weapons …;
- command and control arrangements in place to use chemical and biological weapons …;
- developed mobile laboratories for military use corroborating earlier reports about the mobile production of biological warfare agents;
- pursued illegal programmes to procure controlled materials of potential use in the production of chemical and biological weapons programmes …"[392]

720. The main text of the dossier stated:

- "Iraq has a usable chemical and biological weapons capability … which has included recent production of chemical and biological agents."[393]
- "Intelligence shows that Iraq has continued to produce chemical agent."[394]
- "We know from intelligence that Iraq has continued to produce biological warfare agents."[395]
- "UNSCOM established that Iraq considered the use of mobile biological agent production facilities. In the past two years evidence from defectors has indicated the existence of such facilities. Recent intelligence confirms that the Iraqi military have developed mobile facilities."[396]
- "Iraq has a variety of delivery means."[397]

721. Asked whether Mr Blair's knowledge of the SIS reporting, of 11 September, could have influenced Mr Blair, Sir Richard Dearlove replied:

> "… if you look at what he … actually says 'beyond doubt on the assessed intelligence', this isn't part of the assessed intelligence."[398]

IRAQ'S EFFORTS TO DEVELOP NUCLEAR WEAPONS

722. The ISC also considered the statement that Mr Blair believed "the assessed intelligence has established beyond doubt" that Saddam Hussein "continues in his efforts to develop nuclear weapons".[399]

723. The ISC pointed out that the Executive Summary and main body of the dossier were less certain:

- The Executive Summary stated: "As a result of the intelligence, we judge Iraq has … sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa."
- The dossier itself stated that there was "intelligence that Iraq has sought the supply of significant quantities of uranium from Africa".

724. Although there were some references to Iraq having a "nuclear programme", the JIC Assessments and the dossier made clear that Iraq's efforts to develop a nuclear weapon were effectively constrained by the dismantling of its physical infrastructure by the IAEA and continuing sanctions.

725. There was intelligence which indicated: attempts to procure dual-use equipment which could be used in a nuclear programme; possible attempts to obtain uranium; and that Iraq had retained the knowledge and personnel from its previous programme.

726. But neither the JIC Assessments at the time nor the judgements in the Executive Summary of the dossier supported the statement that the "assessed intelligence has established beyond doubt" that Saddam Hussein "continues in his efforts to develop nuclear weapons".

727. The JIC Assessment of 1 December 2000 stated:

- Iraq had "retained the scientific cadre associated with nuclear weapons work […] Unconfirmed intelligence indicates Iraqi interest in acquiring uranium and continuing nuclear weapons related research after the Gulf War. None of the intelligence acquired since the war is 'smoking gun' evidence. But it remains suspicious and seems indicative of attempts to retain a cadre of expertise, which will decline over time without international access."

- "Iraq still lacks fissile material and the infrastructure to make it."
- If it were "able to acquire sufficient fissile [material] for a weapon or centrifuges and feed material from outside Iraq", the time periods to manufacture a crude nuclear weapon and a nuclear warhead could, "with foreign assistance", be "significantly shortened".[400]

728. The JIC Assessment of 10 May 2001 stated:

- The JIC had "no clear intelligence on Iraq's nuclear programme". There was "evidence of increased activity at Iraq's only remaining nuclear facility and a growing number of reports on possible nuclear related procurement".
- The JIC judged but could not confirm that Iraq was "conducting nuclear related research and development into the enrichment of uranium and could have longer term plans to produce enriched uranium for a weapon".
- Iraq had "recalled its nuclear scientists in 1998". It had made "efforts … since 1998 to procure items that could be used in a uranium enrichment programme using centrifuges".
- Those included: "aluminium [tubes]" and "other dual-use items".[401]

729. The introductory paragraph in the CIG Assessment of 15 March 2002 stated that sanctions were constraining programmes to develop medium and long-range ballistic missiles and nuclear weapons.[402] The Assessment also stated:

- "Iraq is pursuing a nuclear weapons programme. But it will not be able to indigenously produce a nuclear weapon while sanctions remain in place, unless suitable fissile material is purchased from abroad."
- Iraq does not possess a nuclear weapons capability.
- Its programme was effectively dismantled by the IAEA.
- Although there was "very little intelligence", the CIG continued to judge that Iraq was "pursuing a nuclear weapons programme" which was assessed to be "based on gas centrifuge uranium enrichment … the route Iraq was following for producing fissile material prior to the Gulf War".
- "Recent intelligence" indicated that "nuclear scientists were recalled to work on a nuclear programme in the autumn of 1998, but we do not know if large-scale development work has yet recommenced".
- "Procurement of dual-use items over the last few years could be used in a uranium enrichment programme. There have been determined efforts to purchase high strength aluminium alloy …" A shipment stopped in Jordan was inspected by the IAEA, "who accepted, that with some modifications … would be suitable for use in centrifuges"; "But there was no definitive intelligence that the aluminium was destined for a nuclear programme."

- The CIG continued to judge that:
  - "[I]f sanctions were removed or became ineffective, it would take at least five years to produce a nuclear weapon. This timescale would shorten if fissile material was acquired from abroad."
  - Iraq "was capable of producing an improvised nuclear device, but it lacks suitable fissile material. Iraq has in the past explored the use of radiological dispersal devices, but the design we have seen was not a credible weapon. There is no intelligence that Iraq is interested in such devices."

730. The JIC Assessment of 9 September 2002 did not address Iraq's nuclear aspirations, simply stating: "We do not believe Iraq possesses nuclear weapons."[403]

731. The Executive Summary of the dossier stated:

"As a result of the intelligence we judge that Iraq has

- tried covertly to acquire technology and materials which could be used in the production of nuclear weapons;
- sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa …
- recalled specialists to work on its nuclear programme …"

732. The main text of the dossier:

- referred to the JIC Assessment in May 2001 that Iraq had continued its nuclear research and that there was intelligence that nuclear scientists had been recalled; but it did not include the warning in that Assessment about the limitations of the intelligence; and
- stated that the IAEA had "dismantled the physical infrastructure of the Iraqi nuclear weapons programme … But Iraq retained, and retains, many of its experienced nuclear scientists and technicians who are specialised in the production of fissile material and weapons design. Intelligence indicates that Iraq also retains the accompanying programme documentation and data."[404]

[404] Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction. The Assessment of the British Government, 24 September 2002, pages 24-25.

733. The dossier made clear that Iraq would not be able to develop a nuclear weapon without procuring key equipment and material, but stated:

- "Iraq continues to work on developing nuclear weapons in breach of its obligations under the Non-Proliferation Treaty and in breach of UNSCR 687. Uranium has been sought from Africa that has no civil nuclear application in Iraq."[405]
- "… [T]here is intelligence that Iraq has sought the supply of significant quantities of uranium from Africa."[406]

734. The FAC stated that the assertion in the September 2002 dossier should have been qualified to "reflect the uncertainty" surrounding the evidence upon which it was based.[407]

735. The ISC took evidence from Sir Richard Dearlove on SIS judgements on the reliability of its "two independent sources" for reporting in June and September 2002.[408] While the IAEA had called into question documentary evidence it had received in February 2003 and SIS was still conducting further investigations, the ISC reported that it had been told that this "did not affect" SIS' judgement of its second source and its belief that Iraq was "attempting to negotiate the purchase of uranium from Niger". The ISC described the SIS judgement as reasonable.

736. In its response to the FAC in November 2003, the FCO stated that: "the claim in the September dossier rested on separate evidence to that judged fraudulent by the IAEA", and that this intelligence was still under review and had not been shared with the CIA.[409]

737. The Butler Review concluded that the "intelligence was credible" that Iraq had sought to purchase uranium ore from Niger in 1999.[410]

738. Iraqi officials had visited Niger in 1999 and further intelligence was received during 2002 which identified that the purpose of the visit had "been to negotiate the purchase of uranium ore, although there was disagreement as to whether a sale had been agreed and the uranium shipped".[411]

739. The Butler Report also stated that there was separate intelligence that the Iraqi regime had made enquiries about the purchase of uranium ore from the Democratic Republic of Congo and that there was some evidence that by 2002 a sale had been agreed.[412]

LONGER-RANGE MISSILE SYSTEMS

740. In the Foreword to the dossier, Mr Blair also stated that he believed the assessed intelligence had "established beyond doubt" that Saddam Hussein had "been able to extend the range of his ballistic missile programme".[413]

741. One of the Key Judgements of the JIC Assessment of 10 May 2001 stated that there had been "a step change in progress" in Iraq's ballistic missile programme over the preceding two years.[414]

742. The Assessment itself made clear that the change related to work on development and infrastructure, including work on a "test stand with the capacity for much larger engines than the Al Samoud", rather than production of missiles with ranges beyond the 150km permitted by the UN. It also stated that if Iraq developed short range missiles with a range "well beyond" 150km, that would "represent a step change in Saddam Hussein's military capabilities".

743. A Key Judgement in the CIG Assessment of 15 March 2002 stated that Iraq had retained "up to 20 Al Hussein ballistic missiles" with a range of 650km.[415] The "location and condition" of those missiles was "unknown", although Iraq had "sufficient engineering expertise to make them operational".

744. A further Key Judgement in the 15 March CIG Assessment stated that Iraq had "begun development of medium range ballistic missiles [with a range of] over 1000km that could target countries throughout the Middle East and Gulf region", but Iraq would "not be able to produce such a missile before 2007 provided sanctions remain effective". The Assessment itself stated that "UN sanctions and the work of the inspectors" had "caused significant problems for Iraq's missile industry".

745. The 15 March CIG Assessment also stated that there were reports that Iraq had "succeeded in developing a number of 200km range variants" of the liquid propelled Al Samoud missile, but it was "unclear" whether those were for operational use or for the research and development of a longer-range missile.

[415] CIG Assessment, 15 March 2002, 'The Status of Iraqi WMD Programmes'.

746. The CIG judged that the Ababil-100, a 150km range solid propellant missile, was likely to become operational within two years, and intelligence indicated that Iraq had plans to extend its range.

747. The JIC Assessment of 9 September 2002 stated that Iraq was developing Al Samoud and Ababil-100 missiles with a range of "150km plus", which were being deployed to military units and could have "an emergency operational capability with conventional warheads", not a capability to deliver chemical or biological warheads.[416]

748. Mr Blair's statement that he believed that the "assessed intelligence has established beyond doubt" that "Saddam has continued to produce chemical and biological weapons" and that "he continues in his efforts to develop nuclear weapons", went further than the assessments of the JIC.

749. The JIC should have advised Mr Blair that he could not make that statement.

750. Asked about Mr Blair's statement that he believed "the assessed intelligence has established beyond doubt" that Iraq has continued to produce chemical and biological weapons, continues in its efforts to develop nuclear weapons, and had been able to extend the range of its ballistic missile programme, Sir John Scarlett told the Inquiry that he:

> "… saw the … Foreword as something quite separate from the text of the dossier itself. The text of the dossier itself I was clearly responsible for drafting.
>
> "The Foreword was overtly a political statement signed by the Prime Minister. So it was his wording and his comments that were there throughout, although I did make one or two, three maybe, small changes on the text of the Foreword, basically to correct one or two small points, which I thought were – or actually add at one point in particular about who received intelligence assessments in the first paragraph, and also to bring it into line with the text of the dossier itself.
> "There was a particular point on concealment. I didn't see it as something that I would change. That's all I can recall now … it is quite difficult now to reconstruct the actual sort of process of how this happened several years later … [B]ut my memory at the time quite clearly was this was something which was the Prime Minister's and it was going out under his signature. So it was different from the attention that I paid to the wording of the dossier."[417]

751. Asked whether, given that Mr Blair's Foreword provided an interpretation of the evidence in the dossier and other interpretations could have been made of the same evidence, the interpretation and assessment should have been issued in separate documents, Sir John Scarlett replied:

> "Maybe, yes. But I can't honestly say that that point was in my mind and I was focused on that issue or that risk at the time. If I had been, then I would have expressed a thought."[418]

752. Sir David Omand, who had taken up his post as the Security and Intelligence Co-ordinator on 3 September 2002, told the Inquiry that his memory was that he "didn't pay that much attention to this [the Foreword] … which was a mistake".[419]

753. Asked whether the phrase "beyond doubt" had rung any "alarm bells", Sir David replied that he had:

> "… totally failed to spot the potential problem that would arise through the disjunction between the statement of case being directly associated with the text of the dossier. We [the JIC] were commenting on this as a document the Prime Minister was going to produce under his own name, and he was convinced. So his saying so was not really very exceptional."

Publication of the dossier, 24 September 2002

Cabinet, 23 September 2002

754. The ISC report in September 2003 stated that Mr Straw, Mr Blunkett, the Home Secretary, and Mr Hoon had had the opportunity to comment on an early draft of the dossier, but only Mr Straw did so.[420] Private Offices decided that the draft "did not require … the personal attention" of Mr Brown or Ms Short. The draft was also sent to Ms Patricia Hewitt, the Trade and Industry Secretary. It was not sent to Mr John Prescott, the Deputy Prime Minister.

755. The briefing for Ministers produced by the Communications and Information Centre (CIC) on 24 September 2002 drew attention to the statements in Mr Blair's Foreword about the threat posed by Saddam Hussein and the belief that the assessed intelligence had "established beyond doubt" that he has "continued to produce chemical and biological weapons, that he continues in his efforts to develop nuclear weapons, and that he has been able to extend the range of his ballistic missile programmes".[421] It also set out the list of judgements from the Executive Summary of the dossier.

[421] Briefing CIC, 24 September 2002, 'CIC Ministerial Briefing'.

756. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 23 September that the dossier "would show that the policy of containment had worked up to a point" but Saddam Hussein "continued to rebuild" his weapons of mass destruction.

757. Cabinet met at 5pm on 23 September. The discussion is addressed in Section 3.5.

758. Cabinet members were given a copy of the dossier to be published the following day.

759. In relation to the dossier, Mr Blair told his colleagues:

> "… the dossier on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction would show that the policy of containment had worked up to a point, but that Saddam Hussein … continued to rebuild his programme to acquire such weapons. The evidence showed his efforts to procure equipment and materials, and to restore production facilities. This was an issue for the United Nations, with whose Security Council resolutions Iraq had not complied. A new resolution was being negotiated."[422]

760. No specific discussion of the contents of the dossier was recorded although in the discussion the point was made that the "development of weapons of mass destruction by Saddam Hussein presented a quite different order of threat".

761. Summing up the discussion, Mr Blair said that a "crunch point" had been reached:

> "The sanctions regime … was being eroded and Saddam Hussein was on the way to acquiring new capability in weapons of mass destruction. Iraq had to comply with the obligations placed on it by the United Nations …"

762. Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair had explained that the dossier "brought together accumulated evidence about Iraq's attempts to build WMD, part historical, part intelligence-based"; "not saying that he [Saddam Hussein] was about to launch an attack on London, but we were saying there was an attempt to build a WMD programme in a significant way".[423]

763. Lord Turnbull, Cabinet Secretary from September 2002 to September 2005, told the Inquiry:

> "I think the dossier was ostensibly an attempt to inform the public. But one of the effects it had was that the Cabinet all read it and basically decided – they absorbed it and accepted it."[424]

764. Asked whether there had been a debate about different scenarios and different possible courses, Lord Boateng, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury from 2002 to 2005, replied:

> "… there was certainly a discussion around different scenarios that came up in the way in which we addressed these issues in Cabinet …
>
> "… in the September meeting, where, as you know, we were about to publish the dossier, there was about to be a report to Parliament and there was a discussion around that and it was a full discussion and, in the course of that, colleagues made various contributions and various scenarios surfaced …
>
> "What we did have was a full discussion around the issues as they were reported to us …"[425]

765. Addressing the September 2002 dossier on Iraq in his memoir, written after his resignation from the Government, Mr Robin Cook, the Leader of the House Commons, wrote:

> "At Cabinet [on 24 September 2002] I described the dossier as 'derivative'. What I was expressing was the extraordinary degree to which the bulk of the document was derived from what we know about Saddam's arsenal … as it had been in 1991 … What was doubtful was whether the arsenal that Saddam possessed in 1991 was any guide whatsoever to the state of his capacity in 2002.
>
> "For a start most chemical and biological agents that Saddam had retained for a decade would long ago have degenerated to the point that they were of no operational use. This is a principle of science well known to those who wrote the dossier … Government Ministers alarmed the public by claims that Saddam had ten thousand litres of anthrax solution unaccounted for since 1991. They never added that the standard life of liquid anthrax is three years …
> "… Last year the US Department of Defense … revealed, 'When the Iraqis produced chemical munitions they appeared to adhere to a 'make and use' regimen … Their conclusion was that the shelf life of Iraqi chemical agents was numbered in weeks, not decades.
>
> "Half of the text relating to Iraq's weapons capacity is drawn from the period before 1998. Much of the remainder depends for its claims of present capacity on historic capabilities … Stripped of the historical resume … the dossier is very thin on new evidence on the current position."[426]

[426] Cook R. The Point of Departure. Simon & Schuster UK Ltd, 2003.

766. Mr Cook subsequently wrote:

> "The dossier … painted a one-sided picture … [I]t defiantly proclaimed a certitude for its claims that was at odds with the nuanced tone of every JIC Assessment I read."

767. Mr Cook added:

> "Personally I never doubted that No.10 believed in the threads of intelligence which were woven into the dossier. But that does not alter the awkward fact that the intelligence was wrong and Ministers who had applied a sceptical mind could have seen that it was too thin to be a reliable base for war. No.10 believed in the intelligence because they desperately wanted it to be true. Their sin was not one of bad faith but of evangelical certainty. They selected for inclusion only the scraps of intelligence that fitted the Government's case. And gave them a harder edge than was justifiable. The net result was a gross distortion. Although every individual claim could be sourced … the overall effect was to present a false picture of an Iraq bristling with real weapons of mass destruction that turned out not to exist."

768. In a section reflecting on the issues written after the conflict, Mr Cook wrote:

> "Only in the last five days was the word Programme dropped from the title. The clear implication is that No.10 wanted Parliament and public to believe that Iraq had actual weapons …"

769. In Mr Cook's view:

> "… the most egregious claim of all was that Saddam had attempted to reconstitute his nuclear programme … The conclusion of the section on nuclear weapons is a masterpiece of false suggestion."

770. Mr Cook described the section in the dossier addressing what Iraq might be able to do if it obtained fissile material and other essential components as "a fanciful leap into the realm of fantasy": "This language is frightening. But as evidence that Iraq was a threat it is pathetic and the authors must have known it."

Mr Blair's statement to Parliament, 24 September 2002

771. Mr Blair wrote his statement himself and chose the arguments to make clear his perception of the threat and why he believed that there was an "overwhelming" case for action to disarm Iraq.

772. Mr Straw, Mr Hoon, Mr Scarlett and others were asked to identify "any facts that are false and … any other essential changes that you would like to suggest".

773. Parliament was recalled from recess on 24 September to debate the case for effective action in respect of the threat posed by Iraq.

774. The Government dossier, Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction. The Assessment of the British Government, was published on 24 September.[427]

775. Mr Blair's statement to the House of Commons, the questions that followed, and the subsequent debates on Iraq in both Houses of Parliament, are addressed in Section 3.5.

776. In relation to Iraq's WMD capabilities and intent, Mr Blair's statement drew on the dossier, including Mr Blair's Foreword, the material sent to No.10 by the FCO on 2 and 4 September, and subsequent briefing material produced for the debate.

777. Mr Rycroft sent a framework for the statement to Mr Blair, together with background material, on 20 September.[428]

778. The framework comprised six sections:

- Introduction
- The threat
- The response
- Tackling head-on some of the difficult questions to pre-empt questions
- Consultation with Parliament; and
- Conclusion.

779. In relation to the threat, Mr Rycroft suggested:

> "Summarise the dossier: main focus WMD, but also material on the nature of Saddam's regime. History of the inspectors and UNSCRs …"

780. In the section on the response to the threat, Mr Rycroft set out the framework of the UN route and that Iraq should comply with all the UN's demands; and that Saddam Hussein had:

> "… a long history of claiming to offer unconditional access, but then attaching conditions …
>
> "For instance, the Iraqi Foreign Minister told the UN last week that Iraq is 'clear of all nuclear, chemical and biological weapons'. That is a lie. The dossier explains why."

781. Addressing the question "Why now?", Mr Rycroft wrote:

> "Dossier sets out the threat. It is increasing every year, especially with Saddam's illicit money. Would be unconscionable to be aware of the threat and do nothing."

782. Addressing the question "Why Saddam?", Mr Rycroft wrote:

> "Need to tackle WMD around the world. Have different strategies for N Korea, Libya etc. With these countries there are at least … some ways of dealing diplomatically with them. Not possible with Saddam's Iraq. Only Saddam has (a) record of WMD use, (b) violated so many UN obligations."

783. Mr Rycroft also wrote:

- "The country [Iraq], region and world would be better off without Saddam, but the issue is his WMD. He must disarm …"
- There was: "No known link between Saddam and Al Qaida. Terrorism is not the issue – WMD is."

784. The background documents included a FCO letter providing material to answer points made in the debate.[429] In relation to Iraq's possession of WMD and the risk of proliferation, the brief on military action stated:

- "… as dossier clearly sets out, Iraqi regime has accelerated its weapons programmes since departure of inspectors. Saddam should be in no doubt about our determination to remove the threat of his WMD."
- "What singles out Iraq as a proliferator is Saddam's demonstrated willingness to use WMD and wage war against his neighbours. Naive to suppose that we could persuade Saddam through dialogue to give up his weapons …"
- "In cases of other proliferators [Iran, North Korea and Libya], we have tried to address our concerns through dialogue … even though some people have criticised us for this."

785. The detailed briefing on WMD stated that:

- Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction and was "still hiding" them "in a range of locations". The regime had admitted "hiding chemical, biological weapons and missile parts".
- The UK believed Iraq had "the capability to deliver these weapons to a range of locations".
- Iraq had "admitted producing large quantities of chemical warfare agents" and "producing biological warfare agents".
- UN weapons inspectors had been "unable to account for thousands of tonnes of so-called precursor chemicals used in the production of weapons; hundreds of tonnes of precursor chemicals used in the production of VX nerve agent; and tens of thousands of special munitions which can be used in chemical and biological weapons".

[429] Letter Sedwill to Rycroft, 20 September 2002, 'Iraq: Commons Debate: Supplementaries'.

786. Addressing developments since 1998, the briefing stated that, "Despite tight controls on imports", Iraq continued "to pursue ballistic missile, nuclear, chemical and biological programmes".

787. The detailed text was more nuanced, stating:

- "We believe that Iraq has recently accelerated its weapons programme."
- There had been "continued progress" on the ballistic missile programme, and facilities damaged in December 1998 had been repaired.
- Saddam Hussein was believed to be "planning to extend the range of his current missiles beyond the 150km limit imposed by the UN".
- There was concern about "reports of increased nuclear procurement".
- "We think that R&D on a nuclear weapons programme has restarted."
- "We believe that the Iraqi regime continues its biological and chemical weapons programmes."

788. The briefing acknowledged that UN measures had:

> "… played a vital role in frustrating Saddam's ambitions to develop WMD. UNSCOM and IAEA inspectors … And UN controls on Iraq imports have made it more difficult for Iraq to acquire easily the WMD technology it is seeking."

789. Sanctions had "helped make Iraqi acquisition of WMD and the means to deliver them more difficult" and had "undoubtedly slowed the pace of their reconstitution". But there were "always those who are willing to breach sanctions" and "Some equipment" had "reached Iraq's WMD programmes".

790. Mr Blair was also sent a copy of the Question and Answer briefing to accompany the dossier.[430] Key points of interest included:

- "The dossier shows that Saddam has aggressively pursued his WMD programme. In the four years since the departure of the inspectors things have got worse, not better. It would be irresponsible to ignore those facts."
- Iraq possessed WMD: it was "still hiding weapons of mass destruction in a range of locations" and it had "admitted producing large quantities of chemical warfare agents".
- There was "reliable intelligence" on mobile production facilities for biological warfare agents which supported "older reporting from defectors".
- There was "intelligence relating to continued production" of CBW agents.

[430] Minute Rycroft to Prime Minister, 20 September 2002, 'Iraq: Tuesday's Debate' attaching Paper Press Office, 20 September 2002, 'Iraq Weapons of Mass Destruction: The Assessment of the British Government – Q&A'.

- If it could "buy highly enriched uranium and essential components", Iraq might "be able to make a crude nuclear weapon in between one and two years".
- To deliver a nuclear warhead by ballistic missile, "Iraq would need a more sophisticated design for a missile warhead than any it had before 1991. It could well have done significant research on this while the inspectors have been away, and may have even produced some parts in anticipation. With the acquired fissile material and specialised parts, a warhead could be made for a missile in about two years, but may well fail. Further time would allow the weapon to be developed and tested to improve its reliability."
- "Iraq has admitted in the past making chemical and biological warheads for its Al Hussein missiles. We believe they could do so again."
- Iraq had "the capability to have developed" chemical and biological warheads for other types of missiles.
- The dossier focused "on the threat posed by Iraq's WMD programmes".
- There was "no evidence that Iraq has supplied WMD materials or advice to any terrorist organisation".
- Al Qaida was "probably still trying" to develop a WMD capability: "It would benefit greatly from support from a state programme. Allowing WMD to remain in the hands of a regime such as Saddam's must involve the risk that these weapons will find there [sic] way into the hands of terrorists."

791. Addressing whether there were differences between the US and UK assessments, the briefing stated:

> "It is clear that the British and American Governments are in full agreement that Saddam's WMD programmes remains significant and growing. We are also in full agreement that the international community must take action. Should not be surprised if different analysts using information obtained in different ways at different times come to slightly different technical conclusions – but the fundamental judgements are identical."

792. Addressing whether the UK's Iraq policy had created a climate for terrorism, the brief stated:

> "… Our Iraq policy is and will remain based on the imperative of containing the very real threat posed by the Iraqi regime to Iraq's people and its neighbours."

793. A 19-page briefing produced by the CIC on 20 September set out:

- examples of Iraq's past obstruction of inspections and its failure properly to disclose information about its programmes;
- statements made by Mr Scott Ritter during his time as a senior member of UNSCOM;

- examples of Iraq's persecution of its own people and actions against other Muslims in the region, including in Kuwait in 1990-1991; and
- provisions of relevant UN resolutions.[431]

794. In the "Key messages" of a briefing produced for the Labour Party on 20 September, Iraq's statement (in a letter from Saddam Hussein read to the UN General Assembly on 19 September – see Section 3.5) that it "did not have nuclear, chemical or biological weapons"[432] was described as "extraordinary".[433] The briefing also stated:

> "Saddam has accelerated his efforts to develop a biological, chemical and nuclear weapons capability since the expulsion of weapons inspectors in 1998, and the means to deliver them. He is a uniquely dangerous dictator: the only one to have used WMD against his own people and neighbours."

795. Commenting on the preparation of a core script for use when the dossier was published, Mr Tom Kelly wrote that the "weakness, obviously, is our inability to say that he could pull the nuclear trigger anytime soon".[434] He thought the basic message, that "by then it would be too late", dealt with that point.

796. Mr Kelly subsequently wrote:

> "We should use the full authority of the House to underline the basic message this is a risk we cannot take. If we put someone on earlier [to make comments before Mr Blair's statement to the House of Commons] there is a danger that the big picture will get lost in the detail of precisely how long it [would] take for nuclear capacity etc Instead TB can carry the big message this is a man who will do anything he can not just to hang on to power, but to impose his will."[435]

797. On 23 September, a draft of Mr Blair's statement was sent to the Private Offices of Mr Straw, Mr Hoon, Mr Brown, Lord Goldsmith and Sir Andrew Turnbull, and to Mr Scarlett and Mr Bowen.[436] They were asked to identify "any facts that are false and … any other essential changes that you would like to suggest".

798. In his diaries, Mr Campbell wrote that Mr Blair had "done the statement pretty much himself".[437]

799. Mr Blair told the Hutton Inquiry:

> "… the most important thing was I was very careful in my statement [to Parliament] to make it clear what we were and were not saying."[438]

800. Asked if there was anything in his statement to Parliament he wanted to emphasise, Mr Blair told the Hutton Inquiry:

> "I think the only thing … is just to emphasise the fact that I make it clear what I perceived the threat to be."[439]

801. Mr Blair also said:

> "… it was essential that anything we said in the course of my statement … we could hand on heart say: this is the assessment of the Joint Intelligence Committee."[440]

802. The Iraq Inquiry asked Mr Blair for a statement on who had been involved in the preparation of his statement, and who had cleared the intelligence it contained.[441]

803. Mr Blair wrote:

> "In respect of my statement of 24 September 2002 to the House of Commons I would have relied principally on the dossier and JIC Assessments and written and oral intelligence briefing, some of which came in just before the statement, in particular the [9] September JIC Assessment which referred to mobile facilities."[442]

804. Mr Blair added:

> "I have gone back, in the course of compiling this statement, to the vast number of different documents that refer to Saddam and WMD. I simply make the point that the assumptions in all of them was that Saddam was committed in both the intent and the action in developing WMD. Of course, the Iraq Survey Group shows that the intent indeed remained and there were multiple breaches of UN resolutions."

805. In his statement to the House of Commons on 24 September, Mr Blair began by thanking the Speaker for recalling Parliament "to debate the best way to deal with the issue of the present leadership of Iraq and weapons of mass destruction" and described the dossier as "detailing the history of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction programme, its breach of United Nations resolutions and its attempts to rebuild that illegal programme".[443]

806. Addressing the problems encountered by the inspectors, Mr Blair placed the issues being addressed firmly in the context of:

> "… an 11-year history … of UN will flouted, of lies told by Saddam about the existence of his chemical, biological and nuclear weapons, and of obstruction, defiance and denial.
> "There is one common, consistent theme … the total determination of Saddam to maintain that programme; to risk war, international ostracism, sanctions and the isolation of the Iraqi economy …"

807. Addressing the question of why Saddam Hussein had decided in mid-September, but not before, to admit the weapons inspectors, Mr Blair stated the answer was in the dossier, and it was because:

> "… his chemical, biological and nuclear programme is not an historic left-over from 1998. The inspectors are not needed to clean up the old remains. His weapons of mass destruction programme is active detailed and growing. The policy of containment is not working. The weapons of mass destruction programme is not shut down; it is up and running now."

808. Mr Blair stated that the dossier disclosing the intelligence assessments provided by the JIC had been produced because it was "important to explain our concerns about Saddam to the British people". He added that people were going to:

> "… have to take elements of this on the good faith of our intelligence services, but this is what they are telling me … and my senior colleagues. The intelligence picture that they paint is one accumulated over the last four years. It is extensive, detailed and authoritative.
>
> "It concludes Iraq has chemical and biological weapons, that Saddam has continued to produce them, that he has existing and active plans for the use of chemical and biological weapons, which could be activated within 45 minutes, including against his own Shia population, and that he is actively trying to acquire nuclear weapons capability."

809. Addressing the content of the dossier, Mr Blair told Parliament that:

- As well as the chemical agents and precursor chemicals, growth media for anthrax and special munitions for the delivery of chemical and biological agents that were "missing and unaccounted for" in 1998, Iraq continued "to produce chemical weapons; has rebuilt previously destroyed production plants across Iraq; has brought dual-use chemical facilities; has retained key personnel … and has a serious ongoing research programme into weapons production, all of it well funded".

- "… production of biological agents has continued; facilities formerly used for biological agents have been rebuilt; equipment has been purchased for such a programme; and again Saddam has retained the personnel who worked on it prior to 1991. In particular, the UN inspection regime discovered that Iraq was trying to acquire mobile biological weapons facilities … Present intelligence confirms that it has now got such facilities." The UK believed Iraq could produce anthrax, botulinum toxin, aflatoxin and ricin, which "all eventually result in excruciatingly painful death".
- Saddam Hussein's previous nuclear programme had been "shut down by the inspectors" and "known remaining stocks of uranium" were "held under supervision" by the IAEA. Key personnel who used to work on the nuclear weapons programme were "back in harness". "But we now know" that Saddam Hussein has also:
  - "bought or attempted to buy" items that could have a use in a nuclear programme; and
  - "been trying to buy significant quantities of uranium from Africa, although we do not know whether he has been successful".
- Iraq's ballistic missile programme was required for the delivery of its chemical, biological and nuclear weapons. It was "clear that a significant number of longer-range missiles were effectively concealed from the previous inspectors and remain, including up to 20 extended-range SCUD missiles … and, by this year, Iraq's development of weapons with a range of more than 1,000km was well under way; and that hundreds of people are employed in that programme, facilities are being built and equipment procured – usually clandestinely. Sanctions and import controls have hindered the programme, but only slowed its progress. The capability being developed, incidentally, is for multi-purpose use, including with WMD warheads."

810. Mr Blair stated:

"That is the assessment, given to me, of the Joint Intelligence Committee. In addition, we have well founded intelligence to tell us that Saddam sees his WMD programme as vital to his survival and as a demonstration of his power and influence in the region."

811. Mr Blair added:

"There will be some who dismiss all this. Intelligence is not always right. For some of the material, there might be innocent explanations. There will be others who say rightly that … it could be several years before Saddam acquires a usable nuclear weapon – though if he were able to purchase fissile material … it would be only a year or two."

812. In the light of the information he had set out, Mr Blair asked whether the world would be wise to trust to the "good faith of the current Iraqi regime". Mr Blair added:

> "Our case is simply this: not that we take military action come what may, but that the case for ensuring Iraqi disarmament, as the UN itself has stipulated, is overwhelming. I defy anyone, on the basis of this evidence, to say that that is an unreasonable demand for the international community to make when, after all, it is only the same demand that we have made for 11 years and that Saddam has rejected."

813. Mr Blair posed, and addressed, three questions: 'Why Saddam?'; 'Why now?'; and 'Why should Britain care?'.

814. On the question 'Why Saddam?', Mr Blair said two things about Saddam stood out: "He had used these weapons in Iraq" and thousands had died, and he had used them during the war with Iran "in which one million people died"; and the regime had "no moderate elements to appeal to".

815. On the question 'Why now?', Mr Blair stated:

> "I agree that I cannot say that this month or next, even this year or next, Saddam will use his weapons. But I can say that if the international community, having made the call for his disarmament, now, at this moment, at the point of decision, shrugs its shoulders and walks away, he will draw the conclusion dictators faced with a weakening will always draw: that the international community will talk but not act, will use diplomacy but not force. We know, again from our history, that diplomacy not backed by the threat of force has never worked with dictators and never will.
>
> "If we take this course and if we refuse to implement the will of the international community, Saddam will carry on, his efforts will intensify, his confidence will grow and, at some point in the future not too distant, the threat will turn into reality. The threat therefore is not imagined. The history of Saddam and weapons of mass destruction is not American or British propaganda. The history and the present threat are real."

816. Mr Blair said that Britain should care:

> "'Because there is no way this man, in this region … could begin a conflict using such weapons and the consequences not engulf the whole world, including this country.' That … is the reason the UN passed its resolutions. That is why it is right that the UN Security Council again makes its will and its unity clear and lays down a strong new UN resolution and mandate. Then Saddam will have the choice: comply willingly or be forced to comply. That is why alongside the diplomacy, there must be genuine preparedness and planning to take action if diplomacy fails.
> "Let me be plain about our purpose. Of course there is no doubt that Iraq, the region and the whole world would be better off without Saddam. Iraq deserves to be led by someone who can abide by international law, not a murderous dictator; by someone who can bring Iraq back into the international community where it belongs, not … languishing as a pariah; by someone who can make the country rich and successful, not impoverished by Saddam's personal greed; and by someone who can lead a government more representative of the country as a whole while maintaining absolutely Iraq's territorial integrity.

"We have no quarrel; with the Iraqi people. Indeed, liberated from Saddam they could make Iraq prosperous and a force for good in the Middle East. So the ending of this regime would be the cause of regret for no one other than Saddam. But our purpose is disarmament. No one wants military conflict. The whole purpose of putting this before the UN is to demonstrate the united determination of the international community to resolve this in the way it should have been resolved years ago: through a proper process of disarmament under the UN. Disarmament of all weapons of mass destruction is the demand. One way or another it must be acceded to."

817. Mr Iain Duncan Smith, Leader of the Opposition, said that the "key question" was whether Saddam Hussein had "the means, the mentality and the motive to pose a threat to pose a threat to Britain's national security and the wider international order". Mr Duncan Smith concluded that Saddam had the means and mentality. He stated:

"The evidence produced in the Government's report shows clearly that Iraq is still pursuing its weapons of mass destruction programme …

"The … dossier confirms that Iraq is self sufficient in biological weapons and that the Iraqi military is ready to deploy those, and chemical weapons, at some 45 minutes' notice."

818. Addressing whether Saddam Hussein had the motive to strike against Britain, Mr Duncan Smith stated:

"… I believe that it is fair to assume that he has …

"The report shows that Saddam has illegally retained up to 20 Al Hussein missiles, with a range of 650km, capable of carrying the various warheads that he needs, and that he is also developing new ones."

819. Mr Charles Kennedy, Leader of the Liberal Democrats, asked:

"Does the Prime Minister truly believe that, on the evidence published today, a sufficient case has now been made that both clarifies Iraq's present capacity, as well as its intent?"

820. Mr Blair responded:

" … yes I do believe the information we published today shows that there is a continuing chemical and biological weapons programme, and an attempt by Saddam Hussein to acquire a nuclear weapons capability. That is what I believe, and that is the assessment of the Joint Intelligence Committee – and frankly I prefer its assessment to the assessment of the Iraqi regime, which, let us say, on the basis of experience, is not one that should carry a lot of credibility."

821. Mr William Hague (Conservative) asked:

"Does the Prime Minister recollect that, in the half-century history of various states acquiring nuclear capabilities, in almost every case – from the Soviet Union in 1949 to Pakistan in 1998 – their ability to do so had been greatly underestimated and understated by intelligence sources at the time? Estimates today of Iraq taking several years to acquire a nuclear device should be seen in that context … [I]s there not at least a significant risk of the utter catastrophe of Iraq possessing a nuclear device without warning, some time in the next couple of years? In that case, does not the risk of leaving the regime on its course today far outweigh the risk of taking action quite soon?"

822. Mr Blair responded:

"I entirely agree … For the preparation of the dossier we had a real concern not to exaggerate the intelligence that we had received. For obvious reasons, it is difficult to reflect the credibility of the information, and we rate the credibility of what we have very highly. I say no more than that.

…

"… I entirely agree that the danger of inaction … far outweighs the danger of action."

823. Other points made by Mr Blair included:

- "… [I]n my judgement, if we do not deal with the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and their retention by highly unstable states, often with dictatorial regimes, then perhaps not this year or next, but in the not too distant future, that problem will explode on to the consciousness of the world. I believe that passionately, which is why, whatever the issues in relation to Iraq … it is important to take a stand now and say that, when we have made determinations on behalf of the international community, we will see them through. If we do not, the message to Saddam and anyone else will be that they can develop these weapons with impunity and that the international community lacks the will to deal with them."
- "… [T]he point is that if we know that someone has weapons of mass destruction, if they have used them before and if, as a result, the international community has said they must be disarmed of those weapons, surely the greatest risk is letting them carry on developing those weapons and not doing anything about it."

- "… [I]n the past four or five years the issue of Iraq, weapons inspections and what to do about that regime has come over my desk pretty much week after week … [I]t has been there as an issue the whole time … What we know now from the assessment given by our Joint Intelligence Committee is that the very thing that we feared is the very thing that the Iraqi regime is working on."
- "What has happened … is that, whether we like it our not, now is the point of decision."
- "… We have to be clear that the consequences of saying now to Iraq that we are not going to do anything will be really, really serious."
- "… [W]e have to make the decision, and I do not think we can duck the consequences of that decision."

824. Mr Blair concluded that the threat was not that Saddam Hussein was going to launch an attack on the UK "tomorrow":

> "… the threat is that within his own region, or outside it given the missile capability that he is trying to develop, he launches an attack that threatens the stability of that region and then the wider world. All the evidence that we have is that if there is such a conflict in that region, we will not be able to stand apart from it."

ACCURACY OF THE STATEMENT

825. Mr Blair's statement about Iraq's capabilities and intentions included some judgements that were additional to those in the dossier.

826. Mr Blair's categorical statement that the intelligence picture painted by the JIC over the last four years was "extensive, detailed and authoritative", was not an accurate description of the intelligence underpinning the JIC's assessments.

827. There are a number of differences between the draft speech and Mr Blair's statement to the House of Commons where points of detail were added or changed, but its structure and key arguments remained.

828. In the statement, Mr Blair emphasised that the information in the dossier represented the view of the JIC.

829. During a debate on Iraq on 22 February 2007, Lord Butler said that Mr Blair's statement to Parliament "that the picture painted by our intelligence services was 'extensive, detailed and authoritative' … could simply not have been justified by the material that the intelligence community provided to him."

830. The draft of Mr Blair's statement on 23 September said that the intelligence picture was "extensive and detailed". The words "and authoritative" were added in the final version; it is not clear who made that change or why.

831. The JIC Assessments issued since December 1998 could be described as authoritative. But the gaps and uncertainties in the intelligence which underpinned them were clearly identified.

832. The evidence set out earlier in this Section and in Section 4.1 demonstrates that, since the departure of the weapons inspectors four years earlier, detailed intelligence had been received on many aspects of Iraq's activities, and it was more extensive in some areas than others. The judgement that the intelligence picture was extensive may also have been influenced by the reporting which had been issued since the end of August 2002.

833. Mr Blair characterised Iraq's activities to acquire chemical, biological and nuclear weapons, and a ballistic missile capability to deliver them, as a "programme" which was "active, detailed and growing".

834. That statement was in the draft of 23 September, and there is no evidence that Mr Blair was advised to remove it.

835. The claim that Iraq's WMD programme was "growing" and that it had recently accelerated appeared in the briefing material produced by the FCO and No.10 at that time.

836. Asked whether the JIC Assessments had said that the WMD threat from Iraq was growing, Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

> "Yes, it was telling me that in two respects …
> "First … there were the September JIC assessments that talked of continuing production of chemical weapons. In other words, this was a continuing process. But secondly -- and this did have an impact on me at the time, although this particular piece of intelligence turned out later to be wrong, but at the time, obviously, we didn't know that -- on 12 September … I was told and specifically briefed about these mobile production facilities for biological weapons. So this was an additional and new factor and this was very much linked to whether and how Saddam might conceal his activities."[444]

837. In the context of questioning about the intelligence reports received in late August and early September and what might have been in Mr Blair's mind when he said that Iraq's programmes were growing, Sir John Scarlett stated:

> "… I think it is important to state that that was the reporting that he was seeing, and he was receiving a judgement from the JIC which said that production of agent is continuing and it's happening now.

---

[444] Public hearing, 2 February 2010, pages 87-88.

> "So it is possible … to conclude that if you are being told that the production is continuing, it's possible to conclude that therefore the issue is growing …"[445]

838. Sir John confirmed that meant the material was accumulating.

839. Asked about the sourcing for the reports of 11 and 23 September, Sir John replied:

> "… that source was not substantiated and it was the first of the reporting to be withdrawn … in late July 2003."

840. Asked whether the SIS reporting, of 11 and 23 September, might have justified Mr Blair's use of the word "growing", Sir Richard Dearlove replied:

> "… maybe they account for the Prime Minister saying 'growing'. I don't know. I am not sure whether that is true or not."[446]

841. Mr Blair's statements in his Foreword to the dossier about the nature of the threat posed by Iraq to UK interests and that he believed "the assessed intelligence" had "established beyond doubt" that Saddam Hussein had "continued to produce chemical and biological weapons, that he continues in his efforts to develop nuclear weapons" are addressed earlier in this Section.

842. The references to Iraq's chemical and biological programmes in the statement reflected the material in the Foreword and the dossier.

843. A reference to material being "missing" as well as "unaccounted for" was new and implied the material had existed. The word was added to the draft version of 23 September.

844. In his statement to Parliament on 24 September, about Iraq's efforts to develop nuclear weapons, Mr Blair said that "we know" Saddam Hussein "has bought or attempted to buy" material which could be used in a nuclear weapons programme.

845. Mr Blair's description in his evidence to the Inquiry, that the information on Iraqi procurement activities in the dossier "could indicate a continuing interest in nuclear weapons" would have been a more accurate description of the position.

846. In listing Iraq's attempts to procure prohibited technology and materials which could be used in a nuclear weapons programme, which had been set out in the dossier (page 26), Mr Blair stated:

> "But we now know the following … Saddam has bought or attempted to buy …"

847. The dossier said only that intelligence showed "attempts to purchase".

---

[445] Private hearing, 5 May 2010, pages 14-15.
[446] Private hearing, 13 July 2002, page 31.

848. Mr Blair stated that it would only take Saddam Hussein "a year or two" to acquire a usable nuclear weapon "if he were able to purchase fissile material illegally", rather than the fuller and more cautious assessment in the dossier (page 27) that Iraq would need "essential components from foreign sources" to produce a warhead as well as fissile material.

849. Neither the dossier nor Mr Blair addressed the likelihood of Iraq being able to procure both fissile material and other essential components.

850. Mr Blair did not refer to the judgement in the dossier, which reflected the JIC Assessments on the issue, that "while sanctions remain effective Iraq would not be able to produce a nuclear weapon".[447] "If", and only if, sanctions were removed or proved ineffective, Iraq would then need "at least five years to produce sufficient fissile material for a weapon".

851. Mr Blair also stated that Iraq's ballistic missile programme was "required for the delivery of chemical, biological and nuclear programmes" and that it was "clear that a significant number of longer-range missiles were effectively concealed from the previous inspectors and remain, including up to 20 extended-range SCUD missiles". Subsequently, he added that the ballistic missile capability was "being developed for multi-purpose use, including with WMD warheads".

852. This material was in the draft of 23 September.

853. The dossier (pages 22-23) stated that Iraq had a "variety of delivery means available for both chemical and biological agents". It made no statement about the delivery of nuclear weapons.

854. The dossier did not include the reference in the JIC Assessment of 9 September 2002 to an intelligence report that:

> "… suggests Iraq has 'lost' the capability to develop warheads capable of effectively disseminating chemical and biological agent and that it would take six months to overcome the 'technical difficulties'."[448]

855. There was no mention in the dossier of concealment of longer-range missiles, other than Iraq's retention of "up to 20 Al Hussein missiles".[449]

856. Asked whether his statement that the WMD programme was growing applied to Iraq's nuclear programme, Mr Blair replied:

> "… what was set out in the dossier, and set out in very detailed form, incidentally, were all the different items that he had been trying to procure, which could indicate a continuing interest in nuclear weapons."[450]

857. Asked whether it would have taken quite a long time to get from that point to having a usable nuclear weapon, Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

> "… if you ask people about the nuclear weapons capability, for example, in respect of Iraq, some people would say, 'Yes, if they are doing it on their own, it is going to take significant amount of time, but you can foreshorten that time if you buy in the material'.

The Butler Review conclusions on the JIC authorship of the dossier

858. In its report, the Butler Review stated:

> "We conclude that it was a serious weakness that the JIC's warnings on the limitation of the intelligence underlying its judgements were not made sufficiently clear in the dossier.
> "We understand why the Government felt it had to meet the mounting public and Parliamentary demand for information. We also recognise that there is a real dilemma between giving the public an authoritative account of the intelligence picture and protecting the objectivity of the JIC from the pressures imposed by providing information for public debate. It is difficult to resolve these requirements. We conclude with the benefit of hindsight, that making public that the JIC had authorship of the dossier was a mistaken judgement, though we do not criticise the JIC for taking responsibility for clearance of the intelligence content of the document. However, in the particular circumstances, the publication of such a document in the name and with the authority of the JIC had the result that more weight was placed on the intelligence than it could bear."[452]

859. The Butler Report recommended that governments in the future should make arrangements to avoid putting the JIC and its Chair into an area of public controversy and offered suggestions as to how that might be achieved.[453]

860. The Report stated:

> "… we conclude that if intelligence is to be used more widely … in public debate in future, those doing so must be careful to avoid its uses and limitations. It will be essential too, that clearer and more effective dividing lines between assessment and advocacy are established when doing so."[454]

861. The Government accepted the Committee's conclusions on the public use of intelligence in its immediate response to the report and subsequently stated that: "Any future presentation of intelligence will separate the Government case from the JIC Assessment."[455]

Conclusions

862. From late February 2002, the UK Government position was that Iraq was a threat that had to be dealt with; that Iraq needed to disarm in accordance with the obligations imposed by the UN; and that it was important to agree to the return of UN inspectors to Iraq.

863. The urgency and certainty with which the position was stated reflected both the ingrained belief – that Saddam Hussein's regime retained chemical and biological warfare capabilities, was determined to preserve and if possible enhance its capabilities, including at some point in the future a nuclear capability, and was pursuing an active policy of deception and concealment – and the wider context in which the policy was being discussed with the US.

864. But it also served to fuel the demand that the Government should publish the document it was known to have prepared, setting out the reasons why it was so concerned about Iraq.

865. In the spring and summer of 2002, senior officials and Ministers took the view that the Iraq dossier should not be published until the way ahead on the policy was clearer.

866. By late August 2002, the Government was troubled by intense speculation about whether a decision had already been taken to use military force. In

Mr Blair's words, the US and UK had been "outed" as having taken a decision when no such decision had been taken.

867. Mr Blair's decision on 3 September to announce that the dossier would be published was a response to that pressure.

868. The dossier was designed to "make the case" and secure Parliamentary (and public) support for the Government's position that action was urgently required to secure Iraq's disarmament.

869. The UK Government intended the information and judgements in the Iraq dossier to be seen to be the product of the JIC in order to carry authority with Parliament and the public.

870. SIS was commissioned by No.10 on 4 September to examine whether it had any additional material which could be included.

871. Mr Scarlett, as Chairman of the JIC, was given the responsibility for producing the dossier.

872. The dossier drew on the 9 September JIC Assessment, 'Iraqi Use of Chemical and Biological Weapons – Possible Scenarios', which had been commissioned to address scenarios for Iraq's possible use of chemical and biological weapons in the event of military action, previous JIC Assessments and the report issued by SIS on 11 September.

873. The SIS report should have been shown to the relevant experts in the DIS who could have advised their senior managers and the Assessments Staff.

874. Expert officials in DIS questioned the certainty with which some of the judgements in the dossier were expressed. Some of their questions were discussed during the preparation of the dossier. The text was agreed by Air Marshal Joe French, Chief of Defence Intelligence, at the JIC meeting on 19 September.

875. There is no evidence that other members of the JIC were aware at the time of the reservations recorded in the minute by Dr Jones of 19 September and that written by the chemical weapons expert in his team the following day.

876. The JIC accepted ownership of the dossier and agreed its content. There is no evidence that intelligence was improperly included in the dossier or that No.10 improperly influenced the text.

877. At issue are the judgements made by the JIC and how they and the intelligence were presented, including in Mr Blair's Foreword and in his statement to Parliament on 24 September 2002.

878. It is unlikely that Parliament and the public would have distinguished between the ownership and therefore the authority of the judgements in the Foreword and those in the Executive Summary and the main body of the dossier.

879. In the Foreword, Mr Blair stated that he believed the "assessed intelligence" had "established beyond doubt" that Saddam Hussein had "continued to produce chemical and biological weapons, that he continues in his efforts to develop nuclear weapons, and that he had been able to extend the range of his ballistic missile programme". That raises two key questions.

- Did Mr Blair's statements in whole or in part go further than the assessed intelligence?
- Did that matter?

880. The Inquiry is not questioning Mr Blair's belief, which he consistently reiterated in his evidence to the Inquiry, or his legitimate role in advocating Government policy.

881. But the deliberate selection of a formulation which grounded the statement in what Mr Blair believed, rather than in the judgements which the JIC had actually reached in its assessment of the intelligence, indicates a distinction between his beliefs and the JIC's actual judgements.

882. That is supported by the position taken by the JIC and No.10 officials at the time, and in the evidence offered to the Inquiry by some of those involved.

883. The assessed intelligence had not established beyond doubt that Saddam Hussein had continued to produce chemical and biological weapons. The Executive Summary of the dossier stated that the JIC judged that Iraq had "continued to produce chemical and biological agents". The main text of the dossier said that there had been "recent" production. It also stated that Iraq had the means to deliver chemical and biological weapons. It did not say that Iraq had continued to produce weapons.

884. Nor had the assessed intelligence established beyond doubt that efforts to develop nuclear weapons continued. The JIC stated in the Executive Summary of the dossier that Iraq had:

- made covert attempts "to acquire technology and materials which could be used in the production of nuclear weapons";
- "sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa, despite having no active nuclear programme that would require it"; and
- "recalled specialists to work on its nuclear programme".

885. But the dossier made clear that, as long as sanctions remained effective, Iraq could not produce a nuclear weapon.

886. These conclusions draw on the evidence from the JIC Assessments at the time and the Executive Summary of the dossier, which are set out in this Section. They do not rely on hindsight.

887. The JIC itself should have made that position clear because its ownership of the dossier, which was intended to inform a highly controversial policy debate, carried with it the responsibility to ensure that the JIC's integrity was protected.

888. The process of seeking the JIC's views, through Mr Scarlett, on the text of the Foreword shows that No.10 expected the JIC to raise any concerns it had.

889. The firmness of Mr Blair's beliefs, despite the underlying uncertainties, is important in considering how the judgements in the Foreword would have been interpreted by Cabinet in its discussions on 23 September and by Parliament.

890. In his statement to Parliament on 24 September and in his answers to subsequent questions, Mr Blair presented Iraq's past, current and potential future capabilities as evidence of the severity of the potential threat from Iraq's weapons of mass destruction; and that, at some point in the future, that threat would become a reality.

891. By the time the dossier was published, President Bush had announced that the US was seeking action on Iraq through the UN, and Iraq had agreed to the return of inspectors.

892. Rather than the debate being framed in terms of the answers needed to the outstanding questions identified by UNSCOM and the IAEA, including the material for which UNSCOM had been unable to account, the dossier's description of Iraq's capabilities and intent became part of the baseline against which the UK Government measured Iraq's future statements and actions and the success of weapons inspections.

893. As the next Section of the Report demonstrates, the judgements remained in place without challenge until the invasion of Iraq in March 2003. Iraq's denials of the capabilities and intent attributed to it were not taken seriously.

894. As the flaws in the construct and the intelligence were exposed after the conflict, the dossier and subsequent statements to Parliament also became the baseline against which the Government's good faith and credibility were judged.

895. There will continue to be demands for factual evidence to explain the background to controversial policy decisions including, where appropriate, the explicit and public use of assessed intelligence.

896. The Inquiry shares the Butler Review's conclusions that it was a mistake not to see the risk of combining in the September dossier the JIC's assessment of intelligence and other evidence with the interpretation and presentation of the evidence in order to make the case for policy action.

897. The nature of the two functions is fundamentally different. As can be seen from the JIC Assessments quoted in, and published with, this report, they contain careful language intended to ensure that no more weight is put on the evidence than it can bear. Organising the evidence in order to present an argument in the language of Ministerial statements produces a quite different type of document.

898. The widespread perception that the September 2002 dossier overstated the firmness of the evidence about Iraq's capabilities and intentions in order to influence opinion and "make the case" for action to disarm Iraq has produced a damaging legacy, including undermining trust and confidence in Government statements, particularly those which rely on intelligence which cannot be independently verified.

899. As a result, in situations where the policy response may involve military action and the evidence, at least in part, depends on inferential judgements drawn from necessarily incomplete intelligence, it may be more difficult to secure support for the Government's position and agreement to action.

900. The explicit and public use of material from JIC Assessments to underpin policy decisions will be infrequent. But, from the evidence on the compilation of the September dossier, the lessons for any similar exercise in future would be:

- The need for clear separation of the responsibility for analysis and assessment of intelligence from the responsibility for making the argument for a policy.
- The importance of precision in describing the position. In the case of the September dossier, for instance, the term "programme" was used to describe disparate activities at very different stages of maturity. There was a "programme" to extend the range of the Al Samoud missile. There was no "programme" in any meaningful sense to develop and produce nuclear weapons. Use of the shorthand CW or BW in relation to Iraq's capability obscured whether the reference was to weapons or warfare. Constant use of the term "weapons of mass destruction" without further clarification obscured the differences between the potential impact of nuclear, biological and chemical weapons and the ability to deliver them effectively. For example, there would be a considerable difference between the effects of an artillery shell filled with mustard gas, which is a battlefield weapon, and a long-range ballistic missile with a chemical or biological warhead, which is a weapon of terror.

- The need to identify and accurately describe the confidence and robustness of the evidence base. There may be evidence which is "authoritative" or which puts an issue "beyond doubt"; but there are unlikely to be many circumstances when those descriptions could properly be applied to inferential judgements relying on intelligence.
- The need to be explicit about the likelihood of events. The possibility of Iraq producing and using an improvised nuclear device was, rightly, omitted from the dossier. But the claim that Iraq could build a nuclear weapon within one to two years if it obtained fissile material and other essential components from foreign sources was included without addressing how feasible and likely that would be. In addition, the Executive Summary gave prominence to the IISS suggestion that Iraq would be able to assemble nuclear weapons within months if it could obtain fissile material, without reference to the material in the main text of the dossier which made clear that the UK took a very different view.
- The need to be scrupulous in discriminating between facts and knowledge on the one hand and opinion, judgement or belief on the other.
- The need for vigilance to avoid unwittingly crossing the line from supposition to certainty, including by constant repetition of received wisdom.

901. When assessed intelligence is explicitly and publicly used to support a policy decision, there would be benefit in subjecting that assessment and the underpinning intelligence to subsequent scrutiny, by a suitable, independent body, such as the Intelligence and Security Committee, with a view to identifying lessons for the future.

Conclusions 410

Introduction and key findings

1. This Section addresses the assessments between October 2002 and 19 March 2003 of Iraq's capabilities and intentions to:

- develop, produce and use chemical, biological and nuclear weapons and ballistic missiles; and
- conceal those programmes from the inspectors and obstruct their activities.

2. The Section also addresses the:

- advice based on intelligence provided to Ministers and others; and
- withdrawal of three important streams of SIS reporting in 2003 and 2004.

3. The roles of the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) and Secret Intelligence Service (SIS) are addressed in Section 2.

4. The assessment of Iraq's capabilities and intentions to develop, produce and use chemical, biological and nuclear weapons and ballistic missiles between 2000 and July 2002, including the initial preparation of a paper on Iraq for publication, is addressed in Section 4.1.

5. The subsequent JIC Assessments of 21 August and 9 September, the preparation of the dossier published on 24 September and Mr Blair's statement to the House of Commons on the same day, are addressed in Section 4.2.

6. The post-invasion search for evidence of weapons of mass destruction (WMD) in Iraq, the Government's response to the failure to find stockpiles of WMD in Iraq, demands for an independent judge-led inquiry into pre-conflict intelligence on Iraq's WMD and the decision to establish the Butler Review, and the Government's involvement with the preparation and publication of the series of reports produced by the Iraq Survey Group (ISG), are addressed in Section 4.4.

7. The development of UK strategy and options during this period, including Mr Blair's and Mr Straw's statements to Parliament on 18 March 2003, is addressed in Sections 3.5 to 3.8.

8. The military planning for a campaign in which chemical and biological weapons could be used, and the arrangements to provide protection for UK Forces, is addressed in Sections 6.1 to 6.3.

Key findings

- The core construct that Saddam Hussein's regime retained chemical and biological warfare capabilities, was determined to preserve and if possible enhance its capabilities, including at some point in the future a nuclear capability, and was pursuing an active policy of deception and concealment, underpinned the UK

Government's position that Iraq was a threat that had to be dealt with and it needed to disarm or be disarmed.

- That remained the case up to and beyond the decision to invade Iraq in March 2003.
- The judgements about Iraq's capabilities and intentions relied too heavily on Iraq's past behaviour being a reliable indicator of its current and future actions.
- There was no consideration of whether, faced with the prospect of a US-led invasion, Saddam Hussein had taken a different position.
- The Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) made the judgements in the UK Government September dossier part of the test for Iraq.
- Iraq's statements that it had no weapons or programmes were dismissed as further evidence of a strategy of denial.
- The extent to which the JIC's judgements depended on inference and interpretation of Iraq's previous attitudes and behaviour was not recognised.
- At no stage was the hypothesis that Iraq might no longer have chemical, biological or nuclear weapons or programmes identified and examined by either the JIC or the policy community.
- A formal reassessment of the JIC's judgements should have taken place after the report to the Security Council on 14 February 2003, by Dr Hans Blix, Executive Chairman of the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC), or, at the very latest, after his report of 7 March.
- Intelligence and assessments made by the JIC about Iraq's capabilities and intent continued to be used to prepare briefing material to support Government statements in a way which conveyed certainty without acknowledging the limitations of the intelligence.
- The independence and impartiality of the JIC remains of the utmost importance.
- The Secret Intelligence Service (SIS) had a responsibility to ensure that key recipients of its reporting were informed in a timely way when doubts arose about key sources and when, subsequently, intelligence was withdrawn.

The UK assessment of Iraq's position, October to December 2002

9. As the previous Sections of this Report show, there was an ingrained belief within the UK Government that Saddam Hussein's regime retained chemical and biological warfare capabilities, was determined to preserve and if possible enhance its capabilities, including at some point in the future a nuclear capability, and was pursuing an active policy of deception and concealment.

10. The UK position reflected the widely shared view that when the UN inspectors left Iraq in December 1998, Iraq had not fully accounted for major gaps and inconsistencies in its declarations and had provided no credible proof that Iraq had destroyed its weapons stockpiles and production infrastructure as it claimed.

11. In addition, the description of Iraq's capabilities and intent in the UK Government dossier, Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction. The Assessment of the British Government, published on 24 September, became part of the baseline against which the UK Government measured Iraq's statements and future actions and the success of weapons inspections.

Iraq's rebuttal of the UK dossier

12. The Iraqi Ministry of Foreign Affairs published a "detailed rebuttal" on 2 October, which described the UK dossier as "a series of lies and empty propaganda" which was "totally inconsistent" with the facts and reports made by the UN Special Commission (UNSCOM) and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA).[1]

13. The rebuttal emphasised Iraq's "intensive efforts" and co-operation between 1991 and 1998 in implementing resolution 687 (1991) and other UN Security Council resolutions. It also stated that Iraq had not imported any prohibited material.

14. Addressing the dossier's "claims about alleged activities after 1998", the Iraqi rebuttal stated:

- The "assumptions" about a nuclear programme were "groundless". Iraq's imports and facilities were subject to strict monitoring, including through the IAEA safeguards regime.
- The allegation that Iraq had tried to acquire uranium "from South Africa" was "a bogus lie".
- There were "no toxic chemical agents, precursors or chemical weapons"; and "no capabilities to produce chemical or biological agents".
- VX agent production required "an advanced technology" which was "not available in Iraq". It had not obtained "any large scale or significant production of VX agent" from equipment destroyed in 1997.
- The al-Muthanna site had been destroyed and was abandoned.
- The chlorine and phenol site at Fallujah 2 had produced chlorine for water purification and chlorine was no longer subject to monitoring.
- The Ibn-Sina site produced material for civil industries and its equipment had been tagged by UNSCOM.
- The al-Qaqa state company had no plant to produce phosgene and its equipment was tagged and monitored.
- Iraq was "completely clear of all biological weapons and agents" and did "not keep any quantity of these agents". The "botulinum protein" and "anthrax slurry" previously produced had a "short shelf life".
- The reaction to the allegation that mobile facilities were producing biological agent was "astonishment".

- Claims that Iraq had "reconstructed and renewed the sites … previously used in producing biological agents" were "groundless and false".
- Iraq did "not possess any missile with a range greater than 150km".
- The new engine test station was for "horizontal testing" of "Al Samoud" engines and "could not be used for larger engines".
- RPVs [remotely piloted vehicles] were for aerial reconnaissance.
- Facilities at the al-Mamoun plant had been destroyed and it could not be used for solid fuel missiles.

15. A review of the rebuttal by the Assessments Staff stated that it did not undermine the UK dossier and in a number of key areas failed to provide a credible response.

16. Mr Julian Miller, Chief of the Assessments Staff, told Sir David Manning, Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser and Head of the Cabinet Office Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec), that a review of the rebuttal conducted by the Assessments Staff, the intelligence agencies and the FCO dismissed the rebuttal as: "In broad terms … very weak; long on rhetoric and short on detail."[2]

17. Mr Miller added that the document presented "a somewhat rosy picture" of Iraq's relationship with UNSCOM. He characterised Iraq's refutation of the UK "claim that its WMD programmes have continued post 1998" as an "attitude of denial".

18. Mr Miller stated that there was "nothing in the detail of the Iraqi reply" that undermined the dossier and that:

> "In a number of key areas they have failed to provide any credible response. For example they:
>
> - claim that accusations that they are seeking uranium from South Africa is a 'bogus lie'. But the dossier did not mention South Africa …
> - claim the al-Rafah [engine] test stand is for horizontal rather than vertical engine testing Al Samoud missile …
> - merely state that accusations of mobile biological agent production facilities are 'astonishing'."

19. Under a heading 'Iraq: Still Playing Games', press lines prepared by the Communications and Information Centre (CIC) focused on:

- Iraq's pre-1998 co-operation with UNSCOM and its failures to:
  - provide full and comprehensive disclosures;

- allow the inspectors immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to relevant sites, documents and persons; and
- the material for which UNSCOM had been unable to account.

20. The press lines did not acknowledge or address Iraq's explicit denials of possession of prohibited weapons, materials and programmes.

21. Mr Miller concluded: "I do not think we need to offer a fuller reply to any of Iraq's claims."

22. There was no consideration of the risks which Iraq would have faced by issuing a detailed rebuttal which inspections might show to be untrue.

JIC Assessment, 11 October 2002: 'Iraq: The Return of UN Inspectors'

23. The JIC assessed on 11 October that Saddam Hussein was determined to retain Iraq's proscribed weapons programme and that he was confident he could prevent the UN inspectors, operating under existing UN resolutions, from finding any evidence before military options started to close in spring 2003.

24. Without specific intelligence, the inspectors would not know where to look.

25. As military pressure increased, Iraq's concealment policy could be undermined by the requirement to prepare hidden "chemical and biological missile systems for military deployment".

26. At the request of OD Sec, the JIC assessed Iraq's attitude and approach to dealing with the return of UN weapons inspectors.[3] It also assessed Iraq's concealment policy.

27. The minutes of the JIC discussion of the draft Assessment on 9 October recorded that:

- Iraq was "very confident" about its concealment policy and "had put a lot of effort into ensuring that inspectors would not find anything".
- "UNMOVIC [UN Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission] still had no information about suspect sites and without specific intelligence, it would be impossible for them to know where to start looking."
- "A tougher, penetrative [inspections] regime backed by a good intelligence flow from inside Iraq, would therefore be absolutely central to success".
- "… [A]s military pressure increased, the point would come when concealment would make it impossible" for Iraq to "prepare for weaponisation".[4]

[4] Minutes, 9 October 2002, JIC meeting.

28. The JIC Assessment, 'Iraq: The Return of UN Inspectors', was issued on 11 October.[5]

29. The JIC's Key Judgements were:

- Saddam is determined to retain Iraq's proscribed weapons programmes. He is confident that he can prevent UNMOVIC, operating on the basis of existing UNSCRs [United Nations Security Council resolutions], from finding any evidence before military options start to close off in spring 2003.
- Concealment and dispersal of sensitive items are the main elements of Iraq's strategy for dealing with UNMOVIC. The inspectors are hampered by poor preparedness and a lack of intelligence, so far, to guide them.
- Saddam will probably accept a new UN resolution. If inspections are conducted under a tougher regime, and if specific intelligence on WMD locations is forthcoming in response to clear US determination to topple Saddam, UNMOVIC might find evidence of Iraq's WMD programmes.
- In the short-term, we do not expect a repeat of the blatant Iraqi policy of intimidation and obstruction that UNSCOM encountered. Widespread Iraqi obstruction would be seen as too obvious a challenge to the authority of the UN. But if inspectors come close to uncovering evidence of WMD, Iraq will employ a wide range of tactics to delay their work.
- Iraq will use all diplomatic efforts, backed by its economic leverage on its neighbours, to undermine political support for a continuation of the inspections and sanctions."

30. The Assessment is addressed in detail in Section 3.5. The key points in relation to Iraq's possession of WMD and its intent to conceal its capabilities and deceive the inspectors were:

- Intelligence indicated that Saddam Hussein was "determined to retain Iraq's weapons of mass destruction", which he considered "to be a key part of Iraq's regional political and military power". He was "adamant that UN weapons inspectors should not be allowed to find and destroy the WMD capability that Iraq has been able to develop further in the four years since UNSCOM left in 1998".
- Iraq was "confident" that it could "ensure the inspectors, acting under the terms of existing UNSCRs", would "not be able to find anything when they return and that Iraq will retain its proscribed weapons programmes".
- "A body of intelligence" indicated that "concealment and dispersal of sensitive items" were "the main planks of Iraq's strategy to deal with the return of weapons inspectors". Saddam Hussein had "reportedly taken into account the experience gained during the UNSCOM inspections" and believed he could "exploit weaknesses in the inspections regime" in resolution 1284 (1999).

- Qusay Hussein (Saddam Hussein's son) had "instructed that the production of sensitive materials be moved to other secret locations. We have little intelligence on these locations …"
- Iraq's concealment efforts were "widespread". Iraq had "had time to prepare"; and stocks of chemical and biological weapons would be "considerably smaller than after the Gulf War".
- Intelligence showed that "steps were being taken to prevent weapons inspectors from finding any prohibited weapons, sensitive papers and documents, including by hiding them in residential buildings, schools and private homes. Duplicate and non-essential papers had been destroyed and the remaining archives had been split up and hidden in the homes of trusted officials. In the absence of specific intelligence, the prospects of successfully finding illicit material at such sites is very limited …"
- Iraq was "exploiting dual-use sites and mobile production facilities" and reporting indicated that it was "confident that any inspection of dual-use facilities" would be "unsuccessful": the equipment could be used for legitimate purposes "and any incriminating raw material or prohibited product would be removed before any inspection".
- Iraq had "developed transportable biological production facilities with the intention of not only making it harder to target them but also difficult to find them. Iraq may also have dispersed stocks of chemical and biological weapons away from suspect sites to avoid detection. Intelligence indicates that Iraq has explored unorthodox options for delivering chemical and biological weapons which means the weapons inspectors will have difficulty knowing what to look for."
- Iraq was "confident in its concealment plans". "The fact that Saddam is prepared, temporarily, to allow sensitive equipment out of his 'immediate' control, indicates the importance he attaches to retaining chemical and biological weapons and ballistic missiles."

31. Commenting on Iraq's repeated statements that it had "nothing to declare and no documents to reveal", the Assessment stated:

> "… the longer inspectors remain in Iraq the greater the likely impact on Iraq's development programmes. UNMOVIC are more likely to come up with evidence of proscribed activity at Iraq's missile facilities than those associated with the chemical, biological and nuclear programmes. We judge that production could continue at a much reduced level whilst inspectors were in-country. As the military pressure against Iraq increases, its concealment policy could be undermined by the Iraqi requirement to prepare its hidden stocks of chemical and biological missile systems for military deployment."

The US National Intelligence Estimate

32. On 1 October, the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) produced its National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on 'Iraq's Continuing Programs for Weapons of Mass Destruction'.[6]

33. An unclassified document based on the NIE, published on 4 October, included the following judgements:

- "Iraq has continued its weapons of mass destruction (WMD) programs in defiance of UN resolutions and restrictions. Baghdad has chemical and biological weapons as well as missiles with ranges in excess of UN restrictions; if left unchecked, it probably will have a nuclear weapon during this decade."
- "Baghdad hides large portions of Iraq's WMD efforts …"
- "Since inspections ended in 1998, Iraq has maintained its chemical weapons effort, energized its missile program, and invested more heavily in biological weapons; most analysts assess Iraq is reconstituting its nuclear weapons program."
- "How quickly Iraq will obtain its first nuclear weapon depends on when it acquires sufficient weapons-grade fissile material."
- "Baghdad has begun renewed production of chemical warfare agents, probably including mustard, sarin, cyclosarin, and VX." Iraq's capability was "probably more limited now" than it was in 1991, although VX production and agent storage life had probably "been improved". Iraq probably possessed "CW [chemical warfare] bulk fill" for ballistic missile warheads "including for a limited number of covertly stored, extended range Scuds".
- "All key aspects – R&D, production, and weaponization – of Iraq's offensive BW [biological warfare] program are active and most elements are larger and more advanced than they were before the Gulf war."
- "Iraq maintains a small missile force and several development programs, including for a UAV [unmanned aerial vehicle] that most analysts believe probably is intended to deliver biological warfare agents."[7]

34. The discussion of Iraq's biological warfare programme included reference to "a large-scale, redundant, and concealed BW agent production capability, which includes mobile facilities; these facilities can evade detection, are highly survivable, and can exceed the production rates Iraq had prior to the Gulf war".

35. The discussion on the Iraqi nuclear programme referred to "Iraq's aggressive attempts to obtain proscribed high-strength aluminium tubes" and stated that all "intelligence experts agree that Iraq is seeking nuclear weapons and that these tubes could be used in a centrifuge enrichment program", although it acknowledged that some did not believe that this was their intended use.

36. In July 2004, the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence produced a Report … on the U.S. Intelligence Community's Prewar Intelligence Assessments on Iraq.[8] The conclusions of the Committee drew attention to the uncertainties behind the judgements in the NIE (see Section 4.4).

37. In their letter to President Bush on 31 March 2005, the members of the Commission on the Intelligence Capabilities of the United States Regarding Weapons of Mass Destruction, established by President Bush on 6 February 2004, drew attention to the failure to make clear just how much of the analysis was based on assumptions, rather than good evidence.[9]

38. Writing in 2012, Mr Colin Powell, US Secretary of State, described the NIE evidence as "mostly circumstantial and inferential", but "persuasive".[10]

PRESIDENT BUSH'S SPEECH IN CINCINNATI, 7 OCTOBER 2002

39. In advance of the votes in Congress to authorise the use of force if it proved necessary to enforce Security Council demands, President Bush used a speech in Cincinnati on 7 October to set out in detail the case for urgent action to disarm Iraq.[11] President Bush stated that Iraq "possesses and produces chemical and biological weapons" and "the evidence indicates that Iraq is reconstituting its nuclear weapons program".

40. Other points made by President Bush included:

- There were concerns that Iraq was "exploring ways of using UAVs for missions targeting the United States".
- Iraq and Al Qaida (AQ) had "high level contacts that go back a decade".
- Some AQ leaders who had fled Afghanistan were in Iraq, including "one very senior … leader" who had "been associated with planning for chemical and biological attacks".
- "[C]onfronting the threat posed by Iraq" was "crucial to winning the war against terror". Saddam Hussein was "harboring terrorists and the instruments of terror, the instruments of mass death and destruction". He could not be trusted and the risk that he would "use them, or provide them to a terror network" was "simply too great".

- The enemies of the US would be "eager to use biological or chemical, or a nuclear weapon", and it "must not ignore the threat": "Facing clear evidence of peril, we cannot wait for the final proof – the smoking gun – that could come in the form of a mushroom cloud."

Security Council open debate, 16 and 17 October 2002

41. In his statement on 17 October, during an open debate on Iraq, Sir Jeremy Greenstock, UK Permanent Representative to the United Nations in New York, emphasised the reliability of the intelligence on which the UK analysis of Iraq's capabilities was based.

42. The Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) asked on 10 October for an "emergency open debate on the situation in Iraq".[12]

43. An open debate of the Council, attended by more than 50 Member States or Permanent Observers, in addition to the members of the Security Council, took place on 16 and 17 October.[13]

44. In his statement on 17 October, Sir Jeremy Greenstock set out the UK position. In relation to Iraq's weapons of mass destruction he stated:

> "We remain deeply perturbed by evidence that Iraq believes it can hide its weapons of mass destruction rather than declare them, that it can again fool the inspectors and play games with them. The United Kingdom analysis, backed by reliable intelligence, indicates that Iraq still possesses chemical and biological materials, has continued to produce them, has sought to weaponise them, and has active military plans for the deployment of such weapons. The United Kingdom analysis, backed up by reliable intelligence, shows that Iraq has in recent years tried to buy multiple components relevant to the production of a nuclear bomb. The United Kingdom analysis, backed by reliable intelligence, points to the retention of extended-range missiles and to the employment of hundreds of people in projects to develop weapons with a range of over 1,000 kilometres that could carry both weapons of mass destruction and conventional warheads.

JIC Current Intelligence Group Assessment, 28 October 2002: 'Global Chemical and Biological Weapons Survey'

45. A global survey of chemical and biological weapons on 28 October addressed the practicalities of producing chemical and biological weapons and how they might be used.

46. It stated that intelligence indicated that Iraq continued to produce chemical agent. It assessed that Iraq was producing chemical and biological agents and that the agents could be weaponised; it did not say that Iraq was doing so.

47. At the request of the MOD, the JIC issued a Current Intelligence Group (CIG) global survey of chemical and biological weapons on 28 October.[14] It provided a general assessment of the practicalities involved in producing and using chemical and biological agents, and an assessment of the capabilities of several countries, including Iraq. It highlighted the relative ease with which many chemical and biological agents could be produced and disseminated, and the impact of their use.

48. The Key Judgements stated:

- There are few significant technical problems in the production or dissemination of many chemical warfare (CW) and biological warfare (BW) agents.
- Ballistic missiles and most conventional munitions, such as artillery shells, rockets and aerial bombs can be modified to deliver agent. It can also be sprayed from land or marine platforms and a variety of aerial systems.
- BW agents are less suitable for some battlefield roles than CW because they generally act more slowly. CBW could play an increasing role in military thinking, especially asymmetrically. The use of even small quantities of CW could help redress conventional superiority on the battlefield. BW agents have the potential for covert, deniable delivery which is particularly suited to terrorist-type attacks and asymmetric warfare.
- The potential for the proliferation of CBW is increasing. Arms control treaties and export regimes hinder, but cannot stop the trends.
- There is a growing risk of secondary proliferation [of technical knowledge and experience as well as equipment and hardware] between countries of concern. […]
- States are increasingly using sophisticated denial, deception and concealment methods, including the use of dual-use and/or underground facilities, to hide their activities."

[14] CIG Assessment, 28 October 2002, 'Global Chemical and Biological Weapons Survey'.

49. Other points made in the Assessment included:

- The equipment and materials used in the production of CW and BW agents were "subject to international export controls imposed by some countries but all are dual-use. They can therefore be imported for legitimate purposes."
- "Once in country it is difficult to prevent such equipment and materials being diverted to offensive CBW programmes."
- "The very large quantities of CW agent required for a significant military attack (of the order of one tonne, optimally disseminated, is needed to contaminate 2.5 sq km …) mean that a large-scale delivery capability is needed."
- "The effectiveness of an attack depends on the lethality and persistency of the agent …"
- "BW agents are more potent than CW agents, cheaper, easier to produce and usable against a wide range of targets. A country does not need a sophisticated biotechnology industry to produce BW. Their potency means that the quantities required for an effective large-sale attack are relatively small … and have the potential to cause more casualties. If effectively disseminated in unprotected urban population centres some BW agents could cause casualties on a scale similar to that of a nuclear attack. Of particular concern are agents that are not just virulent, but highly infectious and capable of causing an epidemic … [E]ffective delivery is difficult to guarantee."

50. In relation to Iraq's chemical weapons programme, the Assessment stated:

"We continue to judge … that Iraq has an offensive CW programme and intelligence indicates that it has continued to produce chemical agent … Despite UNSCOM's efforts, we believe Iraq retained some production equipment, small stocks of agent precursors, and small quantities of agents and weapons, including warheads for the Al Hussein 650km ballistic missile. Apart from this hidden capability, Iraq has also retained documentation on CW agent production and experienced key personnel. Despite the constraints that have been put in place to restrict Iraq's access to dual-use equipment, the chemical industry has been built up and could be used to support an offensive CW programme."

51. In relation to Iraq's biological weapons programme, the Assessment stated:

"… Iraq has continued with an offensive BW programme. Research, development and production is assessed to continue under cover of a number of outwardly legitimate institutes and covert facilities. Confirmed intelligence reveals that transportable BW production facilities have been constructed. Iraq has possibly already made significant quantities of BW agents and intelligence indicates that it has continued to produce biological agents. We judge that Iraq is self-sufficient in its BW programme and currently has available, either from pre-Gulf War stocks or more recent production, anthrax spores, botulinum toxin, aflatoxin and possibly plague and ricin."

52. The Assessment also stated:

> "Iraq also researched a number of other agents within its offensive programme, some of which may be available for production. "Iraq can weaponise CBW agents into missile warheads, bombs, artillery rockets and shells, and could adapt helicopters, manned and un-manned aircraft … to disseminate agent. CBW plays an important role in Iraqi military thinking. As compensation for its conventional military weakness Iraq is determined to retain CBW in order to dominate its neighbours. Intelligence indicates Iraq is ready to use CBW weapons and that munitions could be with military units and ready for firing within 20-45 minutes."

53. Addressing the judgements in the Assessment, the Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction, chaired by Lord Butler of Brockwell, stated:

> "The judgement that Iraq was continuing to produce chemical agent was supported by one new intelligence report received on 30 September."[15]

> "… The most significant change in this assessment was in the JIC's indication … that the intelligence on mobile biological agent production facilities had been 'confirmed' … based on the receipt of one intelligence report, from a reliable and established source quoting a new sub-source. That report reinforced the large volume of reports on those facilities received from a single source through a liaison service since April 2000, although our view is that the new report was complementary to rather than confirming those from the liaison source."[16]

Iraq's response to resolution 1441

54. Resolution 1441 was adopted on 8 November 2002 by a unanimous vote of the members of the Security Council.[17] Referring to his statement on 17 October, during the Security Council's open debate on Iraq, Sir Jeremy Greenstock stated that there was "no shadow of doubt" that Iraq had defied the UN and had sought to hinder and frustrate inspections since 1991.

55. Iraq announced on 13 November that it would comply with resolution 1441.

56. Iraq re-stated its position that it had neither produced nor was in possession of weapons of mass destruction since the inspectors left in December 1998. It explicitly challenged the UK statement on 8 November that Iraq had "decided to keep possession" of its WMD.

[17] UN Security Council, '4644th Meeting Friday 8 November 2002' (S/PV.4644).

57. Iraq informed the Security Council of its decision to comply with the resolution "without conditions" in a letter from Mr Naji Sabri, the Iraqi Foreign Minister, to Mr Kofi Annan, the UN Secretary-General, on 13 November 2002.[18]

58. The key points in the letter in relation to WMD were:

- The claims by President Bush and Mr Blair that "Iraq might have produced, or might have been on the way to producing, nuclear weapons" since 1998 and that "Iraq had indeed produced chemical and biological weapons" was "an utterly unfounded fabrication" and "baseless".
- Iraq had agreed to the return of inspectors, and had "already stated" that it had "neither produced nor possessed any nuclear, chemical or biological weapons of mass destruction during the absence of the inspectors".

59. The letter challenged a statement made by Sir Jeremy Greenstock that Iraq had been provided with the opportunity to dispose of its weapons of mass destruction, but Iraq had ignored that opportunity and decided to keep possession. The letter asked why "none of the representatives" of the members of the Security Council had "asked … when, how or where such an alleged decision had been taken by Iraq to keep weapons of mass destruction".

60. The UK remained sceptical about Iraq's intentions, focusing on its track record of deceit, and repeating the need to maintain the threat of military action to secure compliance.

61. In a lecture that evening, Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary, welcomed Iraq's response "so far as it goes" but added:

> "… we must remain vigilant for experience with Iraq tells us to temper optimism with scepticism and to read the small print. Iraq's intentions are notoriously changeable. What matters above all is their actions not their words.
>
> "… The history of UN weapons inspections in Iraq is littered with examples of deceit, evasion, intimidation and harassment. I hope even Iraq will recognise the consequences of any repeat. If Saddam fails to co-operate fully, then he faces force."[19]

JIC ASSESSMENT, 14 NOVEMBER 2002: 'IRAQ: REGIME COHESION UNDER PRESSURE'

62. The JIC judged on 14 November that:

- Iraq accepted resolution 1441 because Saddam Hussein knew that this was the only way to avert a large-scale US-led ground attack.
- Iraq could try to overload UNMOVIC by releasing large volumes of information about legitimate industries. It might admit to some "expendable" parts of its WMD, but it would focus on concealing sensitive items from inspectors.

63. In parallel with the adoption of resolution 1441, the JIC decided to revisit its July 2002 Assessment of regime cohesion in Iraq to:

> "… examine how the Iraqi regime is responding to mounting international pressure … [and] assess whether there are any signs of strain within the regime and evaluate the speed and effectiveness of Iraqi decision-making."[20]

64. In the JIC discussion of the draft Assessment on 13 November, the point was made that concealment and the retention of a WMD capability "remained a cornerstone of Saddam's policy" and his intention was to allow the inspectors in and manage the inspections indefinitely as a means of avoiding conflict. But the resolution put the onus on Iraq to prove it had no WMD programmes. The inspectors would need to be prepared to deal with diversionary tactics including lengthy inspections of sites not related to WMD.[21]

65. The JIC Assessment, 'Iraq: Regime Cohesion Under Pressure', was issued on 14 November.[22] In its Key Judgements the JIC stated:

- Iraq accepted resolution 1441 "because Saddam knew that this was the only way to avert a large-scale US-led coalition ground attack. The regime probably believes that a coalition attack will not be possible when inspectors are inside Iraq."
- "Iraq could try to overload UNMOVIC by releasing large volumes of information about legitimate industries. Although less likely, Iraq might admit to some 'expendable' parts of its WMD programmes to demonstrate ostensible co-operation and to provoke divisions in the UN. But it will focus on concealing sensitive items from inspectors."

[21] Minutes, 13 November 2002, JIC meeting.
[22] JIC Assessment, 14 November 2002, 'Iraq: Regime Cohesion Under Pressure'.

66. In relation to Iraq's WMD programmes and the return of inspectors, the Assessment stated:

- Saddam Hussein's "overriding priority" was "regime survival" and "he also had a very strong commitment to retaining WMD" which he saw as "key to Iraqi power and influence". Iraq had "no credible alternative to ostensible co-operation with the UN".
- The JIC had "no new intelligence" on whether Iraq would "declare any prohibited materials or activity in response" to resolution 1441. Any disclosures on WMD would "damage the regime's already limited credibility, given its continuing blanket denials of WMD possession". The Iraqi regime would "seek to take advantage of any opportunity to fudge Iraq's obligations or delay the UN process".
- Senior Iraqis agreed "that Iraq should maintain a WMD capability", but if UNMOVIC made "demonstrable progress which threatens to overcome Iraq's policy of deception and concealment, and Saddam refuses to give ground, there could be pressure on key insiders to break with Saddam in order to ensure their own survival".

INTELLIGENCE UPDATE, 21 NOVEMBER 2002

67. Mr John Scarlett, Chairman of the JIC, wrote to No.10 on 21 November to highlight new intelligence on Iraq's thinking on managing UNMOVIC which he considered "confirmed" earlier JIC judgements.

68. Mr Scarlett concluded that the Iraqi regime was confident in its ability to mislead the inspectors.

69. Subsequent intelligence that Saddam Hussein had made clear that UNMOVIC was to be given no grounds for claiming that inspections were being obstructed was interpreted as part of a policy of concealment. The possibility that it might have indicated an intention to co-operate with UNMOVIC appears not to have been considered.

70. Mr Scarlett wrote to Sir David Manning and other senior officials on 21 November drawing their attention to "the first significant […] intelligence we have received on the Iraqi regime's thinking on how to manage UNMOVIC" since the adoption of resolution 1441.[23]

71. Mr Scarlett stated that the key points were:

- Iraq intended to demonstrate its ostensible co-operation with UNMOVIC but would actually resume its game playing.

---

[23] Minute Scarlett to Manning, 21 November 2002, 'Iraqi Strategy for Dealing with UNMOVIC'.

- Iraq intended to declare a small part of its illegal programmes, and overload UNMOVIC with large quantities of information on legitimate activities.
- WMD were seen as vital to the regime's survival, so a core WMD capability and infrastructure must be retained.
- Iraq was concerned about the provisions for conducting interviews of Iraqis outside Iraq, which could expose illicit procurement.
- There was concern about the potential destruction by the inspectors of dual-use facilities.

72. Mr Scarlett commented that the concerns about exposing illicit procurement might be referring to conventional weapons programmes and that the dual-use facilities supported "the WMD programmes".

73. Mr Scarlett wrote that the intelligence confirmed earlier JIC judgements, including the identification of "overload" as a potential strategy. There was no intelligence on which illegal programmes might be declared.

74. Mr Scarlett also drew attention to preparations to intimidate potential Iraqi interviewees.

75. Mr Scarlett's other comments included the observations that there seemed to be:

> "… an inconsistency in Iraq's policy towards inspectors. The [intelligence] indicates the regime plans to let the inspectors into any site. But it also indicates that the regime must rethink a core WMD capability."

76. Mr Scarlett concluded that it was "possible" that Iraq was "so confident of its concealment strategy that it believes inspectors will not discover prohibited activity. Nonetheless, this [intelligence] is important in that it further confirms that ultimately the Iraqi regime does not envisage having to accept genuine and complete disarmament, and is confident in its ability to mislead inspectors."

77. The intelligence described by Mr Scarlett was based on reported comments, including from someone with access to senior members of the Iraqi regime; but it was not quoting Saddam Hussein's views.

78. Mr Alastair Campbell, Mr Blair's Director of Communications and Strategy, wrote in his diaries:

> "There was some interesting stuff around on deception programmes, for example [Iraqi] officials being forced to put papers and materials in their homes with the warning that they and their families would be harmed if they were lost."[24]

---

[24] Campbell A & Hagerty B. The Alastair Campbell Diaries. Volume 4. The Burden of Power: Countdown to Iraq. Hutchinson, 2012.

79. The Assessments Staff Intelligence Update on 26 November stated that intelligence indicated Saddam Hussein was personally handling all dealings with UNMOVIC; and he was confident the inspectors would not find anything, nor find grounds for claiming Iraq had obstructed its work.[25]

80. The Update was summarising intelligence from a reliable source quoting Saddam Hussein's own views second hand. The intelligence reported that Saddam Hussein had made clear UNMOVIC was to be given no grounds for claiming that inspections were being obstructed; not that he was confident that the inspectors would not find grounds for claiming that they were being obstructed.

81. An Assessments Staff Intelligence Update on 3 December summarised recent reporting which suggested that Iraqi personnel were observing the inspectors, that officials had been instructed on how to handle the inspection teams, and that questioning overseas was forbidden.[26]

82. The Update also reported that:

- Iraq was afraid that inspectors would destroy weapons and materials which were not proscribed but had been acquired by procurement activities in contravention of resolution 687 (1991).
- There was reporting indicating that Iraq believed inspectors would not detect modifications to extend missile ranges.

SECURITY COUNCIL, 25 NOVEMBER 2002

83. Dr Hans Blix, the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC, gave an informal briefing to the Security Council on 25 November, reporting on his visit to Baghdad from 18 to 19 November with Dr Mohamed ElBaradei, the Director General of the IAEA.[27] Dr Blix told the Council that they had been assured Iraq intended to provide full co-operation.

84. Dr Blix reported that he had told Iraq that "many governments believed that WMD programmes remained in Iraq"; and that "The Council had wanted to offer Iraq a last opportunity. If the Iraqi side were to state – as it still did at our meeting – that there were no such programmes, it would need to provide convincing documentary or other evidence." The FFCDs (Full, Final, and Complete Declarations) submitted by Iraq to UNSCOM had, "in many cases left it an open question whether some weapons remained".

FCO ADVICE, 29 NOVEMBER 2002

85. On 29 November, in response to a request from Sir David Manning, Mr Straw's Private Office provided advice on handling Iraq's declaration required by resolution 1441.[28]

86. The FCO advised that Iraq could maintain it had "no WMD and defy UNMOVIC/IAEA to prove them wrong, confident that they can conceal the programmes uncovered by UNSCOM in 1998", but the expectation was that it would be "more subtle: declaring very large quantities of dual-use items and programmes and reiterating all … past declarations … In both cases our assumption is that they will continue to hide programmes …"

87. The UK aim should be to get the inspectors to "check (or audit)" the declaration "as soon as possible through intrusive inspections, interviews and access to records" against information from other sources, including:

- The information available to UNSCOM in 1998. If Iraq declared "nothing", it "must demonstrate the destruction of material or the disbandment of possible WMD programmes identified by UNSCOM".
- "Intelligence material provided by the US/UK. We have already pointed UNMOVIC towards key sites and provided a list of 6,500 individuals involved in WMD programmes …"
- Where the declaration was "inconsistent with intelligence", the UK would "want UNMOVIC/IAEA to be able to discover that inconsistency on the ground before notifying the Council". That would avoid giving Iraq the chance to conceal evidence.

JIC Assessment, 6 December 2002: 'Iraq: Military Options'

88. On 6 December 2002, as part of a wider assessment of Iraq's military capabilities and options, the JIC judged that Saddam Hussein would use chemical and biological weapons if he faced defeat, and might use them earlier in a conflict.

89. The Assessment itself identified possible practical and political considerations which might constrain such use.

90. An Assessments Staff Intelligence Update on 27 November 2002, 'Iraqi Use of Chemical and Biological Weapons – Possible Scenarios',[29] reported that intelligence on Iraq's plans for using chemical and biological weapons remained "limited".[30] It referred to intelligence that, in early September, Saddam Hussein had reiterated his intention to use CBW to defend his regime "if allied forces approached Baghdad, if Basra, Kirkuk or Mosul fell to allied control, or if Iraqi military units rebelled". He "would wait and see how neighbouring countries reacted to any Allied attack, and whether they had allowed their territory to be used by Allied forces, before deciding whether to use CBW against them". His initial "targets" would be "Israel, Kuwait and Jordan".

91. In the JIC discussion on 4 December, the draft Assessment was described as "an important paper which highlighted the gaps in our knowledge".[31] The judgements were based "largely on a mixture of observation and past experience", but the Assessment "did not quite do justice to the intelligence"; the judgements "could be made more confidently". The Assessment needed to bring out more clearly the risks of a phased attack and unpack the risks involved in possible scenarios, such as the possible use of CBW before Coalition Forces were properly assembled and urban fighting.

92. The JIC issued an Assessment of Iraq's military capabilities and options, which is considered in more detail in Section 6.1, on 6 December 2002.[32]

93. A Key Judgement stated that:

> "Saddam would use chemical and biological weapons … if he faced defeat. He might also use them earlier in a conflict, including against Coalition Forces, neighbouring states and his own people. Israel could be his first target …"

94. In the main text, the JIC set out its assessment of Iraq's missiles and unguided rockets. The text of the Assessment stated that, given the limited number of Al Hussein missiles, Iraq would use them "principally against Israel". Shorter-range missiles and unguided rockets "might be used against deployed coalition forces or Iraq's neighbours".

95. The Assessment stated:

> "We judge Iraq would be able to arm at least some of the missiles and rockets with chemical and biological (CBW) warheads. Iraqi aircraft or artillery could also deliver CBW. […] in mid-September Saddam re-iterated his willingness to use CBW, […]. Saddam also envisaged using CBW against Israel, Kuwait, and Jordan. This is consistent with earlier intelligence, but we lack definite corroboration. […] Iraqi interest in procuring large quantities of protective equipment and treatments for exposure to nerve agent. […] the regime would consider using CBW against internal uprisings or Shia-populated Iraqi cities, and for propaganda purposes could seek to blame the coalition. CBW use against civilians could cause severe casualties. And even relatively small-scale use could cause widespread panic and a serious humanitarian impact. Iraq's ability to use CBW might be constrained by its available stocks of agent and the difficulty of producing more while inspectors are present. But we do not know the extent of Iraq's current stocks or what it might have at such a stage."

[32] JIC Assessment, 6 December 2002, 'Iraq: Military Options'.

96. The JIC also stated:

> "In determining whether to use CBW, Saddam would have to balance the risk of strengthening the Coalition's political case for removing him against the desire to widen the war by involving Israel or inflicting unacceptable casualties upon the coalition. We judge that, faced with the likelihood of military defeat and being removed from power, it is unlikely Saddam could be deterred from ordering the use of CBW."

97. The JIC stated that Iraqi responses to a Coalition attack might include:

- "CBW terrorism: although Iraq probably lacks the capability to deploy a sophisticated device …"
- "using non-lethal BW in a deniable manner to cause sickness amongst Coalition troops as they assembled;"
- "Iraq … might also target the civilian Shia or Kurdish populations, possibly with CBW."

Iraq's declaration of 7 December and the UK response

98. Operative paragraph 3 (OP3) of resolution 1441 required Iraq to provide:

> "… not later than 30 days from the date of this resolution, a currently accurate, full and complete declaration of all aspects of its programmes to develop chemical, biological, and nuclear weapons, ballistic missiles and other delivery systems such as unmanned vehicles and dispersal systems designed for use on aircraft, including any holdings and the precise locations of such weapons, components, sub-components, stocks of agents, and related material and equipment, the locations and work of its research development and production facilities, as well as all other chemical, biological, and nuclear programmes, including for any which it claims are for purposes not related to weapons production or material."[33]

99. Iraq's declaration was provided on 7 December 2002.[34] The declaration was detailed and technical, written in a combination of English, Russian and Arabic, with approximately 7,000 pages dealing with ballistic missile projects. A backlog of semi-annual declarations of activity, covering the period 1998-2002, which Iraq had already provided to UNMOVIC, was not at that time available to the UK.

100. Mr Blair was advised on 11 December that there was impatience in the US Administration and it was looking at military action as early as mid-February 2003.

101. Sir David Manning and Sir Richard Dearlove, Chief of the Secret Intelligence Service, had a joint meeting with Dr Condoleezza Rice, President Bush's National Security Advisor, and Mr George Tenet, Director of Central Intelligence, in Washington on 9 December.[35]

102. Sir David reported to Mr Blair that there was impatience in the US Administration and pressure for early military action, probably in mid/late February. There were concerns about the risks if the inspections found nothing and the difficulties of persuading the international community to act if there were a series of "low level and less clear-cut acts of obstruction" rather than the discovery of chemical or biological agents or a nuclear programme, or the imprisonment or murder of UNMOVIC inspectors.

103. Sir David had said that Iraq's declaration should be handled in a way "calculated to maintain coalition support and to try to secure a second resolution". He thought that was possible. The UK needed "a convincing case based on evidence. Public defiance by Saddam was not the same as proving non-compliance. We should work hard over the next couple of months to build our case and secure a second resolution."

104. During a meeting with Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, and Admiral Sir Michael Boyce, Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS), to discuss military planning on 11 December (see Section 6.1), Sir David Manning and Sir Richard Dearlove also briefed Mr Blair on their recent visits to Washington and "on UK attempts to secure credible evidence that the Iraqi WMD Declaration was false" (see Section 3.6).[36]

105. Mr Matthew Rycroft, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, recorded that Mr Blair:

> "… said that we needed to analyse the Iraqi declaration, ask pointed questions about issues which the declaration failed to deal with … encourage Blix to ask these questions of the Iraqis too, and continue to work on securing credible evidence that Saddam was pursuing WMD programmes."

106. Mr Blair would speak to President Bush and possibly Dr Blix in the next few days.

107. Mr Miller advised Sir David Manning on 13 December that the declaration was "largely based on material already presented to the UN", and that:

> "There appears to have been no attempt to answer any of the unresolved questions highlighted by UNSCOM or refute any of the points made in the UK or US dossiers."[37]

108. The absence of new material was described as "striking, particularly in relation to the biological weapons programme, where UNSCOM have described previous Iraqi FFCDs as deficient in all areas". The Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) had also clarified that Iraq had "only previously admitted to testing VX in aerial munitions, not to any other weaponisation".

109. Mr Blair told President Bush on 16 December that the Iraqi declaration was "patently false".

110. Mr Blair was "cautiously optimistic" that the inspectors would find proof. Sir Richard Dearlove was pursuing that.

111. Mr Blair suggested he and President Bush should take stock in January.

112. Mr Blair and President Bush spoke on 16 December.[38]

113. Mr Blair commented that the Iraqi declaration "was patently false. We now needed proof that demonstrated it." He and President Bush discussed the need to put the burden of truth on Saddam Hussein, how much time he should be allowed and the need to avoid a loss of momentum.

114. Mr Blair said that military preparations should continue. He did not think that Saddam Hussein would co-operate. He was "cautiously optimistic that the inspectors might find proof that the declaration was false. We needed something or someone who was in some way involved." Sir Richard Dearlove was pursuing that with Mr Tenet.

115. Mr Blair was "hopeful that this strategy would work; we should take stock in January if it was".

116. During his visit to Washington in mid-December, Sir Richard Dearlove emphasised the need for sufficient evidence to make a convincing case that Iraq had failed to abide by resolution 1441.

117. During a discussion on 15 December, Sir Richard Dearlove told his interlocutor that his impression from his meeting with Mr Blair on 11 December was that "HMG [Her Majesty's Government] would need clear evidence beyond an audit of the Iraqi declaration, to commit to military action".[39]

118. The report sent to Sir David Manning recorded that Sir Richard had discussed the Iraq declaration and the need for a "road map" setting out the next steps with a number of US officials.[40]

119. Sir Richard told one US official that, in addition to setting out clearly and persuasively that Iraq had failed to abide by resolution 1441:

> "… we needed to continue on parallel tracks designed to reinforce the case, and for HMG, to give the PM sufficient evidence of a breach which the declaration by itself did not. We needed:
>
> - a detailed audit of the declaration
> - to press the interview issue or force Saddam's refusal to co-operate
> - to prepare for the release of intelligence to prove deception
> - to press on with a rigorous inspection regime absent a 'silver-bullet'."

120. Sir Richard said that "perhaps by the end of January all those elements would have produced sufficient evidence to make the convincing case we needed". A "convincing defector or a revealing site inspection" would be preferable, "but we could not depend on this". He added later that "success was far from guaranteed".

121. In a separate conversation with another official, Sir Richard Dearlove had said that he "estimated the chance of a successful operation to produce a defector or a smoking gun at about 20 percent".

122. In a manuscript comment to Mr Blair, Sir David wrote that "we should go flat out" to find a defector or evidence in a site inspection.[41]

123. Mr Blair replied: "absolutely".[42]

124. Against Sir Richard's estimate of the chances of success, Mr Jonathan Powell, Mr Blair's Chief of Staff, wrote: "Not good".[43]

125. On the description of a discussion about a possible presentation of intelligence "when conflict was inevitable", including overhead photographs of material being moved and intercepts of conversations about deception operations, Mr Blair wrote "but can't this be used to convince Blix?"[44]

DOUBTS ABOUT THE SOURCING CHAIN FOR SIS REPORTS ISSUED ON 11 AND 23 SEPTEMBER 2002

126. By December 2002, doubts had emerged within SIS about the reliability of the source who had given SIS the reporting issued on 11 and 23 September.

127. Section 4.2 sets out the material from SIS reports described as from "A new source on trial with direct access" and issued to a small number of very senior readers on 11 and 23 September. These stated that Iraq had accelerated the production of chemical and biological agents and that Saddam Hussein was determined to maintain his CBW capability. Mr Blair and others were told that the SIS expected to receive substantial additional material on Iraq's chemical and biological programmes through the same source.

128. Sir Richard Dearlove was reported to have briefed Mr Straw "in general terms only, on the hoped for dump of material from [codename] and the importance it would have" on 27 September.[45] Mr Straw had "asked several questions about [codename's] motivation and whether he was genuine". Sir Richard had told him that the answer to the first was "money and ideology", and that the answer to the second was "yes".

129. When he was asked by the Inquiry about the questions raised by Mr Straw about the sourcing for the report, SIS4 outlined the level of confidence that SIS had had in the source at this point and the reasons for those views and set out the steps which were open to SIS in these circumstances to validate the intelligence.[46] But he explained that he was unsighted on the exact steps taken in this case.

130. In early October, questions were raised with SIS about the mention of glass containers in the 23 September 2002 report.[47] It was pointed out that:

- Glass containers were not typically used in chemical munitions; and that a popular movie (The Rock) had inaccurately depicted nerve agents being carried in glass beads or spheres.
- Iraq had had difficulty in the 1980s obtaining a key precursor chemical for soman [a chemical agent].

131. The questions about the use of glass containers for chemical agent and the similarity of the description to those portrayed in The Rock had been recognised by SIS.[48] There were some precedents for the use of glass containers but the points would be pursued when further material became available.

132. A document written on 11 November described the issue of acquiring the promised further reporting as "reaching a crucial point" and that it was being afforded "our highest priority".[49] It also said that Sir Richard Dearlove was "following progress of the case".

133. On 13 November, Sir Richard Dearlove "updated" Mr Straw "on our hopes to get further [codename] reporting".[50] Sir Richard described "in outline terms only" the delays in obtaining the expected intelligence and, given its importance, possible steps to retrieve it.

134. By 6 December, questions were being asked within SIS about whether there was any further reporting.[51] It was suggested that that meant "a health warning" on material from SIS's source.

135. Following further contacts, doubts were expressed on 9 December within SIS about the reliability of the source and whether he had "made up all or part of the account of his dealings" with the sub-source.[52]

136. Reporting on 16 December suggested that further material did exist.[53]

137. Sir Richard Dearlove's Private Secretary recorded that Mr Straw asked for an "update on the likelihood" of [codename] "producing silver bullet intelligence to guide the UNMOVIC inspection teams" in his meeting with Sir Richard Dearlove on 19 December.[54]

138. Sir Richard was reported to have stated that "the outcome of [codename] was still in the balance". SIS was talking to his contacts and he [the sub-source] "definitely existed"; but he "may not have written up the intelligence in the manner which was being claimed for him".

139. Sir Richard also told Mr Straw that US policy and planning – the "generation of a road map" – were proceeding "on the assumption that a silver bullet would not be forthcoming".

140. Mr Straw was reported to have been "concerned by the timetabling and what would happen without evidence of a clear material breach"; and that "in a recent meeting the Prime Minister had made the point that unless there was a clear material breach, he would face political difficulties in joining the US in military action". Mr Straw had said it was "important that there was a sufficiently strong case against Saddam to move a resolution at the UNSC". The "objective was to 'scare the pants off the Iraqis'".

141. Following the meeting, a copy of the report of Sir Richard's visit to Washington was sent to Mr Straw's office on 19 December.[55]

142. By 24 December there were still "unresolved questions" about the SIS case.[56]

JIC ASSESSMENT, 18 DECEMBER 2002

143. The JIC's initial Assessment on 18 December 2002 of Iraq's declaration stated:

- Intelligence from late November indicted that Iraq's aim was to overload UNMOVIC with information.

[56] SIS record, 24 December 2002.

- Iraq "continued to claim that it has not conducted any illicit WMD or ballistic missile programmes since 1991".
- There had been "No serious attempt" to answer any of the unresolved questions highlighted by UNSCOM or to refute any of the points made in the UK dossier on Iraq's WMD programme.

144. The JIC Assessment addressed the substance of the issues, but the judgement that Iraq had made no attempt to deal with the points in the dossier made the dossier a test for Iraq.

145. That was not its purpose. It was for the UN not the UK to define the bar for Iraq.

146. An initial DIS Assessment of Iraq's declaration of 7 December, based on an analysis of the text provided in English and an attempt to translate the key sections written in Arabic, was produced on 16 December.[57]

147. On 18 December, the JIC discussed a draft Assessment, supported by the DIS analysis of 16 December.[58]

148. Comments recorded in the minutes of the discussion included:

- There had been "no significant disagreements of perception or judgement between the UK and the US".
- The declaration was "surprisingly bad"; virtually none of the issues arising from the 1999 UNSCOM report had been answered.
- Further analysis of the annexes "would be an enormous job", and the UK "would have to rely upon seeing the UN translation of much of the Arabic material". That text was "unlikely to contain the missing information".
- There would be "a fuller assessment in due course".

149. The JIC Assessment, 'An initial Assessment of Iraq's WMD Declaration', was issued on 18 December, with the DIS Assessment of 16 December as an Annex.[59]

150. The Key Judgements were:

- The declaration failed "to address the issues outstanding from UNSCOM's report to the UN Security Council in 1999".
- Iraq maintained that it currently had "no proscribed WMD programmes".
- "The majority of information in the declaration" had "already been passed to the UN in some form".

[58] Minutes, 18 December 2002, JIC meeting.
[59] JIC Assessment, 18 December 2002, 'An Initial Assessment of Iraq's WMD Declaration'.

- "The new material so far found" did "not alter UK assessments of Iraq's WMD programmes".
- The declaration made "no attempt to deal with the points made in the UK dossier".

151. The key elements of the Assessment are set out in the Box below.

JIC Assessment, 18 December 2002: 'An Initial Assessment of Iraq's WMD Declaration'

The Assessment rehearsed the UK's knowledge of Iraq's production of WMD before 1991 and the material which UNSCOM had been "unable to account for", and the judgements in the September dossier.

Intelligence on the declaration

"Intelligence indicated in early November that Iraq was considering a number of options … including a possible admission of a small proportion of its illegal activity. But by late November intelligence indicated that Iraq's declaration would omit references to its banned weapons and that the aim was to overload UNMOVIC with information." A senior Iraqi official was quoted as saying "the declaration would be general and lacking in detail and had been padded out with various scientific reports and studies".

Overview

The declaration was "largely based on material already presented to the UN in previous FFCDs [Full, Final, and Complete Declarations] and other correspondence". "No serious attempt" had "apparently been made to answer any of the unresolved questions highlighted by UNSCOM or to refute any of the points made in the UK dossier". Iraq continued to "claim that it has not conducted any illicit WMD or ballistic missile programmes since 1991". "Little new material … on the nuclear, chemical or biological weapons" had been found; there was "some new material" on missiles.

Chemical weapons

The declaration was based on a June 1996 FFCD and additional information provided to the UN before 1998. Some of that information had not been seen previously by the UK. As well as the "unaccounted for" quantities of agent, precursors and munitions which UNSCOM had identified, the declaration did not:

- "provide a key document detailing the consumption of special munitions in the 1980s" which had been "removed from UNSCOM by the Iraqis";[60]
- "substantiate Iraq's denials … that attempts were made to manufacture and weaponise VX".

The list of "over 30 sites in which chemical activity" took place was "incomplete".

[60] A document found by an UNSCOM inspector in a safe in Iraqi Air Force headquarters in 1998. It gave an account of the expenditure of bombs, including chemical bombs, by Iraq in the Iraq/Iran war. It indicated that 13,000 chemical bombs were dropped by the Iraqi Air Force between 1983 and 1988. Iraq had claimed that 19,500 bombs were consumed during that period. Iraq had taken the document from the inspector.

Biological weapons

The declaration reiterated information already provided to the UN, which had already been reviewed. It failed to "provide a technically coherent account of Iraq's biological weapons programme". The declaration provided new material relating to 40 sites which Iraq claimed had no connection with proscribed activity but which were judged capable of supporting a BW programme. It did not mention some dual-use sites previously monitored by UNSCOM. Names of individuals included in previous declarations on biological weapons had been "systematically removed", although the declaration stated that they would be "provided to UNMOVIC on request".

It did not:

- "address the issue of unaccounted for growth media";
- "provide fully documented accounts" of the pre-1991 programmes or "recognition of the military application";
- "acknowledge any proscribed biological weapons activity post-1991"; or
- "mention … transportable production facilities".

Nuclear weapons

The declaration was "largely the same as the FFCD" for activity pre-1991 which had been issued in 1998, "with a new extended summary". It was "accurate" but "incomplete". It maintained that no weapons-related work had been undertaken since 1998. It did not address whether Iraq had been seeking uranium in Africa.

Ballistic missiles

Most of the data provided related to pre-1991 programmes. The declaration acknowledged "some facilities established since 1998" and "known from intelligence". It also provided "some limited new evidence of proscribed missile development post-1991". Two designs were judged to have ranges greater than the limit of 150km.

The "major omissions" were:

- "no attempt to resolve outstanding issues" relating to SCUD missiles;
- "no mention of any post-1998 activity at many missile related facilities, including the al-Rafah engine test stand", which was "capable of testing engines for missiles with ranges over 1000km"; and
- "no details of recent procurement activity associated with more advanced missile propellant".

Unmanned Aerial Vehicles (UAVs):

- The declaration referred to "aborted attempts" to convert an anti-ship missile into a land attack weapon with a range of 95km. The JIC judged the "system would be suitable for chemical and biological delivery".
- The declaration claimed that the L-29 aircraft was "a target-drone" and there "was no mention of a chemical or biological agent delivery capability". The JIC judged that Iraq had "more aircraft" and had "conducted more flight tests than stated"; and that its range was "understated".

- The declaration provided "limited, but new information on two UAV programmes", which Iraq claimed had "started after 1998", that had been included in reports recently passed to UNMOVIC. They would be "used as target drones". The JIC judged that the UAVs "would have a significantly better performance" than claimed and could be "adapted to chemical and biological agent delivery".

Conclusion

The JIC concluded that the declaration so far analysed failed to address the outstanding issues from UNSCOM's report to the Security Council in 1999 and "made no attempt to answer any of the points outlined in the UK dossier". Iraq might:

> "… feel they dealt with these points in their previous rebuttal of the dossier. Some of the deficiencies may be addressed in the parts yet to be translated, but this does not look likely."

152. On 20 December, Mr Miller sent Sir David Manning a further DIS overview of Iraq's declaration.[61]

153. Mr Miller re-stated the key findings outlined in the 18 December JIC Assessment and identified the principal areas of apparent omission. The main new points identified were:

- "an admission by the Iraqis that they have delivered 50 Al Samoud missiles to their military. The UK dossier stated that at least 50 of these missiles had been produced and were being deployed to military units;
- details of missile related procurement activities post-1998, which Iraq claims were for permitted programmes. There are no details concerning the origin of the material and equipment procured, some of which we judge were obtained illicitly; and
- the document fails to cover refurbishment at potential BW sites."

154. Mr Miller reported that the DIS would continue to analyse the declaration when a full English text was available from the UN. That was likely to be after Christmas.

SECURITY COUNCIL, 19 DECEMBER 2002

155. Dr Blix told the Security Council on 19 December that, while individual governments had stated they had evidence which contradicted Iraq's denial that it had weapons of mass destruction, UNMOVIC was not yet in a position to give a definitive view.

156. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported overnight on 17/18 December that Dr Blix would tell the Security Council on 19 December that it could not have confidence that the declaration "disposed of" the question of Iraq's WMD holdings but that he could not say Iraq definitely had WMD; there was more work to do and the ball was in Iraq's court.[62]

157. Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei briefed members of the Security Council on 19 December on inspections in Iraq and their preliminary assessment of the Iraqi declaration.[63]

158. Dr Blix told the Security Council on 19 December that, while individual governments had stated they had evidence which contradicted Iraq's denial that it had weapons of mass destruction, UNMOVIC was not yet in a position to give a definitive view.

159. In his "necessarily provisional" comments on the Iraqi declaration, Dr Blix stated that Iraq continued to state that there were no weapons of mass destruction in Iraq when inspectors left in December 1998 and that none had "been designed, procured, produced or stored in the period since then". While individual governments had stated that they had "convincing evidence to the contrary", UNMOVIC was, at that point, "neither in a position to confirm Iraq's statements, nor in possession of evidence to disprove it".

160. Dr Blix added that, during the period between 1991 and 1998, Iraq had submitted many declarations which had "proved inaccurate or incomplete or was unsupported or contradicted by evidence". Dr Blix stated:

> "A declaration cannot, if it stands alone, create confidence. The listing of sites or of persons, the reporting of production, importation, destruction and consumption figures … is not enough to create confidence that no weapons programmes and proscribed items remain. The statements need to be supported by documentation or other evidence. Only so do they become verifiable."

161. The overall impression was that "not much new significant information" had been provided which related to proscribed programmes; nor had "much new supporting documentation or other evidence been submitted". Iraq had provided new information on:

- missile activities, including a series of new projects at various stages of development, which Iraq claimed were permitted;
- a short-range rocket manufactured using 81mm aluminium tubes; and
- the 'Air Force' document relating to the consumption of chemical weapons in the Iraq/Iran war.

[63] UN Press Release, 19 December 2002, Statement to press on Iraq inspections by Security Council President (SC/7614).

162. There were also inconsistencies and areas which needed clarification, including:

- the omission of information on imports of bacterial growth media;
- declaration of the development of a variant of the Al Samoud missile which had exceeded the permitted range in test flights; and
- a lack of supporting evidence to address unresolved issues identified in the 1999 UNSCOM and Amorim reports (see Section 1.1).

163. In conclusion, Dr Blix stated that, if Iraq failed to provide evidence supporting its statements, the inspectors could not guarantee that all possibly concealed items and activities would be found; but they would make attempts at concealment more difficult.

JIC priorities

Mr John Scarlett recorded that he had discussed the JIC's priorities for January 2003 with Sir David Manning on 3 January.[64] They had agreed that there would be:

"… a need to retest our standing judgements on:

- the continuing cohesion or otherwise of Saddam's regime
- the developing attitudes of neighbouring/regional states
- the attitudes of the Kurds and other internal opposition forces".

Mr Scarlett and Sir David had also agreed the JIC should attempt in mid-January to answer the question "what will Saddam do now or next?" which "might allow us to retest the standing judgements".

Mr Scarlett wrote that he and Mr Julian Miller had agreed there would be a wider audience "outside the MOD" for an "assessment of the significance of Iraqi military dispositions" and its future options and strategy.

The absence of a "smoking gun"

164. With indications of concerns in Washington about becoming trapped in the UN, and tensions between the UN timetable and the military build-up, the UK focus on the need to find convincing evidence that Saddam Hussein was not complying with the obligations set out in resolution 1441 and preceding resolutions intensified.

165. Mr William Ehrman, FCO Director General, Defence and Intelligence, advised Mr Straw's Private Secretary on 19 December that the UK was passing intelligence to UNMOVIC but "We had not found a silver bullet yet."[65]

---

[64] Minute Scarlett to Miller, 3 January 2003, 'Iraq: Questions for the JIC'.
[65] Minute Ehrman to PS/[FCO], 19 December 2002, 'Iraq: Passing Intelligence to UNMOVIC'.

166. In his memoir, Mr Blair wrote that, at Chequers over Christmas 2002, he had asked himself:

> "What did I truly believe? That Saddam was about to attack Britain or the US? No. That he was a bigger WMD threat than Iran or North Korea or Libya? Not really, though he was the only leader to have used them. That left alone now, with these inspections ending the same way as the last, he would threaten the stability of the region? Very possibly. That he would leach WMD material or provide help to terrorists? Yes …"[66]

167. In a meeting overseas in early January, SIS1 told Mr Blair that the body of available evidence was "highly damning" but "none of the reports could yet be termed a silver bullet".[67] SIS1 told the Inquiry that Mr Blair had been "surprised and pleased" that so much had been accumulated, but he needed some more evidence that Saddam Hussein was in breach (of resolution 1441), which he (Mr Blair) could use as the basis for personal assurances to Cabinet, the Parliamentary Labour Party (PLP), and to key allies such as Mr Jacques Chirac, the French President, and President Bush and regional leaders. SIS1 recorded that, as a result, Mr Blair had asked for a "stocktake", including an assessment of the likelihood that the UNMOVIC process would produce that kind of evidence.

168. Asked whether that illustrated the pressure on SIS to produce something that Mr Blair could use to justify supporting President Bush without necessarily having a second Security Council resolution, SIS1 told the Inquiry that SIS was not under "unusual pressure".[68] The meeting had taken place before the real diplomatic push to secure a second resolution and the "evidence that would win that second resolution, even over French scepticism and Russian obduracy … was in the balance".

169. Asked whether SIS was being asked to find facts that would fit a policy that had already been determined, SIS1 replied: "No". In early 2003, he was "in no doubt … at all" that the Americans were going to go in. The "dilemma for [the] British Government" was whether to stand with the US and "intelligence could play a very significant part in arriving at those decisions".[69]

170. Asked if Mr Blair would have got something significantly different from the stocktake to what he was getting from the JIC, SIS1 replied: "No."

171. In his minute to Mr Blair on 3 January 2003 about the way ahead (see Section 3.6), Mr Straw wrote:

> "… a lot of effort is being made by the … agencies to provide Blix and ElBaradei [with leads drawing on intelligence reports] … to enable them to upgrade their inspections over the next three weeks. It is possible that this will produce a big smoking gun … But, in my view (shared by [Secretary] Powell) it would be rash to bank on this. So far, reality has not matched the expectation generated by the intelligence …"[70]

172. On 4 January, Mr Blair sent a long note to officials in No.10 (see Section 3.6).[71]

173. On Iraq, Mr Blair stated:

"We start from behind. People suspect US motives; don't accept Saddam is a threat; worry it will make us a target. Yet the truth is removing Saddam is right; he is a threat; and WMD has to be countered. So there is a big job of persuasion."

174. The actions proposed by Mr Blair included:

- "most obviously, the evidence of breach of the UN resolution leading hopefully to a new resolution. Time is short. We need either evidence of actual WMD; or documentation concealed; or an eye witness account of the programme. We are making efforts on all three. But one or more needs to be in place. […] our biggest hindrance, is the intimidation Saddam is exercising. Those who might co-operate are being told very clearly their families will die. So even though we all know the declaration … is a lie, proving the lie will be hard. I need an early meeting on this with C [Sir Richard Dearlove]."
- "We need to set out the WMD case generally; publish evidence of it; and have some high profile interdiction of WMD material. People just totally underestimate the WMD threat."

175. Mr Blair had a meeting with Sir Richard Dearlove on the afternoon of 9 January.[72] There is no No.10 record of the meeting.

176. Sir Richard Dearlove's Private Secretary recorded Sir Richard's view that it had been a good meeting at which Mr Blair had emphasised the importance of being able to demonstrate that the Iraqis were in material breach of resolution 1441.

177. In response to a question from Mr Blair about the likelihood of being able to find a "silver bullet" that would demonstrate a material breach, Sir Richard was reported to have said that "he felt the odds were 50/50". That was "higher than the US estimates but he simply could not guarantee a successful outcome".

178. Sir Richard had also reported that Mr Blair's parting words were: "Richard, my fate is in your hands."

179. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that:

- Sir Richard told Mr Blair that Dr Blix "knew he was being 'cat and moused' but he was not on a mission. He was sure that Saddam was lying but he had to establish that for himself. C felt that we had a better chance of finding the breaches than the US."
- Mr Blair had said, "half in jest", "My future is in your hands."
- "The nightmare scenario, or one of them, was a discovery that was sufficient for the US but not for us."
- "C said the other risk was that we found the evidence of the breach before the US was ready to go to war … if the inspectors had another month with genuine access, the picture would be pretty clear. We were now pushing the line that they needed time and space to do the job."[73]

180. Asked about Mr Blair's comment that his fate was in Sir Richard Dearlove's hands, Sir Richard told the Inquiry that he thought Mr Blair "was beginning to understand that he was in a tough position vis-a-vis the inspection issue".[74]

The UK's objectives

The UK's objectives were published in a Written Ministerial Statement by Mr Straw on 7 January.[75]

Mr Straw stated that the "prime objective" was:

> "… to rid Iraq of its weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and their associated programmes and means of delivery, including prohibited ballistic missiles … as set out in UNSCRs. This would reduce Iraq's ability to threaten its neighbours and the region, and prevent Iraq using WMD against its own people. UNSCRs also require Iraq to renounce terrorism, and return captured Kuwaitis and property taken from Kuwait."

Mr Straw also stated:

> "Success in achieving our prime objective should help deter the proliferation of WMD and BM more generally."

UNMOVIC's activities

181. In his informal briefing for the Security Council on 9 January, Dr Blix made clear that he needed more information from Iraq.

182. As agreed on 19 December, Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei gave an informal update of their assessment of the Iraqi declaration and the progress of inspection activities to the members of the Security Council on 9 January (see Section 3.6).[76] The points made by Dr Blix included:

- His "overall impression" remained that Iraq's declaration was "rich in volume but poor in new information" and "practically devoid of new evidence on such issues".
- "… [T]o create confidence that it has no more weapons of mass destruction or proscribed activities relating to such weapons, Iraq must present credible evidence".
- He had "not asserted … that proscribed items or activities" existed; but if they did "Iraq should present them in our presence". There was "still time" for that. There was "no way the inspectors" could "close a file by simply invoking the precept that Iraq cannot prove the negative".
- There was a series of inconsistencies between the declaration and earlier Iraqi declarations which had been described as full, final and complete, in addition to the issues he had highlighted on 19 December, including in relation to special munitions, imports of missile engines and solid missile fuel and VX.

UNMOVIC finds

- On 30 December, UNMOVIC inspectors found some Volga missile engines.[77]
- On 16 January, UNMOVIC discovered rocket warheads at an ammunition store.[78]
- On the same day UNMOVIC also discovered nuclear-related documents hidden at the home of an Iraqi scientist.

Mr Blair's interview on BBC's Breakfast with Frost, 26 January 2003

183. Mr Blair decided to use an interview on Breakfast with Frost on 26 January to set out the position that the inspections should be given sufficient time to determine whether or not Saddam Hussein was co-operating fully. If he was not, that would be a sufficient reason for military action. A find of WMD was not required.

184. In a meeting with Sir Jeremy Greenstock and No.10 officials to discuss the handling of Iraq in the UN Security Council in the coming weeks on 23 January, Mr Blair set out an approach which included the need, "if we could possibly get it", for "hard proof" that Saddam Hussein was "lying over his WMD, to bring public opinion to accept the need for military action".[79]

185. On 24 January, Mr Scarlett provided a note with a list of points summarising the assessment of Iraqi WMD holdings and concealment policy which could be "deployed publicly" by Mr Blair.[80]

186. Mr Scarlett wrote:

> "For the most part the note repackages the contents of the September dossier bringing out the key points, including quantities of WMD more clearly. There is some limited updating to cover the work of UNMOVIC and concealment activities."

187. The key points in the note included:

Judgements in the dossier:

- "Iraq has a useable [sic] chemical and biological weapons capability, which includes recent production of chemical and biological agents, and military plans to use them;
- Iraq continues to work on developing nuclear weapons;
- Iraq possesses up to twenty 650km Al Hussein missiles, is developing longer-range ballistic missiles, and is extending its shorter range systems beyond the UN permitted range of 150km."

Iraq's declaration of 7 December 2002:

- Iraq had "not taken the opportunity … to explain the issues outstanding from UNSCOM's report to the UN Security Council in 1999".
- Iraq maintained that it currently had "no proscribed WMD programmes".
- The UN already had the "majority of information" in the declaration.
- The declaration did "not alter UK assessments of Iraq's WMD programmes".

Chemical weapons:

- Iraq could produce mustard gas, tabun, sarin and VX nerve agents.
- Iraq had had "chemical weapons available from both pre-Gulf War stocks and more recent production".
- The UK did "not know exactly how much CW agent" was available. While it believed current holdings were "less than" the 360 tonnes for which UNSCOM had been unable to account, it was "still enough to fill many artillery shells or other weapons".

[80] Minute Scarlett to Rycroft, 24 January 2003, 'Iraq WMD: Intelligence Points for the Prime Minister' attaching Note, 'Iraq:WMD'.

- Iraq's military had "planned for the use of CW, and … issued atropine injectors … to its troops".

Biological weapons:

- "Iraq has biological weapons available, both from pre-Gulf War stocks and more recent production".
- Iraq could "produce at least" anthrax, botulinum toxin, aflatoxin and ricin.
- the UK did "not know how much agent" Iraq had, but it had "admitted to producing 19,000 litres of botulinum toxin, 8,500 litres of anthrax and 2,200 litres of aflatoxin" before the 1990-1991 Gulf War.
- UNSCOM had been unable to account for the growth media Iraq had procured which was "enough for 25,000 litres of anthrax".
- Iraq had "developed mobile agent production facilities, which makes it extremely difficult for inspectors to find them".

Without distinguishing between chemical and biological capabilities, the minute stated:

- "UNSCOM could not account for over 30,000 CBW munitions, including 550 mustard filled artillery shells."
- Iraq had "admitted to producing CBW warheads for its Al Hussein ballistic missiles".

Ballistic missiles:

- Iraq had "manufactured up to 100 short range ballistic missiles" and was "aiming to build more using illegally purchased engines".
- Iraq had "admitted … repeatedly testing a version of one of those missiles" beyond the permitted range of 150km.
- Intelligence indicated Iraq's aim was "to develop other missiles with ranges over 1000km".
- "Some of the infrastructure built in Iraq since 1998, such as the engine test stand at al-Rafah" was "far in excess" of what was "required for existing permitted programmes".
- Iraq had "procured material suitable only for longer range missiles".

Iraq's "co-ordinated policy of concealment":

"Intelligence continues to show that such measures are being used.

  - Large numbers of documents relating to Iraq's nuclear programme of some years ago were discovered at the home of a nuclear scientist … clearly demonstrating an Iraqi policy of hiding documents and materials, just as we predicted.

- Other key equipment is being buried or kept constantly on the move using trucks.
- Whatever the Iraqi regime says, there is no doubt that scientists and their families are being intimidated from having private interviews even inside Iraq, let alone outside."

188. The note also set out the effects of chemical and biological weapons along the lines of the information provided in the September dossier.

189. Mr Scarlett subsequently sent the note to SIS1 with copies to the MOD Deputy Chief of Defence Intelligence and the Press Offices of the MOD and the FCO.[81]

190. In response to a request for themes which Mr Blair could use with the press, and in particular on Breakfast with Frost on 26 January, SIS1 submitted advice to Sir David Manning on 25 January.[82]

191. That set out four "Themes from CX", "for use with the press". The points to make included:

- Giving the UN the run around: Saddam Hussein was "determined to keep his weapons" and believed he could "successfully hide them from the UN". There was "reliable intelligence, which we have been sharing with the UN inspectors, that for the last few months the Iraqis have been dispersing and concealing the evidence: hiding munitions for chemical warfare, engines for long-range missiles, top secret documents".
- Spying on the inspectors: intelligence had "confirmed" that there was "a huge, well co-ordinated Iraqi operation to spy on the inspectors … there are well rehearsed plans to prevent them from having access to sites where the weapons are concealed. Iraq's security agents have orders even to stage car accidents, if necessary, to prevent at all costs the inspectors from finding anything significant. These agents dare not fail: they know only too well what the consequences for them personally would be."
- Saddam Hussein rules by fear and repression: "we have intelligence Saddam has ordered that any scientists who dare to co-operate will be severely punished, even killed, along with their families. They have been forced to hide secret documents at home. Iraq's ruthless security apparatus has placed minders alongside everyone who could give the game away to inspectors to ensure that they don't step out of line and to remind them what will happen to them if they do."
- But cracks are beginning to show: "intelligence reveals that … some senior officials – even members of Saddam's family are beginning to realise the game is up …"

192. In his extended interview on the BBC's Breakfast with Frost programme on 26 January (see Section 3.6), Mr Blair set out in detail his position on Iraq.[83]

193. Asked whether Dr Blix should be given more time, Mr Blair stated that the inspectors had "to be given the time to do the job", but there was "confusion" about what that job was. The time they needed was to certify whether Saddam Hussein was "fully co-operating or not". Saddam Hussein had to provide information on "exactly what weapons material" he had, "allowing the inspectors to inspect it, monitor it and shut it down". If they were not able to do that job, Saddam Hussein would have to be disarmed by force. That should not take months, but Saddam Hussein was not co-operating.

194. Pressed as to whether non-compliance rather than evidence of weapons of mass destruction justified "a war", Mr Blair replied that he "profoundly" disagreed with the idea that a refusal to co-operate was of a "lesser order". He added:

> "… what we know is that he has this material … we know there is something like 350 tonnes of chemical warfare agent. We know there is something like 30,000 special munitions for the delivery of chemical and biological weapons.
> "He hasn't even told us where those old leftovers from 1998 are … we know … that there is an elaborate process … of concealment …
>
> "… [T]he people that the inspectors want to interview … are being told, by the Iraqi authorities, they can only come for interviews with an Iraqi … minder, and only be interviewed in certain places.
>
> "And we know also from intelligence that these people's families are being told that if they co-operate and give any information at all they will be executed.
>
> "… [I]f he fails to co-operate in being honest and he is pursuing a programme of concealment, that is every bit as much a breach as finding, for example, a missile or chemical agent."

195. Asked whether there would be "another dossier" setting out what UK intelligence had discovered, Mr Blair stated:

> "… we have the intelligence that says that Saddam has continued to develop these weapons of mass destruction; that what he's doing is using a whole lot of dual-use facilities in order to manufacture chemical and biological weapons; and … that there is an elaborate programme of concealment … forcing the inspectors to play a game of hide and seek."

196. Asked if he had sufficient evidence to back action, Mr Blair replied:

> "… I've got no doubt at all that he's developing these weapons and that he poses a threat but we made a choice to go down the UN route …

---

[83] BBC News, 26 January 2003, Breakfast with Frost.

"… our judgement, the American judgement … is that Saddam has these weapons, but the purpose of the inspectors … is … to report back to the UN and say whether he is fully co-operating or he's not."

Security Council, 27 January 2003

197. Dr Blix reported to the Security Council on 27 January that Iraq's declaration of 7 December did not provide new evidence which would eliminate or reduce the unresolved issues identified in 1999.

198. As required in resolution 1441, Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei made their first reports to the Security Council on 27 January (see Section 3.6).[84]

199. Dr Blix stated:

"One might have expected … that Iraq might have tried to respond to, clarify and submit supporting evidence regarding the many open disarmament issues, which the Iraqi side should be familiar with from the UNSCOM document S/1999/94 of January 1999 and the so-called Amorim Report of March 1999 … These are the questions which UNMOVIC, governments and independent commentators have often cited."

200. UNMOVIC had found "the issues listed in those two documents as unresolved, professionally justified". The reports pointed to:

"… lack of evidence and inconsistencies … which must be straightened out, if weapons dossiers are to be closed … They deserve to be taken seriously by Iraq rather than being brushed aside as evil machinations of UNSCOM. Regrettably, the … declaration, most of which is a reprint of earlier documents, does not seem to contain any new evidence that would eliminate the questions or reduce their number."

201. Dr Blix set out examples of questions and issues that needed to be addressed in some detail, including:

- UNMOVIC had information indicating that Iraq had worked on purifying and stabilising the nerve agent VX, and had achieved more than it had declared. This conflicted with the Iraqi account that the agent had only been produced on a pilot scale, which had been destroyed in 1991, and was never weaponised. There were also questions to be answered about the fate of VX precursor chemicals.
- Iraq had provided a copy of the "Air Force" document it had withheld in 1998. It indicated that 13,000 chemical bombs were dropped by the Iraqi Air Force between 1983 and 1988. Iraq had claimed that 19,500 bombs were consumed during that period. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, UNMOVIC "must assume these quantities are now unaccounted for".

- The discovery of "a number of 122mm chemical rocket warheads in a bunker at a storage depot southwest of Baghdad". The bunker was relatively new, which meant "the rockets must have been moved there in the past few years, at a time when Iraq should not have had such munitions". Iraq had stated that they were "overlooked from 1991 from a batch of 2,000 that were stored there during the Gulf War. That could be the case. They could also be the tip of a submerged iceberg. The discovery of a few rockets does not resolve, but rather points to, the issue of several thousands of chemical rockets that are unaccounted for." Iraq had subsequently found four more chemical rockets at a storage depot in al-Taji. The warheads were "empty".
- Inspectors had found "a laboratory quantity of thiodiglycal, a mustard gas precursor".
- There were "strong indications that Iraq produced more anthrax than it declared, and that at least some of this was retained after the declared destruction date. It might still exist."
- Iraq had not declared "a significant quantity of bacterial growth media" which had been included in Iraq's submission to the Amorim panel. This omission appeared "to be deliberate as the pages of the resubmitted document were renumbered". The quantity of growth media involved would "suffice to produce … about 5,000 litres of concentrated anthrax".
- The Al Samoud 2 and Al Fatah missiles "might well represent prima facie cases of proscribed systems" but further technical consideration would be necessary before reaching a conclusion on the issue.
- Iraq had refurbished its missile production infrastructure, including a number of casting chambers which were capable of producing motors for missiles with ranges greater than the 150km limit.
- Iraq had illegally imported 300 rocket engines which might be for the Al Samoud 2, chemicals used in propellents and other potentially proscribed items.

202. Dr Blix questioned Iraq's claims that there were no more documents about its activities. After the discovery of documents in the home of a scientist "relating to the laser enrichment of uranium", UNMOVIC could not "help but think that the case might not be isolated and that such placements of documents is deliberate to make discovery difficult". He warned that: "Any further sign of the concealment of documents would be serious."

203. Dr Blix also questioned whether Iraq had provided a complete list of the names of personnel who had worked on proscribed programmes, and pointed out the difficulties of interviewing individuals "in private". He reported that UNMOVIC had asked 11 individuals for interview in Baghdad and that none of them would speak without the presence of an Iraqi official.

204. Commenting on Iraqi demonstrations against the inspectors at a number of sites, Dr Blix told the Security Council:

> "Demonstrations and outbursts of this kind are unlikely to occur in Iraq without initiative or encouragement from the authorities … They do not facilitate an already difficult job … Where our Iraqi counterparts have some complaint they can take it up in a calmer and less unpleasant manner."

205. In his memoir, Dr Blix wrote:

> "There were some cases of demonstrations against the inspectors, though hardly threatening ones. They occurred at our Baghdad office, at a hospital site and during the inspection of the private home that yielded nuclear documents."[85]

206. Dr ElBaradei reported that the IAEA had found no evidence that Iraq had revived its nuclear weapons programme but it was still investigating a number of issues.

207. Dr ElBaradei reported that the IAEA had conducted 139 inspections at some 106 locations, with a "focus on areas of concern identified by other States, facilities identified through satellite imagery as having been modified or constructed since 1998, and other inspection leads identified independently". They had been able to "gain ready access and to clarify the nature of the activities" at those facilities. "No prohibited nuclear activities" had been identified.[86]

208. Iraq's unsuccessful attempts to procure high-strength aluminium tubes which Iraq had indicated were related to a programme to reverse-engineer conventional rockets, had been a particular focus. The IAEA had concluded that the tubes "would be consistent with" use in a conventional rocket programme. They "would not be suitable for manufacturing centrifuges" without modification. The IAEA was "still investigating" the issue, but the attempt to acquire such tubes was "prohibited" by resolution 687 (1991).

209. The IAEA was investigating how "dual-use" material had been relocated or used, including the "HMX"[87] explosive which had been removed from IAEA seals at the end of 1998. Dr ElBaradei stated that it would be difficult to verify how that had been used.

210. The IAEA was investigating reports of Iraqi efforts to import uranium but it did "not have enough information, and … would appreciate more".

211. Iraq had not provided "any new information relevant to … questions which had been outstanding since 1998"; but those questions did "not constitute unresolved disarmament issues".

212. Dr ElBaradei concluded:

"… we have to date found no evidence that Iraq has revived its nuclear weapons programme since the elimination of the programme in the 1990s … [O]ur work is steadily progressing and should be allowed to run its natural course … [W]e should be able within the next few months to provide credible assurance that Iraq has no nuclear weapons programme. These few months … would be a valuable investment in peace because they could help us avoid a war. We trust that we will continue to have the support of the Council … to verify Iraq's nuclear disarmament through peaceful means and to demonstrate that the inspection process can and does work as a central feature of the international nuclear arms control regime."

Extracts from President Bush's State of the Union address, 28 January 2003

In his State of the Union address on 28 January, President Bush emphasised the threat of terrorism to the US and others, the potential threat from Iraq in that context and the need to disarm Iraq.[88]

President Bush's detailed statements about the threat posed by Iraq included:

> "The United Nations concluded in 1999 that Saddam Hussein had biological weapons sufficient to produce over 25,000 liters of anthrax – enough doses to kill several million people. He hasn't accounted for that material. He has given no evidence that he has destroyed it.
>
> "The United Nations concluded that Saddam Hussein had material sufficient to produce more than 38,000 liters of botulinum toxin …
>
> "Our intelligence officials estimate that Saddam Hussein had the materials to produce as much as 500 tonnes of sarin, mustard and VX nerve agent …
>
> "US intelligence indicates that Saddam Hussein had upwards of 30,000 munitions capable of delivering chemical agents. Inspectors recently turned up 16 of them – despite Iraq's recent declaration denying their existence …
> "From three Iraqi defectors we know that Iraq, in the late 1990s, had several mobile biological weapons labs …

"The International Atomic Energy Agency confirmed in the 1990s that Saddam Hussein had an advanced nuclear weapons development program … The British Government has learned that Saddam Hussein recently sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa. Our intelligence sources tell us that he has attempted to purchase high-strength aluminium tubes suitable for nuclear weapons production. Saddam Hussein has not credibly explained these activities. He clearly has much to hide."

JIC Assessment, 29 January 2003

213. The JIC assessed on 29 January that retaining WMD was a vital Iraqi interest and that Saddam Hussein was unlikely to agree to relinquish power or go into exile.

214. The JIC sustained its earlier judgements on Iraq's ability and intent to conduct terrorist operations.

215. At the request of the FCO, the JIC reviewed current developments in Iraq from Saddam Hussein's perspective and possible Iraqi moves in the coming weeks.[89]

216. The minutes of the JIC discussion on 29 January record that the draft Assessment had been difficult to write given the fast-moving developments, and it was important to ensure it reflected the latest information, especially the UNMOVIC perspective.[90] The minutes also recorded that:

> "… it was difficult to predict if and when Saddam might launch pre-emptive strikes, but the paper should try and make a judgement on possible timescales. The trigger would probably be set when Saddam concluded that his fate was sealed, rather than any movements by Coalition Forces. Most of the Iraqi military would probably crumble quickly under attack. Saddam would maintain his hold on power until then, and there were no indications of possible coups beforehand. Whilst the Iraqi public might welcome the end of Saddam's regime, they were also concerned about the human costs of fighting."

217. The JIC's Key Judgements about weapons of mass destruction were:

- "Retaining WMD remains a vital Iraqi interest. Saddam might nevertheless consider a last minute tactical declaration of some of his WMD to avert a war, believing that he can rebuild his WMD capability later."
- "Saddam probably believes he has some strong political and military cards to play, even in the face of an inevitable attack. … He may … fire CBW against Coalition Forces …"

218. Other key elements of the Assessment in relation to Iraq's WMD capability and its use are set out in the Box below.

JIC Assessment, 29 January 2003: 'Iraq: The Emerging View from Baghdad'

Inspections

The JIC had "judged in October" that:

> "Saddam was confident he could prevent UNMOVIC from finding any evidence before military options started to close off … and that concealment and dispersal of sensitive items were the basis of Iraq's strategy. […] But by mid-January there were signs that Iraq was coming under pressure from UNMOVIC finds that were inconsistent with its December 2002 declaration. […]
>
> "[…] Intelligence is unclear, but it is possible the UNMOVIC discoveries have increased Iraqi uncertainty. Blix's tough statement to the Security Council on 27 January surprised Baghdad and may have increased the regime's concerns about UNMOVIC. Saddam Hussein continues to believe that the possession of WMD is a vital Iraqi interest. […] Any WMD admission would therefore be tactical rather than indicative of a genuine change of policy."

Iraqi military preparations

- Saddam Hussein would have "little incentive to launch such a strike while the Iraqi strategy focuses on convincing UNMOVIC that Iraq does not have WMD holdings", but it might "become an attractive option in the face of imminent Coalition military action".
- A "pre-emptive limited artillery strike on Kuwait using CBW could be launched in as little as two hours".

Saddam's mindset

- Saddam Hussein was "under increasing pressure" as the inspections regime intensified, UNMOVIC had made "significant discoveries" and the Coalition military build-up continued.
- The JIC judged that Saddam Hussein had "underestimated UNMOVIC's capability to expose his deception". He had "failed to realise that he was facing a situation different from the days of UNSCOM". UNMOVIC's "limited success" highlighted the "risks Saddam took in providing a weak declaration of Iraq's WMD-holdings".
- "In the face of an attack, or even before hostilities if he judged that an attack was imminent," Saddam Hussein might take a number of actions, including:
  - making a last minute declaration of his WMD;
  - …
  - inflicting "high enough casualties on any Coalition ground forces, perhaps in Kuwait, including through use of CBW, to halt a Coalition attack and to swing public opinion in the West against hostilities".
- "Once hostilities were underway", Saddam Hussein might also:
  - "… seek to cause an international outcry over the level of Iraqi or Coalition casualties"; and
  - "pursue a scorched earth policy, including the destruction of oil wells and poisoning the water supply".

219. Sir David Manning visited Washington on 29 January for talks with Dr Rice (see Section 3.6).[91] He was accompanied by Sir Richard Dearlove. Sir David reported that Sir Richard Dearlove had "briefed in detail on our intelligence" which the US Administration "clearly find very impressive".

220. Mr Scarlett assured Sir David Manning on 30 January that the intelligence reporting was "consistent and convincing", and there was no evidence that Saddam Hussein was considering the renunciation of WMD.

221. Mr Scarlett also highlighted the need for the Government to take seriously Iraq's options for using chemical and biological weapons and missiles.

222. In addition to the JIC Assessment of 29 January, Mr Scarlett sent Sir David Manning his "personal observations on the overall intelligence picture", which addressed Saddam Hussein's mindset and likely actions.[92]

223. Mr Scarlett wrote:

> "Our intelligence reporting has been consistent and convincing. I have not seen a single reference to Saddam even considering the renunciation of WMD to save his regime (and probably his own life)."

224. Addressing WMD and inspections, Mr Scarlett wrote that Saddam Hussein had "followed essentially the same strategy and tactics as during the 1990s". He had "probably … considered making a 'partial' declaration of WMD holdings", but "even that has proved too difficult, at least so far". Mr Scarlett suggested that would be "an obvious tactic to deploy at the very last minute" but, in his view, a "genuinely full and open renunciation" was:

> "… simply too dangerous. It would remove the one weapon of last resort with which Saddam can threaten his population and neighbours and send a signal of weakness to both with possibly unmanageable consequences (for him). Given the decision not to come clean, a 'partial' admission (for example in the 7 December declaration) would have been a big risk. The chance of opening up lines of investigation to what was still being concealed would have been too great. Better to submit a flat denial leaving no loose ends. From Saddam's point of view, that was probably the right decision."

225. Mr Scarlett added that the Iraq position had:

> "… certainly made it more difficult to find concrete proof of his WMD and leaves him the continuing options of concealment and delay.

[92] Minute Scarlett to Manning, 30 January 2003, 'Iraq: JIC Assessment and Personal Observations'.

"Until now, Saddam and his closest advisers have seemed confident that concealment would work. Oddly, they have not appeared worried by the obvious risk of leaks from the thousands of people aware of this concealment activity. They have relied on the brutal discipline of the regime and so far it has worked. Even now we cannot be confident of finding really significant evidence of retained WMD."

226. Mr Scarlett suggested Iraq had recognised that:

"The one clear weak point in the policy … has been interviews, especially interviews outside Iraq. The regime has no choice but to continue to resist these. They may be able to give a bit of ground on 'private' interviews inside Iraq although they will hesitate about meetings in UNMOVIC's Baghdad HQ … Everywhere else, and even in the HQ, they can probably feel confident that the overall level of extreme intimidation will deter interviewees. This is the nature of this kind of totalitarian regime … And why put your life and that of your family in the hands of an inspector …?"

227. Mr Scarlett concluded that it was "proving more difficult to deal with the new inspection regime than Saddam and his close advisers probably expected". Events were "moving faster than anticipated" and Dr Blix was "now pursuing the line that 'passive cooperation' is coming close to non-co-operation". For Iraq, that would be "difficult to handle" because Dr Blix was:

"… pushing Saddam close to red lines he cannot afford (outside interviews) or is simply not able (proof of destruction of VX, chemical munitions, etc) to cross. But if you are Saddam you do not give up hope. The key tactic remains delay in the hope or expectation that something will turn up …"

228. Addressing Saddam Hussein's hold on power, Mr Scarlett wrote:

"I continue to be struck by the regime's ability to conduct complex surveillance and deception operations without unforced errors or major slip ups. Co-ordinating the dispersal of materials and associated documentation around the country and fielding surprise UNMOVIC and IAEA visits to hundreds of sites in a few weeks is a complex undertaking and evidence of the regime's continuing grip on the population at least of central Iraq."

229. Addressing Saddam Hussein's options after an invasion, Mr Scarlett wrote that: "Given the perceived inability of his enemies [the Coalition] to take significant casualties or setbacks", the Government should take seriously the options available identified in the JIC Assessment "to give us pause even after a military operation begins". He "picked out":

- "Attempted use of CBW and missiles … immediately before an attack or (in Kuwait and southern Iraq) in the early stages of the attack itself." That would be "Very difficult to pull off", but "even a small number of short range artillery rockets getting through would have a disproportionate effect" and it was "not unreasonable for Saddam to think it would give us second thoughts".

- "CBW armed Al Hussein attack on Israel. Again very difficult to achieve, but the benefits of success are obvious."
- "A move against the Kurds either immediately before or after a Coalition invasion …"

230. Mr Scarlett's comments on Iraq's response to military action are addressed in Section 6.2.

Cabinet, 30 January 2003

231. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 30 January that he would be discussing the policy on Iraq with President Bush the following day.[93]

232. In the subsequent discussion it was suggested that the onus was on Saddam Hussein to explain the discrepancies between the Iraqi declaration and a series of unanswered questions: "about 223 missile motors imported illegally; the production of VX nerve agent; 6,500 missing chemical bombs; 12 newly stored chemical shells; and the refusal to allow [Iraqi] scientists to be interviewed in private" listed by Dr Blix. Resolution 1441 "demanded Iraqi co-operation: it was not for the inspectors to act like detectives to find evidence of Saddam Hussein's guilt".

Iraq letter, 31 January 2003

In anticipation of Secretary Powell's presentation of 5 February, Mr Sabri wrote to Mr Annan on 31 January requesting the US Government to "submit immediately its alleged evidence" to enable UNMOVIC and the IAEA to begin investigations and report to the Security Council.[94]

Mr Sabri also stated that the 518 inspections since 27 November, which included all the sites identified by the US and UK, had shown that the allegations were "devoid of truth and had been drafted in order to distort the picture of Iraq and create pretexts for aggression against Iraq and against the region as a whole".

'Iraq – Its Infrastructure of Concealment, Deception and Intimidation'

233. Following his meeting with President Bush in Washington on 31 January (see Section 3.6), Mr Blair made a statement to Parliament on 3 February (see Section 3.7).[95]

234. Mr Blair referred to a "report" which had been "published at the weekend" and which he had placed in the Library of the House of Commons, which made clear that Iraq had "a huge infrastructure of deception and concealment designed to prevent the inspectors from doing their job".

235. In response to a request from Mr Iain Duncan Smith, Leader of the Opposition, for the Government to make available any further intelligence relevant to the security of the UK or its citizens, Mr Blair stated:

> "We issued further intelligence over the weekend about the infrastructure of concealment. It is obviously difficult when we publish intelligence reports, but I hope that people have some sense of the integrity of our security services. They are not publishing this, or giving us this information, and making it up. It is the intelligence that they are receiving and we are passing it on to people. In the dossier that we published last year, and again in the material that we put out over the weekend, it is very clear that a vast amount of concealment and deception is going on."[96]

236. The report, 'Iraq – Its Infrastructure of Concealment, Deception and Intimidation', stated that it drew on "a number of sources, including intelligence material" and showed how the Iraqi regime was "constructed to have, and to keep, WMD", and was "now engaged in a campaign of obstruction" of the UN inspectors.[97]

237. The document was in three parts:

- Part One focused on how Iraq's security organisations operated "to conceal" weapons of mass destruction;
- Part Two provided "up to date details of Iraq's network of intelligence and security organisations whose job it is to keep Saddam and his regime in power, and to prevent the international community from disarming Iraq"; and
- Part Three showed "the effects of the security apparatus on the ordinary people of Iraq".

238. In Part One, the document stated that Iraqi security organisations worked "together to conceal documents equipment and materials" and the regime had:

> "… intensified efforts to hide documents in places where they were unlikely to be found, such as private homes of low-level officials and universities. There are prohibited materials and documents being relocated to agricultural areas and private homes or hidden beneath hospitals and even mosques.
> "The material is being moved constantly, making it difficult to trace or find without absolutely fresh intelligence.
>
> "And those in whose homes this material is concealed have been warned of serious consequences to them and their families if it is discovered."

[97] Report [No.10], January 2003, 'Iraq – Its Infrastructure of Concealment, Deception and Intimidation'.

239. The report described Iraqi activities to monitor UNMOVIC's activities, including that all interviews would be monitored and, in relation to any interviews outside Iraq, that:

> "All scientists and key workers have been made to draw up a list of their relatives … The interviewees know only too well what will happen to them, or their relatives still in Iraq, if it is even suspected that they have said too much …"

240. The report stated that Iraq would seek to intimidate and put psychological pressure on individual inspectors.

241. On 6 February, Channel 4 News reported accusations that the report contained material drawn from published articles, including one by Dr Ibrahim al-Marashi from September 2002, which had been published in the Middle East Review of International Affairs.

242. The FCO informed the Foreign Affairs Committee (FAC) on 16 June 2003 that the report was compiled by the CIC, "a cross-government team" which reported to Mr Campbell but which was based in the FCO.[98]

243. Mr Campbell told the FAC that the document was:

> "… intended as a briefing paper for journalists to inform them of the way in which the Iraqi state was dominated by its security apparatus and therefore well placed to conceal WMD. When new intelligence material came to light, which was authorised for use in the public domain, which revealed the scale of the regime's programme of deception and concealment, it was my idea … to base a briefing paper for the media upon it and this approach was agreed by the Iraq communication group in early January, and the paper worked on during that month."[99]

244. Mr Campbell stated that the CIC was commissioned to produce the paper. He had edited it and changed the title, and informed Mr Blair about the nature of the report and its intended purpose, before it was given it to "six representatives of the UK Sunday newspapers" travelling to Washington with Mr Blair. The document had subsequently been posted on the No.10 website on 3 February and placed in the House of Commons Library the same day.

245. Mr Campbell stated that Dr al-Marashi's article had been submitted to the CIC and had been "absorbed into the briefing paper, without attribution". It "formed the basis" of Part Two of the report and was then assumed by those asked to comment on the report to have come from Government sources.

[99] Memorandum Campbell to Foreign Affairs Committee, 24 June 2003, 'Memorandum from Alastair Campbell'.

246. Mr Campbell subsequently informed the FAC that Parts One and Three of the report were "based on information provided by SIS from a range of sources".[100] There was also some intelligence material in Part Two, and Mr Campbell provided some examples.

247. The Intelligence and Security Committee (ISC) was informed that the SIS representative at Mr Campbell's meeting in January had offered to provide a briefing note on the organisation of deception, concealment and intimidation in Iraq as SIS had "acquired a body of information on these matters".[101] The document provided by SIS was published by the ISC in its report.

248. Mr Campbell wrote to the CIC authors on 7 February pointing out the "absolute necessity of quality control".[102] That was "particularly important in any document … that includes intelligence assessment". He took responsibility for the document and he "would defend it on substance", but he had to be "able to make basic assumptions about quality control".

249. Mr Campbell added that:

> "… as the prospect of conflict grows, we have to be extra sensitive to the fact that the media will want to pick apart our communications.
> "So lessons must be learnt from this, and greater emphasis placed on quality not quantity, and acute sensitivity to the new political and media realities."

250. On 11 February, Sir David Omand, Cabinet Office Permanent Secretary and Security and Intelligence Co-ordinator, issued guidance on the use of intelligence in CIC products, including the need for the lead policy department to be "fully consulted".[103] Pointing out that "the reputation of the intelligence community" was "at risk" whenever intelligence material and judgements were "attributed to the Government", Sir David proposed applying the following rules:

> "a. where intelligence is to be used attributably, in whatever form, the precise wording must be cleared with the Agency originating the material and the Assessments Staff;
> b. where the attributable product is to be released under the rubric that intelligence material is involved, the document as a whole must be cleared with the Assessments Staff;

c. in cases where the content of an attributable product relies largely on intelligence, the Assessments Staff should control and co-ordinate the preparation of the document;

d. finally, the current arrangements for the handling of material from the intelligence Agencies on an unattributable basis should continue as before."

251. Asked about the origins and accuracy of the dossier published by No.10 during Prime Minister's Questions on 13 February, Mr Blair said that the part of the document that dealt with intelligence was from intelligence sources and was accurate, as was the document as a whole.[104]

252. Mr Blair "had said publicly that Dr al-Marashi should have been acknowledged as a source", and that the journal in which his article was published should have been identified.[105]

253. The FCO told the FAC that lessons had been learned from the way the report had been handled and systems had been put in place "to ensure that any intelligence material which is made available publicly will first be authorised by the JIC Chairman".[106]

254. In its report published on 7 July 2003, the FAC concluded:

"… the effect of the February dossier was almost wholly counter-productive. By producing such a document the Government undermined the credibility of their case for war and of the other documents which were part of it.

"… [B]y referring to the document on the floor of the House as 'further intelligence' the Prime Minister – who had not been informed of its provenance … misrepresented its status and thus inadvertently made a bad situation worse.

"… [I]t is wholly unacceptable for the Government to plagiarise work … and to amend it without … highlighting the amendments … [I]t was fundamentally wrong to allow such a document to be presented to Parliament and made widely available without ministerial oversight.

"We recommend that any paper presented to Parliament … for the purpose of explaining the Government's foreign policy be signed off by a FCO Minister. We further recommend that any FCO document presented to Parliament which draws on official sources should include full transparency of sources, and attribution where appropriate."[107]

255. The ISC concluded:

> "The publicity surrounding the document was such that it devalued the input of the Agencies. It was counter-productive in that attention was distracted from the concealment, intimidation and deception of the Iraqi regime."[108]

256. Commenting on the FAC conclusions in its response, the Government stated:

- It disagreed that the February dossier had "undermined the case for war": "As the FAC itself says, the information in the February document was important. The overall accuracy of the document has never been challenged."
- Mr Blair "did not misrepresent the status of the document. It did contain intelligence material … from a range of sources and was regarded by the [intelligence] Services involved as reliable and significant. The introduction … makes clear that the document draws on a number of sources, of which intelligence was one."
- It acknowledged that "mistakes were made and lessons have been learned. Amendments made to the text were in line with information obtained from other sources and did not undermine the accuracy of the document."
- "Ministers take full responsibility for all papers presented to Parliament that explain the Government's foreign policy …"[109]

Secretary Powell's presentation to the Security Council, 5 February 2003

257. Secretary Powell gave a long and detailed presentation to the Security Council on 5 February setting out the US position on the threat posed by Iraq and its failure to comply with resolution 1441.

258. In his presentation to the Security Council on 5 February, Secretary Powell stated that he had asked for the meeting for two purposes:

- The first was to support the "core assessments" made by Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei.
- The second was to provide "additional information and to share … what the United States knows about Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, as well [as] Iraq's involvement in terrorism".[110]

259. Secretary Powell stated that the information "when combined with what all of us have learned over the years" was "deeply troubling". There was "an accumulation of facts and disturbing patterns of behaviour" that demonstrated that Saddam Hussein and his regime had "made no effort to disarm as required by the international community" and was "concealing their efforts to produce more weapons".

260. Secretary Powell provided tapes of intercepted conversations and satellite imagery which he interpreted as demonstrating Iraq's attempts to conceal activity to "clean up" facilities before visits by the inspectors.

261. Secretary Powell also stated that human sources had told the US that:

- The Iraqis were moving "not just documents and hard drives but also weapons of mass destruction to keep them from being found by inspectors".
- "… [W]e know from sources that [last fall] a missile brigade outside Baghdad was disbursing rocket launchers and warheads containing biological warfare agents to various locations, distributing them to various locations in western Iraq. Most of the launchers … were to be moved every one to four weeks to escape detection."
- "In early December, Saddam Hussein had all Iraqi scientists warned of the serious consequences that they and their families would face if they revealed any sensitive information to the inspectors. They were forced to sign documents acknowledging that divulging information is punishable by death."
- "Saddam Hussein also said that scientists should be told not to agree to leave Iraq. Anyone who agreed to be interviewed outside Iraq would be treated as a spy."
- A "false death certificate" had been issued for one scientist, and he was "sent into hiding" and a "dozen experts have been placed under house arrest … at one of Saddam Hussein's 'guest houses'".

262. Secretary Powell added that the "information and intelligence" pointed to "an active and systematic effort on the part of the Iraqi regime to keep materials and people from the inspectors".

263. Secretary Powell stated that Iraq had failed the test of providing an honest declaration and the conclusion that Iraq was now in further material breach of its obligation was "irrefutable and undeniable". Iraq had "placed itself in danger of the serious consequences called for in resolution 1441". The Council placed itself "in danger of irrelevance" if it allowed Iraq to "continue to defy its will without responding effectively and immediately".

264. Secretary Powell set out the "real and present dangers" posed by Iraq's weapons of mass destruction.

265. In relation to Iraq's biological weapons, Secretary Powell stated that "One of the most worrisome things" was the "existence of mobile production facilities used to make biological agents". Secretary Powell set out the details provided by "an Iraqi chemical engineer who supervised one of these facilities", who had defected and was hiding in another country. He added:

- The existence of transportable facilities moving on trailers had been "confirmed by a second source, an Iraqi civil engineer in a position to know the details of the program".
- "A third source, also in position to know, reported in summer 2002 that Iraq had manufactured mobile production systems mounted on road trailer units and on rail cars."
- A fourth source, "an Iraqi major, who defected, confirmed that Iraq has mobile biological research laboratories".

266. Secretary Powell provided diagrams of the reported facilities and stated: "We know that Iraq has at least seven of these mobile biological agent factories."

267. During his presentation Secretary Powell also drew attention "to the fine paper that the United Kingdom distributed yesterday which describes in exquisite detail Iraqi deception activities".

268. Secretary Powell was referring to the No.10 document, 'Iraq – Its Infrastructure of Concealment, Deception and Intimidation'.

269. In his statement to the Security Council, Mr Straw described Secretary Powell's presentation as "a most powerful and authoritative case against the Iraqi regime" and thanked him for "laying bare the deceit practised by the regime of Saddam Hussein, and worse, the very great danger which that regime represents".

270. Mr Mohammed Aldouri, Iraqi Permanent Representative to the UN, challenged the "incorrect allegations" in Secretary Powell's statement and reiterated that Iraq had no weapons of mass destruction. He stated that inspectors had visited the sites identified in US and UK reports in September and October and "none of the allegations" was true. He also rebutted statements made by President Bush in his State of the Union address on 28 January.

271. Mr Aldouri reaffirmed Iraq's commitment to pro-active co-operation with the inspectors so that they could verify that Iraq was free of weapons of mass destruction, sanctions could be lifted, and progress could be made on regional security by ridding the whole Middle East of WMD.

Meetings with Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei, 6 February 2003

272. Dr Blix reminded Mr Blair that the material described as "unaccounted for" in UNSCOM's report of 1999 was not necessarily present in Iraq; and that it would be "paradoxical to go to war for something that might turn out to be very little".

273. Dr Blix told Mr Straw he thought Iraq had prohibited programmes, and it "definitely possessed the ability to jump-start BW programmes".

274. On 6 February, Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei met Mr Blair and Mr Straw.

275. In the meeting with Mr Blair, Dr Blix registered a number of questions about Secretary Powell's briefing to the Security Council the previous day.[111] He also said that intelligence leads had so far produced only one success.

276. The record of the meeting stated that Dr Blix:

> "… would seek to resolve three relatively minor points related to process: U2 overflights, interviews, and Iraqi domestic legislation. His approach would be that the Iraqis had better come up with co-operation on substance … If Saddam decided to be as helpful on substance as he was on process, fine."

277. Mr Blair doubted that Saddam Hussein would co-operate:

> "He would try some trick to divide the Security Council. Retaining his WMD was essential to his own view of his grip on Iraq."

278. Dr Blix reminded Mr Blair that: "UNSCOM had not reported that the 1999 left-overs were present in Iraq, just that they were unaccounted for." UNMOVIC was more cautious than the UK, but Dr Blix agreed that if Iraq did not have documents it should be more eager to allow interviews to go ahead. There was a stalemate on the issue. The inspectors might have to ask for interviews without minders, but Dr Blix was uneasy about risking people's lives.

279. Dr Blix was reported to have informed Mr Blair that his report to the Security Council on 14 February would probably contain a "balance sheet". His last assessment had been "honest but harsh"; the next might have to say that the inspectors "had not found any WMD".

280. In response to a comment by Mr Blair that containment "was not a long term policy, and sanctions caused misery to the Iraqi people", Dr Blix "commented that it would be paradoxical to go to war for something that might turn out to be very little". Mr Blair replied that "if Saddam had no or little WMD he should prove it".

281. Mr Rycroft reported that Sir David Manning had:

> "… underlined we were confident of our judgements on Iraq's CBW. If the inspectors had difficulty finding it, this was because Saddam was not co-operating."

282. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that Dr Blix felt that Secretary Powell had done well but was avoiding comment.[112] Dr Blix was "pretty cagey" and had "made clear his job was to be sceptical". Dr Blix was talking to Iraq about enhanced co-operation and trying to resolve the issues of anthrax and VX: "On the remnants of old programmes they should be able to tell us."

283. In his subsequent meeting with Mr Straw, Dr Blix was reported to have said he had clear indications that anthrax had been weaponised and his personal judgement was that Iraq did have programmes and "definitely possessed the ability to jump-start BW programmes".[113] The trick would be to find evidence.

284. Dr Blix also told Mr Straw that if the Al Samoud missiles were found to be illegal, they would be destroyed. That could force a real confrontation with the Iraqis who were not keen to lose billions of dollars of armaments at a time when they were threatened with military action.

285. Dr ElBaradei was reported to have told Mr Straw that he would press Iraq hard on possible uranium imports and interviews. He did not expect much movement from Iraq and tough messages from the international community could only help the inspectors.

286. Mr Straw encouraged Dr ElBaradei to focus on interviews. Dr ElBaradei reported that the scientists he had interviewed were clearly extremely nervous, but he saw great difficulties with conducting interviews overseas.

287. Dr ElBaradei told Mr Blair that:

> "Not all members agreed with the US timing … Iraq was not co-operating. Unless there were clear signs of an Iraqi change of heart on co-operation, (both process, including interviews, and substance), UNSCR 1441 would have to be implemented. Not allowing interviews was a lack of full co-operation … dribbling out concessions was not full co-operation … His 14 February report would be a clear as possible."[114]

288. In Dr ElBaradei's view, CBW (chemical and biological weapons) was the key.

289. On nuclear issues, the inspectors continued to assess the aluminium tubes. Reports of the possible import of uranium were: "Much more disturbing … There could only be one reason for such an import."

290. Dr ElBaradei told Mr Blair that:

> "If satisfactory co-operation was not forthcoming, the next best outcome would be to force Saddam … out … [He] did not oppose more time for inspections. Any war would risk radicalising the region. It should be UN-controlled. As should the future Iraq …"

[114] Letter Rycroft to Owen, 6 February 2003, 'Iraq: Prime Minister's Meetings with Blix and El-Baradei, 6 February'.

291. The No.10 record stated that Mr Blair had made clear to both Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei "the importance of putting Iraqis on the spot with some sharp questions, to show whether they were co-operating fully or not". He had "also emphasised the importance of interviews".

292. The wider issues discussed are addressed in Section 3.7.

Mr Straw's speech, 11 February 2003

293. Mr Straw set out a detailed case for confronting the challenge posed by Iraq in a speech to the International Institute for Strategic Studies on 11 February.

294. In a speech made at the International Institute for Strategic Studies on 11 February, Mr Straw set out "the disturbing outcome of a failure to act decisively to secure Iraq's disarmament" and the need, "for the sake of the Iraqi people, long-term stability in the Middle East, the credibility of the UN and the cause of international law and collective security" to confront the challenge posed by Iraq.[115]

295. In relation to Iraq, Mr Straw stated:

> "Weapons of mass destruction have been a central pillar of Saddam's dictatorship since the 1980s. He has amassed poisons and viruses both to suppress his own people, and to threaten his neighbours. He has relentlessly pursued his ultimate ambition, the acquisition of a nuclear weapons capability, in flagrant disregard of SCRs and Iraq's obligations as a non-nuclear weapons state under the Non-Proliferation Treaty. His pursuit of these weapons has lain at the heart of the UN's stand-off with Iraq for the past 12 years."

296. Mr Straw argued that the Iraqi threat to Europe and the US was not "overstated". Resolution 1441 recognised the "singular menace" from Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. UNSCOM had had some successes, including overseeing the destruction of "significant quantities" of weaponry, but when the inspectors left in 1998, it was "clear that the regime continued to hold vast stocks of deadly weaponry". The absence of inspectors since 1998 had "allowed Saddam to accelerate his weapons programmes". The report published in autumn 2002 had "demonstrated determined efforts" to enhance Iraq's nuclear, biological and chemical capabilities. Dr Blix's report to the Security Council in January had "underlined these concerns". Diplomacy, intelligence co-operation, reinforced export controls, and interdiction and disruption of supplies were options being used to "frustrate the ambitions" of other regimes. But "in respect of Iraq", those options had been "exhausted … over 12 long years". It was the "deadly combination of capability and intent" which made Saddam Hussein "uniquely dangerous". Rogue regimes which showed "total disregard for the rule of law, and share the terrorists' hatred of our values" were the "most likely source of materials and know-how". Given Saddam Hussein's "longstanding support for terrorist causes", the [115] The National Archives, 11 February 2003, Iraq: A challenge we must confront.

"terrifying possibility that his poisons and diseases" would "find their way into the hands of Al Qaida and its sympathisers" could not be ruled out.

The UK contribution to UNMOVIC's investigations

297. Sir Richard Dearlove told No.10 that UK intelligence had been responsible for two of UNMOVIC's finds.

298. UNMOVIC and the IAEA's inspections were supported by information provided by both SIS and the DIS.[116]

299. The FCO advised No.10 in mid-January that UK intelligence had helped UNMOVIC to discover illegally imported rocket engines.[117]

300. The UK also had provided intelligence on the home of the Iraqi scientist who had concealed documents relating to Iraq's pre-1991 nuclear programme.[118]

301. At Sir Richard Dearlove's request, his Private Secretary sent an update on the progress of inspections to Sir David Manning on 12 February.[119]

302. Sir David was told that the strike rate in relation to the UK intelligence-led inspections was low, but it had been responsible for two out of three UNMOVIC finds to date, from more than 550 inspections. In addition, "even where there is no WMD, something else has often been concealed […] Our inspections have revealed the Iraqi game."

303. Sir Richard's update also stated that "we needed to keep going in the expectation that an intelligence-led inspection would lead to a find or a solid refusal of entry".

304. Sir David sent the letter to Mr Powell with the comment: "More inspections ahead – but time getting very short."[120]

305. In a note produced on 12 February, the DIS recorded that most of the site visits conducted by UNMOVIC and the IAEA during the first six weeks were "intended [to] familiarise inspectors with the sites, and inspection techniques".[121]

306. From early January, "the inspections had become longer and more intrusive" and, by the beginning of February, UNMOVIC had "visited or inspected all but one of the UK's recommended sites", and continued to be receptive to UK advice on potential targets. Finds had included:

- "nuclear-related documents hidden at the home of […] an Iraqi scientist" on 16 January, although "the general perception has been that these do not constitute a 'smoking gun'";
- "CW associated rocket warheads at Ukhaider Ammunition depot" the same day. The liquid in one warhead was "awaiting the delivery of chemical sampling equipment". That had arrived but was "not yet operational";
- a "small quantity of … CW precursor chemicals at a Laboratory";
- "aluminium nozzles for 80mm rockets that Iraq had recast, but not declared" were discovered by the IAEA on 31 January; and
- "parts" from a "suspected … biological or chemical sub-munition" were found "at the al-Numan factory" on 2 February.

307. The Iraqis realised that some inspections had "been mounted on the basis of intelligence", and had "increased even further the measures being taken to prevent damaging material being uncovered by either UNMOVIC or IAEA". That included "ensuring that WMD material only remains at a particular location for an absolute maximum of 24 hours, and contingency plans to ensure that 'crowds' will always be available to disrupt an inspection that might prove successful".

308. The DIS report concluded:

> "UNMOVIC and the IAEA are capable of conducting thorough inspections; however, mistakes have resulted in at least two inspections failing to uncover concealed material …
> "UNMOVIC and IAEA remain very receptive to UK intelligence. On balance, however, in the absence of Iraqi cooperation, we assess that the discovery of a 'smoking gun' will probably be the result of intelligence information, skill on the part of the inspectors, an Iraqi mistake, and an element of luck."

309. The ISC reported that:

- SIS provided UN inspectors with about 170 intelligence reports between December 2000 and March 2003;
- the DIS also provided regular briefings;
- Mr Blair and Mr Straw confirmed that the UK passed all UK-owned intelligence that was relevant to UN inspections; and
- the UK had provided intelligence packs on 19 sites.[122]

---

[122] Intelligence and Security Committee, Iraqi Weapons of Mass Destruction – Intelligence and Assessments, September 2003, Cm5972, paragraph 136.

310. The Butler Review was told that the UK used about 30 separate pieces of intelligence from human sources and satellite imagery covering 19 sites to provide leads for the UN inspectors.[123] UNMOVIC visited seven of those sites, made a partial examination of one more and subjected one further site to an inspection by ground-penetrating radar.

The perspective of the inspectors

311. Dr Blix reported to the Security Council on 14 February that UNMOVIC had not found any weapons of mass destruction and the items that were not accounted for might not exist, but Iraq needed to provide the evidence to answer the questions, not belittle them.

312. The Al Samoud 2 missile programme and engines converted for use on the missile were proscribed.

313. The third Ministerial-level meeting of the Security Council to discuss Iraq took place on 14 February.[124]

314. Dr Blix told the Security Council that:

- UNMOVIC had begun the process of destroying approximately 50 litres of mustard gas declared by Iraq.
- More than 200 chemical and more than 100 biological samples had been collected. Three-quarters of the samples had already been tested and the results were consistent with Iraq's declarations.

315. Addressing how much, "if any", was left of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, Dr Blix stated that UNMOVIC had not found any so far, "only a small number of empty chemical munitions, which should have been declared and destroyed". UNMOVIC had destroyed the "laboratory quantity" of a "mustard gas precursor" that had been found. Many proscribed weapons and items had not been accounted for, but:

> "One must not jump to the conclusion that they exist. However that possibility is also not excluded. If they exist they must be presented for destruction. If they do not exist, credible evidence to that effect should be presented."

316. Addressing Iraq's ballistic missile programmes, Dr Blix stated:

- Experts had "concluded unanimously" that the two variants of the Al Samoud 2 missile declared by Iraq were capable of exceeding the range of 150km and were therefore proscribed.

[123] Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction ["The Butler Report"], 14 July 2004, HC 898, paragraph 357.
[124] UN Security Council, '4707th Meeting Friday 14 February 2003' (S/PV.4707).

- Any of the 380 SA-2 engines imported in contravention of resolution 687 and converted for use in the Al Samoud missile system were also proscribed.
- The casting chambers for missile motors which had been destroyed by UNSCOM and reconstituted were also proscribed.
- Clarifications were needed before decisions could be made on the capabilities of the Al Fatah missile and the engine test stand at al-Rafah.

317. Addressing the role of intelligence, Dr Blix stated that in the closed society of Iraq, and given the history of inspections, "other sources of information, such as defectors and government intelligence agencies" were "required to aid the inspection process". International organisations then needed to analyse such information critically.

318. Dr Blix added that intelligence had been useful for UNMOVIC, and in one case had led to the discovery of documents relating to laser enrichment of uranium:

> "In other cases, intelligence has led to sites where no proscribed items were found. Even in such cases, however, inspection of these sites were useful in proving the absence of such items and in some cases the presence of other items – conventional munitions. It shows that conventional arms are being moved around the country and their presence is not necessarily related to weapons of mass destruction."

319. Dr Blix also pointed out that the evidence that Iraq had prepared for inspections by cleaning up sites and removing evidence, presented to the Security Council by Secretary Powell on 5 February, could have a different interpretation.

320. Dr ElBaradei reported that the IAEA had found no evidence of ongoing prohibited nuclear or nuclear-related activities in Iraq, although a number of issues were still under investigation.

321. Dr ElBaradei reported that Iraq had provided documentation relating to the reported attempt to import uranium, the attempted procurement of aluminium tubes, the procurement of magnets and magnet production capability, and the use of HMX. The IAEA:

- was pursuing the acquisition of uranium;
- examining issues in relation to aluminium tubes and magnets; and
- might be unable to reach a final conclusion on HMX: "While we have no indication that this material was used for any application other than declared by Iraq, we have no technical method of verifying … the declared use …"

322. In relation to "documents found on 16 January in the private residence of an Iraqi scientist", the IAEA had "completed a more detailed review". The documents related "predominantly to lasers, including the use of laser technology to enrich uranium". "Nothing" in the documents altered "the conclusions previously drawn by the IAEA" about the extent of Iraq's laser enrichment programme.

323. Iraq had also provided documentation about questions and concerns which had remained since 1998 about weapons and centrifuge design, but the documents contained "no new information". Dr ElBaradei hoped that "the new Iraqi commissions … will be able to discover documents and other evidence that could assist in clarifying remaining questions and concerns".

324. Dr ElBaradei had "reported on numerous occasions" that the IAEA had:

> "… by December 1998 … concluded that it had neutralised Iraq's past nuclear programme and that therefore no unresolved disarmament issues remained … Hence, our focus since the resumption of inspections … has been verifying whether Iraq revived its nuclear programme in the intervening years.
>
> "We have to date found no evidence of ongoing prohibited nuclear or nuclear-related activities in Iraq. However … a number of issues are still under investigation … we intend to make full use of the authority granted to us … to build as much capacity into the inspection process as necessary.
> "In that context, I would underline the importance of information that States may be able to provide to help us in assessing the accuracy and completeness of information provided by Iraq."

325. Mr Straw thanked Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei for "their great efforts in the face of what I think is still very clear: Iraq's failure, fully and actively to comply with resolution 1441".

326. Mr Straw stated that the issue, which "could not be graver", was "about the authority of the United Nations and about the responsibility of the Security Council for international peace and security". All the members of the Council knew that Iraq had "had these weapons [of mass destruction and long-range missiles]"; Iraq had been "found guilty" in 1991. The issue was whether Iraq was "actively co-operating to get rid of them".

327. Mr Straw stated that Iraq had lied, had concealed weapons and played games. As Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei had:

> "… spelled out in their report of 27 January, Iraq has failed to account for thousands of tons of chemical weapons and precursor chemicals, of shells and bombs for anthrax, for mustard gas, for VX nerve agent. They have failed to make a full and complete disclosure as required of them … They have failed to co-operate fully and actively on substance, as well as on process with the inspectors, and failed substantively to meet the obligations imposed on them."

328. Iraq continued to state that it did not possess weapons of mass destruction.

329. Mr Aldouri stated that Iraq had agreed to act on resolution 1441 and had "provided everything that might fall within the concept of pro-active Iraqi co-operation". The documents provided with the Iraqi declaration, of 7 December 2002, required "in-depth study" because they contained "updated relevant information responding to many questions". Iraq had "the right to wonder whether the declaration had been studied with due diligence and thoroughness". Iraq had "begun to co-operate pro-actively", and many speakers had called for that but there was a question about what that would mean.

330. Mr Aldouri pointed out that there was an "Arabic proverb that an empty hand has nothing to give. You cannot give what you do not have. If we do not possess such weapons, how can we disarm ourselves? How can such weapons be dismantled if they do not exist?"

331. Iraq agreed that the "best way to resolve these issues is through continuing pro-active co-operation with the inspectors". Mr Aldouri stressed that Iraq had:

> "… chosen the path of peace. We have opted for solutions that would satisfy the international community. We are prepared to provide all means to assist in making clear the true picture …
> "We hope the Security Council will heed the desire of the vast majority of States Members of the United Nations and allow the inspectors to fulfil their role …"

332. In the subsequent private discussion of the Council, Mr Straw stated that there was "overwhelming evidence that Iraq had had WMD"; if there was no evidence it had been destroyed, we had to work on the basis that it existed.

333. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that in response to points raised during the private session of the Council, Mr Straw had stated that the reason the Council had said Iraq's WMD posed a threat was because there was "overwhelming evidence that it had had the material. If we had no evidence it had been destroyed, we had to work on the basis that it existed and that there was a danger to the region and to our national security."[125] Oral cross-examination was the best way to get the truth. Interviewees were not saying anything and were insisting on tape recorders because they wanted to stay alive: "Until Iraq allowed interviews outside Iraq and in free conditions, we would be naive to think that they were co-operating."

334. Dr Blix told Mr Blair on 20 February that the intelligence he had received was "not all that compelling"; perhaps there was not much WMD in Iraq.

335. Mr Blair telephoned Dr Blix on 20 February.[126]

336. In the course of a discussion lasting 45 minutes about the possibility of devising an ultimatum for Iraq and tests for compliance (see Section 3.7), Dr Blix told Mr Blair that the intelligence he had received was "not all that compelling". While he still tended to think that Iraq was concealing some WMD, he needed evidence to put to the Security Council. He was receiving "a flow of half promises" on Iraqi co-operation and needed more time.

337. Dr Blix also commented that "perhaps there was not much WMD in Iraq after all"; and that the French and Germans were "unsure" about mobile BW production facilities: "It would be paradoxical and absurd if 250,000 men were to invade Iraq and find very little."

338. Mr Blair responded that "our intelligence was clear that Saddam had reconstituted his WMD programme".

339. The record stated that Dr Blix had "concluded that he accepted the need for time-lines and bench-marks".

340. In his account of the conversation, Dr Blix wrote that he had said:

> "Only at three sites to which we had gone on the basis of intelligence had there been any result at all.
>
> "Personally, I tended to think that Iraq still concealed weapons of mass destruction, but I needed evidence. Perhaps there were not many such weapons in Iraq after all."[127]

SIS advice of 17 and 20 February 2003

341. Sir Richard Dearlove counselled on 17 February that there was no guarantee that inspections would produce conclusive physical evidence of WMD.

342. In a minute to Sir David Manning on 17 February, responding to a request for views on way ahead on Iraq (see Section 3.7), Sir Richard Dearlove stated that there was ample evidence, including from Dr Blix, that Iraq was not, and had no intention of, complying with its obligations.[128] Given the resources Saddam Hussein had available to thwart inspections, and the scale of the task of uncovering something "truly damning", there was no guarantee that the inspections would produce conclusive physical evidence.

343. Sir Richard Dearlove's Private Secretary advised Sir David Manning on 20 February that the "chances of a successful inspection are slim".[129] SIS had sent messages to its best placed sources "emphasising the utmost importance of a major find in the next two weeks, and asking them to do everything possible to try and identify where materials or papers are being hidden". The chances of a potential defector were "not encouraging".

344. SIS did not inform No.10 or others that the source who had provided the reporting issued on 11 and 23 September 2002, about production of chemical and biological agent, had been lying to SIS.

345. On 2 February 2003, there was further reporting that the sub-source had not produced the material.[130]

346. By 18 February, the source was being described as having been revealed to have been lying to SIS over a period of time.[131]

347. By 3 March, SIS had concluded that there was no further material and that SIS would seek to make direct contact with the sub-source.[132]

348. The reissue of the reports in April 2003 and the subsequent withdrawal of this stream of reporting in July 2003 is addressed later in this Section.

Briefings for Cabinet Members and Committee Chairs

349. At Mr Blair's request, members of Cabinet were briefed by Mr Scarlett in February 2003.

350. Mr Scarlett also briefed the Chairmen of the House of Commons Committees on Foreign Affairs and Defence and the Intelligence and Security Committee.

351. Following Cabinet on 6 February, Mr Blair asked Mr Scarlett "to provide a confidential and intelligence based briefing on Iraq for small groups of Ministers attending Cabinet". The briefing would "take as its starting point Part 1 of the Government's dossier published last September" and cover:

- the "latest assessment of Iraq's holding of weapons of mass destruction";
- the Iraqi response to resolution 1441;
- "recent developments in Iraq and our current assessment of the cohesion of the regime"; and
- "Iraq and terrorism".[133]

352. Four "briefing sessions" were offered the following week.

353. Mr Scarlett briefed the ISC on 5 February, following up a previous briefing on 22 January.[134]

354. Mr Scarlett also provided briefings for Mr Donald Anderson and Mr Bruce George, respectively the Chairmen of the House of Commons Foreign Affairs and Defence Committees.[135] Mr Scarlett reported that Mr Anderson had found the imagery used by Secretary Powell "especially 'compelling'".

355. The report of the briefing on 6 February for Mr George stated that the text had been agreed with the intelligence Agencies.[136] Mr George had shown most interest in Iraq's policy of concealment and had also asked about its links with Al Qaida. Mr Scarlett also reported that Mr George was: "… clear that the evidence on WMD holdings and concealment was 'sufficiently compelling' to justify 'military operations'."

356. The brief prepared for the Cabinet members drew on the document produced for briefing the Chairmen of the Select Committees.[137]

357. The brief for Cabinet members provided substantial additional material on:

- Iraq's programmes before the 1990-1991 Gulf Conflict;
- the current assessment of Iraq's capabilities – including its missile capabilities;
- difficulties with securing interviews;
- scenarios for CBW use;
- the risk of terrorism in the event of military action against Iraq.

358. Drawing on the detailed information published in the 24 September dossier, the brief stated that before the 1990-1991 Gulf Conflict, Iraq:

- had "declared to the UN the production of:
  - 2,850 tonnes of mustard gas, 210 tonnes of tabun, 795 tonnes of sarin and cyclosarin, and 3.9 tonnes of VX
  - 19,000 litres of botulinum toxin, 8,500 litres of anthrax, 2,200 litres of aflatoxin";
- "was aiming to produce a nuclear warhead with a yield of 20 kilotons"; and
- "had a well developed ballistic missile industry, producing missiles with ranges up to 650km".

359. In addition:

- UNSCOM and the IAEA had "destroyed much of the pre-1991 programmes".
- There were intelligence indications that "planning to reconstitute some of its programmes began in 1995".

[137] Minute Scarlett to Powell, 18 June 2003, 'Iraq/FAC: Robin Cook' attaching Paper, [undated], 'Iraq – Brief for the Cabinet'.

360. The brief stated that the Government assessment published on 24 September (the dossier), judged that Iraq:

- Had "a usable chemical and biological capability, which included production in 2002 of chemical and biological agents, and military plans to use them".
- Continued "to work on developing nuclear weapons".
- Possessed "up to 20 650km range" Al Hussein missiles", and was "developing longer-range ballistic missiles, and is extending the ranges of Al Samoud and Ababil-100 systems beyond the permitted range of 150km".

361. Addressing the current assessment of Iraq's capabilities, the brief stated:

- There was "Very little significant new intelligence on [Iraq's] WMD capabilities" since September 2002, "although continue to see planning for its use".
- The focus on UN inspections "may have limited activity in some areas such as missile development".
- The "possibility of ongoing production" of CBW agents could not be ruled out because it was "easily concealed especially in the case of BW agents using transportable biological production facilities".
- Intelligence indicated that Iraq had "produced both chemical and biological agents since 1998 to add to stocks since the [1991] Gulf War. As late as September 2002 Iraq was carrying out illegitimate work on anthrax that could be used as part of a weapons programme."

362. The brief recognised that not all the systems which were capable of delivering chemical and biological weapons would have such munitions or a CBW delivery role. Intelligence suggested that Iraq might "not be able to deliver CBW efficiently" using Al Samoud and Ababil-100 missiles.

363. Addressing Iraq's declaration in response to resolution 1441, the brief rehearsed the outstanding issues identified by UNSCOM in 1999 and added references to Iraq's:

- understatement in the declaration of the quantity of Volga engines which had been procured;
- lack of any reference to the engine test stand at al-Rafah; and
- "misrepresentation of the status and performance of the L-29 programme".

364. Addressing Iraq's concealment and deception activities, the briefing for the Cabinet stated that "Iraq was confident in its ability to prevent inspectors finding any 'smoking gun'".

365. The briefing for Mr Anderson and Mr George had stated that "Iraq was confident that inspections would not find" any "smoking gun".

366. The brief did not refer to the fact that although the inspectors had found material that had been procured illicitly, some of it related to permitted programmes including missiles with ranges less than 150km.

367. Mr Robin Cook, the Foreign Secretary from May 1997 to June 2001 and then Leader of the House of Commons, recorded that he had concluded Iraq did not have weapons of mass destruction in the sense of weapons that could be used against large-scale civilian targets.

368. Mr Scarlett reported that Mr Cook had asked a number of questions during his briefing on 20 February, including:

- The "threat posed by battlefield CBW as opposed to missiles capable of hitting civilian targets (e.g. cities) in foreign countries".
- Iraq's "weaponisation capabilities".
- "Had containment worked?"
- "Had Iraq's WMD programmes had developed since 1998?"[138]

369. Mr Scarlett added that he had:

> "… made clear that Iraq had a range of battlefield systems capable of delivering CBW. We assessed that Saddam was ready to use them, including against his civilian population. Iraq might not have succeeded in developing CBW capable warheads for the 150km 'permitted' missiles. We assessed that Iraq could deliver CBW with the 650km missiles it retained; if only one of these hit home in favourable conditions on an Israeli city (I might also have mentioned Kuwait), civilian casualties would be large. I also made clear that Iraq's programmes had not stood still since 1998 and had developed in all areas except perhaps the nuclear, where I reminded him of what was in the public assessment."

370. Mr Cook wrote that the briefing from Mr Scarlett had lasted an hour, and "was impressive in its integrity and shorn of the political slant with which No.10 encumbers any intelligence assessment".[139] Mr Cook had concluded, "Saddam probably does not have weapons of mass destruction in the sense of weapons that could be used against large-scale civilian targets".

371. Asked if Mr Cook had challenged the briefing, Sir John Scarlett told the Inquiry:

> "… he questioned me very closely on the assessment … He asked for more detail than other Ministers did … he was an especially experienced Minister when it came to the use of intelligence. He didn't dispute what I was saying … Where he … took a different view was on how he interpreted it …"[140]

[140] Private hearing, 5 May 2010, pages 83-84.

372. Sir John told the Inquiry that the briefing for Cabinet members was designed to cover:

> "… the current assessment of CBW capabilities and delivery systems; the reaction on the regime's part to the prospect of military action, and their behaviour and reaction to the presence of inspectors; the response to 1441 and the Assessment we made of the declaration in December; the activity on the concealment side; the problem with interviews of scientists and so on; Saddam's military options, including for the use of CBW; the aspects relating to international terrorism; the impact on the terrorist threat internationally, but also there was mention of what the Assessments were saying about the presence of extremists inside Iraq at the time."[141]

373. Asked if any of the briefing included material that was not included in current JIC Assessments, Sir John replied:

> "No, I was sticking to the regular briefing that was being given."

374. Lord Turnbull, Cabinet Secretary from September 2002 to September 2005, told the Inquiry that he thought the briefings for members of Cabinet in February had influenced their perspective.[142] He stated: "they were all very conditioned by the intelligence presentation".

375. A full list of the Iraq briefings provided by Mr Scarlett to Cabinet and senior Parliamentarians was published by the ISC in September 2003.[143]

Would Iraq use chemical and biological weapons?

376. The JIC judged on 19 February that southern Iraq was "the most likely area for the first use of CBW against both Coalition Forces and the local population".

377. In its discussion of the draft JIC Assessment of 19 February 2003, the JIC concluded that Saddam Hussein was "likely to use CBW first in southern Iraq, if anywhere".[144] The implications needed further discussion, in the final Assessment, "to bring out the scale of the potential humanitarian crisis", which would, in the initial period, need to be dealt with by Coalition troops.

378. The relevant Key Judgement stated:

> "Southern Iraq is the most likely area for the first use of CBW against both Coalition Forces and the local population."

379. The JIC Assessment stated:

> "The relative weakness of Iraqi forces in the South and the fact that those forces will face the brunt of a Coalition attack mean southern Iraq is the most likely area for the first use of CBW against both Coalition Forces and the local population."[145]

380. The Assessment added that one report from August 2002 had indicated:

> "… Iraqi plans to use CBW in southern Iraq to cause mass casualties among the Shia in the event of a US-led attack. The regime would seek to pin the blame for the resulting high-level of casualties on the Coalition."

381. Responding to a series of questions from Mr Blair (see Section 6.2), the MOD advised on 24 February that Iraq retained "the capability (through a variety of means) pre-emptively to deliver CBW against Coalition Forces in Kuwait. The question is one of intent."[146] There was "no intelligence" to indicate that the regime was "currently planning a pre-emptive strike". In the MOD view that was "highly unlikely whilst Saddam believes war can be averted". If he was convinced that war was "inevitable and imminent" that "might make a pre-emptive move more attractive" but it was "more likely that Saddam would deploy CBW after the onset of the campaign".

382. In its Assessment, 'Iraq: Prospects in the North', of how Iraq would respond in northern Iraq to a coalition attack, issued on 26 February, the JIC judged:

> "The Iraqi regime would be willing to use CBW against the Coalition and the Kurds."[147]

383. The Assessment made clear that that judgement was a continuation from earlier Assessments.

384. In its Note, 'Saddam's Plan for Baghdad' issued on 13 March, the JIC stated that it had "previously judged that Saddam would be willing to use chemical and biological warfare (CBW) against the Coalition and the Iraqi population".[148]

385. The JIC assessed that it was "likely that, even if it had not done so already, the regime would use CBW in the defence of Baghdad if it could". That "would depend on the survival of leadership command and control, and of some delivery means, such as artillery". Intelligence indicated that the Special Republican Guard and Special Security Organisation retained "control over CBW munitions" and that the regime had "been distributing protective CBW clothing and medical supplies for treating exposure to nerve agents to units around Baghdad".

Presentation of the UK position

386. The UK's intensive lobbying to secure support in the Security Council for a second resolution on Iraq is described in Sections 3.7 and 3.8. It included a series of visits to the capitals of many members of the Council.

387. Mr Miller informed Sir David Manning that a script was being prepared which would:

> "… briefly summarise evidence and judgements on Saddam's WMD; describe the effect of some of the agents; set out the Iraqi response to UNSCR 1441, including the flaws in the 7 December declaration; and cover what we know of concealment, intimidation of witnesses and other aspects of non-co-operation. It will also provide supporting material on Saddam's regime and – briefly – on links with terrorism. We will update the pack as new material becomes available."[149]

388. On 26 February, Mr Miller provided a brief for Sir Jeremy Greenstock to use in Security Council discussions, setting out the UK assessment of Iraq's WMD and its response to resolution 1441.[150]

389. The brief provided a very short summary of the judgements in the September dossier, including that there had been recent production of chemical and biological agents; that judgements on concealment had been borne out by events; that the dossier had highlighted rocket motor casting chambers which UNMOVIC had now proscribed; and that UNMOVIC had agreed that the al-Rafah engine test stand had "a capability far in excess of what is needed for permitted missile systems". The brief also stated that work on anthrax "carried on late into 2002".

390. In relation to Iraq's response to resolution 1441, the brief stated:

> "Saddam's behaviour since the middle of last year has been very instructive. We have been watching closely as the story unfolds. What follows is not supposition. It is what we know."

391. The points made in the briefing included:

- In April 2002, Qusay Hussein had issued instructions for the concealment of chemical warfare agents.
- In August 2002, "individual scientists and officials were made personally responsible for the items on which they were working, holding them in their homes and the homes of relatives and friends".
- By 20 November, all production work on banned weapons at Military Industrialisation Commission sites had been stopped and evidence of prohibited activity was being cleaned up.

[150] Letter Miller to Greenstock, 26 February 2003, 'Iraq: WMD Brief'.

- Proscribed materials were concealed "at innocuous sites such as hospitals".
- "Some materials, such as missiles, have been and remain on trucks that are continually on the move."
- "By the end of December Saddam was confident that this concealment strategy would work at least until the spring when military options might become more difficult – the aim was to buy time."
- Following the discovery of nuclear-related documentation at a scientist's home on 16 January 2003, orders were given to remove hidden items from scientists' homes.
- When inspectors arrived at a hospital at al-Kut in search of hidden weapons in January, they were "confronted by an orchestrated crowd, whose aim was to prevent a full inspection of the area".
- Many proscribed materials were "now being moved daily".
- Iraq continued to ensure, mainly through a policy of intimidation and monitoring, that the inspectors were not able to interview who they wanted.

392. The brief concluded:

> "Iraq will continue ostensible co-operation … and seek support in the UNSC to avert a war while continuing an active policy of concealment …
> "And as part of that, and despite current protestations, we know that Saddam is likely to agree to the destruction of all Al Samoud 2 missiles …"

393. Sir Jeremy reported that he had used the points provided by the Assessments Staff during "informal consultations" on 27 February, including Iraq's:

> "… capacity to produce chemical and biological weapons; its delivery mechanisms; the efforts the regime had taken to conceal WMD; the fact that the regime had considered whether to declare some weapons but concluded it was too risky; plans to obstruct … [the inspectors] if they got too close; and the intimidation to prevent private interviews which Iraq saw as the weak link that could expose their WMD."[151]

394. In addition, Sir Jeremy stated that "UNMOVIC had been tagging proscribed equipment that had been repaired by the Iraqis".

395. In meetings with President Vicente Fox, the Mexican President, and President Ricardo Lagos, the Chilean President, Mr Scarlett emphasised his confidence in the strength, consistency and reliability of both the UK's intelligence and the judgements it had reached.

---

[151] Telegram 318 UKMIS New York to FCO London, 28 February 2003, 'Iraq: 27 February Consultations and Missiles'.

396. Sir David Manning and Mr Scarlett went to Mexico and Chile on 1 and 2 March to explain the UK's position to President Fox and President Lagos, and to seek their support for the UK's proposals for the Security Council.[152]

397. Mr Scarlett was reported to have told President Fox that the UK had developed:

> "… a range of sources, some inside Iraq, that had proven reliability. We had built up a consistent picture in which we had confidence. Our allies, including Europeans, had no serious differences of substance with us …
>
> "While we believed that UNSCOM had been able to disarticulate Iraq's nuclear programme it had not been able to account for a wide range of chemical and biological materials – we were particularly worried about VX and anthrax. Even conservative estimates of material Iraq still held indicated the capacity to assemble thousands of WMD artillery shells. Since 1998 Iraq had continued to produce new agents, develop its missile capability and, with less success, reconstitute its nuclear programme.
>
> "In 2002 a conscious decision was taken to deny possession of WMD to frustrate a renewed and strengthened inspection programme. We had watched a policy of concealment and intimidation develop. Evidence had been dispersed, factories cleaned up and scientists cowed.
> "… Some UNMOVIC successes in January resulted in further efforts to hide evidence and deceive inspectors. Continued small successes forced Iraq to move to a policy of slow, small concessions to give the impression of movement (eg on missiles). For the UK, the litmus test would be interviews with scientists. Iraq realised their knowledge was their Achilles heel, hence the intimidation."

398. In the subsequent meeting with President Lagos, Mr Scarlett was reported to have described the intelligence assessment and, in response to a specific question, informed President Lagos that "although there were some differences of detail e.g. over the degree to which Saddam could weaponise, the French assessment was similar" to the UK's.[153]

The position in March

The IAEA position on Iraq's nuclear programme

399. The FCO advised No.10 on 4 March that the UK Mission in Vienna had confirmed that the IAEA was on the verge of closing the file on nuclear issues in Iraq, despite information from the UK that had "still not been followed up".[154] The IAEA had apparently concluded that:

- There was "no significant evidence that Iraq had attempted to procure uranium from Niger". The documents the IAEA had seen "that formed the basis of such an allegation appeared to be forgeries".
- Aluminium tubes, "although imported illegally", were not connected with a gas centrifuge programme. Iraq had "satisfactorily explained the use of the tubes, and the reasons for their various fine tolerances". The Iraqis "were no longer (if ever) in a position to manufacture a gas centrifuge, especially without foreign assistance".
- There was "no evidence to link the magnets with a covert nuclear programme"; the IAEA had found the part in the guidance system of a missile.
- The IAEA had evidence that a significant amount of the "missing 32 tonnes of HMX (a high explosive used to help trigger nuclear fission)", had been used for commercial purposes, "as the Iraqis had claimed".

UK assessments of Iraq's intentions

400. In evidence to the FAC on 4 March, Mr Straw emphasised Iraq's attempts to conceal its capabilities and deceive the inspectors.

401. Mr Straw gave evidence to the FAC on 4 March (see Section 3.7).[155]

402. In his opening statement, Mr Straw said that it was assessed that Iraq had the capability to produce a range of chemical and biological agents, and:

> "The Iraqi regime has put up an elaborate screen of concealment based on intimidation and deception to cover this capability … [W]e know that sensitive materials and documents have been hidden in the homes of employees and hidden too in hospitals, farms and other sites. Intelligence also suggests that WMD-related items may have been buried and others were being kept on the move every 12 hours using trucks and trains. Throughout the period of inspection Iraq's security and intelligence agencies have been monitoring UNMOVIC and the IAEA and plans are available to obstruct them if they come close to WMD itself … Iraq is particularly concerned about … interviews of scientists and others because if they were carried out as mandated by [resolution] 1441 they would unquestionably expose the regime's deception and its stockpile of weapons … In early December we know that Saddam Hussein issued instructions that scientists were to be threatened with serious consequences for themselves and their families if they revealed any sensitive information to UNMOVIC. They were ordered not to agree to any interviews taking place outside Iraq … The potential witnesses have been coached in the answers they have to give. Some of them have been removed from their homes and places of work and detained to prevent them from being interviewed."

403. An assessment of Iraq's intentions on 6 March concluded that the strategy was to play for time, and that Iraq thought the strategy was working.

404. The Assessments Staff was "confident" that Saddam Hussein's aim would be the eventual re-creation of his WMD capability.

405. Mr Miller provided an assessment of "Saddam's possible next moves" for Sir David Manning on 6 March.[156] The document was also sent to officials in the FCO, the MOD and the Cabinet Office.

406. Mr Miller described Saddam Hussein's strategy as "to play for time, gradually releasing limited information on Iraq's terms or when there is no other option". Iraq thought its strategy was working. Mr Miller stated: "Even if he [Saddam Hussein] does opt for a declaration of WMD, we are confident that his aim would be the eventual recreation of his capability."

407. Mr Miller advised that the decision to destroy the Al Samoud 2 missile was "indicative of Saddam's strategy: a drawn out debate with UNMOVIC over legality; an offer to form a 'technical committee' to review the weapon; compliance; and an attempt to portray compliance as a major concession". Mr Miller predicted that Iraq would "draw out the destruction process", which might take "as long as two months to complete".

408. Mr Miller concluded:

> "In short, we have seen no indication that there will be a change in Iraq's strategy … Iraq will continue to put the onus on the inspectors to set out what they want rather than pro-actively provide information … Saddam will be prepared to offer further concessions – or at least to say he is ready to. But based on current behaviour any information will be incomplete, will be difficult to interpret and will not represent a full declaration of Iraq's capability. On overseas interviews and any proposal for a substantial UN military force, agreement is likely only in the face of imminent military action."

Security Council, 7 March 2003

409. In his report to the Security Council on 7 March, Dr Blix stated that there had been an acceleration of initiatives from Iraq since the end of January, but they could not be said to constitute immediate co-operation. Nor did they necessarily cover all areas of relevance; but they were nevertheless welcome.

410. Dr Blix and Dr ElBaradei's presentations to the Security Council on 7 March, and the subsequent discussion, are described in detail in Section 3.7.

[156] Minute Miller to Manning, 6 March 2003, 'Iraq: Potential Compliance with UNMOVIC'.

411. Introducing UNMOVIC's 12th quarterly report of activity to 28 February 2003, Dr Blix stated that, when the quarterly report had been finalised, there had still been "relatively little tangible progress to note" and the report had been "cautious".[157] By 7 March, there had been a number of relevant events on which he would bring the Council up to date

412. Dr Blix stated that inspections had begun on 27 November 2002, and "faced relatively few difficulties". While there were "frictions", "at this juncture", UNMOVIC was "able to perform professional no-notice inspections all over Iraq and to increase aerial surveillance" and its capabilities were being increased.

413. Iraq seemed "to have encouraged interviewees not to request the presence of Iraq officials … or the taping of interviews" but "conditions ensuring the absence of undue influence were difficult to attain inside Iraq. Interviews outside Iraq might provide such assurance. It is our intention to request such interviews shortly." Thirty-eight individuals had been asked for interviews and 10 had accepted UNMOVIC's terms, seven during the last week.

414. Iraq had denied the existence of mobile production units for biological weapons and that proscribed activities were being conducted underground. Inspections had taken place at declared and undeclared sites but no evidence of proscribed activities had "so far been found". Iraq was "expected to assist in the development of credible ways to conduct random checks of ground transportation".

415. Inspectors were examining Iraq's programmes for RPVs and data was being collected to assess the range and other capabilities of the models found.

416. In relation to "reports of proscribed activity conducted underground", which Iraq had denied, Dr Blix stated that "no facilities for chemical or biological production or storage have been found so far". Iraq should provide information on any underground facilities that were suitable for the production or storage of weapons of mass destruction.

417. Dr Blix stressed the importance of Iraq's acceptance of the destruction of Al Samoud 2 missiles and associated items, which constituted a "substantial measure of disarmament … the first since the middle 1990s".

418. Other points covered by Dr Blix included:

- UNMOVIC was reviewing the legality of the Al Fatah missile.
- Papers on anthrax, VX and missiles had recently been provided. Many re-stated what Iraq had already declared, but some required further study and discussion.
- There was "a significant Iraqi effort under way to clarify a major source of uncertainty" about the "quantities of biological and chemical weapons" that had been "unilaterally destroyed in 1991", by excavating a site that was formerly

[157] UN Security Council, '4714th Meeting Friday 7 March 2003' (S/PV.4714).

"deemed too dangerous". Eight intact bombs had been unearthed, two of which had a "liquid fill". That "should be followed by a serious and credible effort to determine" how many R-400 bombs had been produced.

- Iraq had informed UNMOVIC that there would be further legislation on prohibiting work on weapons of mass destruction.

419. Dr ElBaradei reported that there were no indications that Iraq had resumed nuclear activities since the inspectors left in December 1998 and the recently increased level of Iraqi co-operation should allow the IAEA to provide the Security Council with an assessment of Iraq's nuclear capabilities in the near future.

420. Dr ElBaradei reported that the IAEA was focused on the "central question" of "whether Iraq has revived, or attempted to revive, its defunct nuclear weapons programme over the last four years".[158] Dr ElBaradei noted that:

> "… in the past three weeks, possibly as a result of ever-increasing pressure by the international community, Iraq has been forthcoming in its co-operation, particularly with regard to the conduct of private interviews and in making available evidence that could contribute to the resolution of matters of IAEA concern."

421. That "should enable" the IAEA "in the very near future to provide the Security Council with an objective and thorough assessment of Iraq's nuclear-related capabilities".

422. Iraq's industrial capacity had deteriorated sharply, including through the departure of foreign support present in the 1980s and large numbers of skilled Iraqi personnel in the preceding decade.

423. Interviews were continuing, including two "private interviews in the last 10 days". Interviews outside Iraq might be the best way to ensure that interviews were "free", and the IAEA intended to request such interviews "shortly".

424. The primary technical focus of the IAEA in the field had been on the possible resumption of Iraq's efforts to enrich uranium. In relation to the three key issues, the IAEA had:

- Failed to uncover any evidence that Iraq's attempts to purchase high strength aluminium tubes was for "any project other than … rockets". The documents provided and interviews had allowed the IAEA "to develop a coherent picture of attempted purchases and intended usage".
- Verified that none of the magnets Iraq had declared could be used directly for the magnetic bearings in centrifuges. It was likely that Iraq possessed the expertise to manufacture such magnets and the IAEA would continue to monitor and inspect equipment and materials.

---

[158] UN Security Council, '4714th Meeting Friday 7 March 2003' (S/PV.4714).

- Stated that documents relating to the reports of possible acquisition of uranium from Niger were not authentic, but the IAEA would continue to follow up any additional evidence.

425. Dr ElBaradei concluded that there was no indication:

- "of resumed nuclear activities" in buildings identified as new or reconstructed since 1998;
- "of nuclear-related prohibited activities at any inspected sites";
- "that Iraq has attempted to import uranium since 1990";
- "that Iraq has attempted to import aluminium tubes for use in centrifuge enrichment"; or
- "to date that Iraq imported magnets to use in a centrifuge enrichment programme".

426. Dr ElBaradei stated that Iraq's procurement efforts, including those in relation to magnets and aluminium tubes, had been conducted "in contravention of the sanctions controls" imposed by the Security Council. The IAEA would continue to scrutinise and investigate those issues and hoped "to continue to receive from States actionable information relevant to our mandate".

427. Mr Aldouri emphasised that Iraq had taken the strategic decision to disarm in 1991.

428. Mr Aldouri underlined Iraq's "pledge to continue pro-active co-operation" with UNMOVIC and the IAEA. He also stated that Iraq had taken "the strategic decision to rid itself of weapons of mass destruction" in 1991. He added:

> "All weapons that have been proscribed fall into one of two categories: they have been either declared or unilaterally destroyed by Iraq. All the declarations that Iraq has been repeatedly asked to present concerned the details and verification of that unilateral destruction and nothing … else. It is for the accusers to prove otherwise, if they possess any evidence."

429. Mr Aldouri stated that Iraq had no VX programme.

430. Mr Aldouri stated that the issues of concern identified by the US and UK were "an attempt to confuse the issue" and mask their real agenda to take over Iraq's oil and the political and economic domination of the region. Iraq continued to hope for justice from the Security Council and called on the Council to thwart aggression and prevent "a crime whose impact would far surpass that of any crime of the past century". He concluded:

> "… war against Iraq will wreak destruction, but it will not unearth any weapons of mass destruction, for one very simple reason: there are no such weapons, except in the imagination of some …"

431. In subsequent informal consultations, Sir Jeremy Greenstock stated that the UK was sure Iraq had WMD, but they could not be located because they had been hidden by Iraq.

432. The Council meeting was followed by "a long session of informal consultations".[159]

433. The points made by Sir Jeremy Greenstock included:

- There was "no real evidence of non-compliance on the nuclear weapons file".
- The "key question" was whether Iraq had WMD: "The UK was sure they did. But the WMD could not be located because Iraq had hidden them, and they would not be found without unconditional and immediate Iraqi co-operation."
- The US and the UK "had invested time and money in finding out the truth. So we knew that WMD were being moved every 12 hours; that mobile weapons facilities existed; and that documents and materials were being moved around."

434. Dr Blix was reported to have stated:

- Iraqi co-operation "sometimes seemed grudging", but "only if UNMOVIC found that Iraq was concealing things could one say that there was a real lack of co-operation".
- With the Al Samoud missiles and UAVs, Iraq was "trying to push to the boundaries of what was permissible". On the former, Iraq had arguably "trespassed over the border"; the resolution did not prohibit UAVs, but they were "on the border of what was allowed". UNMOVIC was "still investigating".
- Iraq "seemed to be trying to find ways of assisting UNMOVIC" on mobile BW facilities.

Security Council open debate, 11 and 12 March 2003

435. Iraq continued to refute US and UK statements about its capabilities and intent.

436. Following a meeting with Dr Blix late on 9 March, Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported that Dr Blix had reminded him "that UNMOVIC still lacked clear evidence that Iraq possessed any WMD at all".[160]

437. At the request of Malaysia representing the NAM, the Security Council held an open debate on the "situation between Iraq and Kuwait" on 11 and 12 March (see Section 3.8).[161]

[161] UN Security Council, '4717th Meeting Tuesday 11 March 2003' (S/PV.4717).

438. The points made by Mr Aldouri, who spoke at the beginning and end of the debate, included:

- The US and the UK had propagated "falsehoods and untrue allegations" about "Iraq's compliance and implementation of the relevant Security Council resolutions".
- Ninety-five percent of the disarmament tasks had been completed between 1991 and 1994.
- Iraq had recently unilaterally declared its missile programme and was destroying the Al Samoud 2 missiles which UNMOVIC had deemed to be proscribed.
- None of the "allegations" presented to the Council by Secretary Powell on 5 February had "proved to be true".
- The most recent "intelligence report produced by the UK [the No.10 dossier]", contained previously published information.
- Recent allegations about RPVs were unfounded. They were small experimental aircraft which had been examined by the inspectors.

439. In both his opening and closing statements, Mr Aldouri repeated that Iraq had "taken the strategic decision" to rid itself of weapons of mass destruction.

No.10 advice to Mr Blair

440. In response to his requests, Mr Blair was given several notes on 15 and 16 March about Iraq's WMD and the activities of the inspectors since 1991.

441. They comprised a series of statements setting out past problems without any caveats about how they should be interpreted in relation to Iraq's current capabilities and intent.

442. A note on the subjects covered by UNMOVIC's "clusters" report listed the unresolved issues, commenting: "There are therefore questions to which UNMOVIC has been unable to obtain answers in every one of the following 29 areas."[162]

443. A note on the types of CBW produced by Iraq, drawing on open sources whose accuracy had been endorsed by Porton Down,[163] graphically described the toxicity and effects of various agents, together with a comment on Iraq's capability taken from the UNMOVIC "clusters" report.[164]

444. A note on UNMOVIC activities between 1998 and 2002 advised Mr Blair that Iraq maintained that "no proscribed activities took place in that period" and had made no declarations. In the absence of site inspections, UNMOVIC had "relied on intelligence material supplied by Member States". Areas of activity reported to UNMOVIC included:

- "mobile BW agent production facilities";
- "underground facilities for research and production of CBW";
- "development of Unmanned Aerial Vehicles (UAVs), including those fitted with sprays for BW agents"; and
- "movements of proscribed materials and documents".

445. UNMOVIC had "reported a 'surge of activity' in the missile technology field over the period".[165]

446. A note setting out Iraqi tactics in dealing with UN weapons inspectors rehearsed problems encountered between 1991 and 1998 and concluded that:

> "Iraq's approach to the UN has therefore consisted of:
>
> – concealment and destruction of evidence
> – commitment to co-operate alternating with harassment of inspectors
> – as new facts become available to UNSCOM, Iraq changes its story to incorporate those facts. There is no genuine effort at openness or honesty.
>
> "The Blix 'clusters' paper underlines the inspectors' very limited information on the details of, for example, Iraq's BW programme. This is after 12 years of operations and five purportedly full, final and complete declarations by the Iraqis."[166]

Mr Cook's resignation statement, 17 March 2003

447. In his resignation statement of 17 March, Mr Cook set out his doubts about the degree to which Saddam Hussein posed a "clear and present danger".

448. In his statement to the House of Commons on the evening of 17 March, Mr Cook set out the reasons why he could not "support a war without international agreement or domestic support" and why, in order to vote against military action in the House of Commons the following day, he had resigned from the Government (see Section 3.8).[167]

449. Mr Cook continued:

> "Nor is it fair to accuse those of us who want longer for inspections of not having an alternative strategy … Over the past decade that strategy [of containment] had destroyed more weapons than in the Gulf War, dismantled Iraq's nuclear weapons programme and halted Saddam's medium and long range missile programmes."

[167] House of Commons, Official Report, 17 March 2003, columns 726-728.

450. Mr Cook stated that Iraq's military strength was now less than half its size in 1991; and, "Ironically", it was "only because Iraq's military forces" were "so weak that we can even contemplate its invasion". He questioned the threat posed by Iraq:

> "Iraq probably has no weapons of mass destruction in the commonly understood sense of the term – namely a credible device capable of being delivered against a strategic city target. It probably … has biological toxins and battlefield chemical munitions, but it has had them since the 1980s when US companies sold Saddam anthrax agents and the then British government approved chemical and munitions factories. Why is it now so urgent that we should take military action to disarm a military capacity that has been there for twenty years, and which we helped to create? Why is it necessary to resort to war this week, while Saddam's ambition to complete his weapons programme is blocked by the presence of UN inspectors?"

451. The questions about Iraq's capabilities asked by Mr Cook in response to the briefing he had been given by Mr Scarlett on 20 February are set out earlier in this Section.

Mr Scarlett's advice, 17 March 2003

452. On 17 March, Mr Scarlett addressed the different elements of Iraq's capability, including Iraq's actions since the departure of the inspectors in 1998 to pursue chemical and biological weapons programmes, and Iraq's activities to pursue enhanced ballistic missiles and other means to deliver them.

453. In relation to Iraq's chemical and biological weapons capability, Mr Scarlett concluded that the JIC view was clear: Iraq possessed chemical and biological weapons, the means to deliver them, and the capacity to produce them.

454. Mr Scarlett attributed the failure to find any significant evidence of chemical and biological weapons to Iraq's ability to conceal its activities and deceive the inspectors.

455. On 17 March, in response to a request from Sir David Manning, Mr Scarlett provided advice on "the strength of evidence showing Saddam's possession of WMD".[168]

456. Mr Scarlett wrote:

> "The starting point is our knowledge of Iraq's past WMD programmes. This demonstrates not only large-scale possession of these weapons, and the readiness to use them, but also Saddam's determination to retain WMD in the face of military defeat in 1991 and the subsequent UN inspections. You will recall that much of his BW programme came to light only in 1995, following Kamil's [Saddam Hussein's son-in-law] defection. And as UNSCOM demonstrated in 1999, there has never been a full and convincing account of the destruction of Iraq's capabilities."

---

[168] Minute Scarlett to Manning, 17 March 2003, 'Iraqi WMD: Evidence of Possession'.

457. Mr Scarlett pointed out that:

> "Evidence of past possession is not, of course, enough. Indeed it could itself engender rumour and speculation in Iraq that might be fed back to us as fact. (Some opposition and defector material may be suspect on these grounds.)"

458. Referring to the Government's assessment of Iraq's WMD published on 24 September 2002, Mr Scarlett wrote: "our judgement … draws on a range of well-sourced intelligence" falling under three main headings:

- SIGINT [signals intelligence] has provided extensive material relating to procurement activities particularly in the missile and UAV field. Some of this has led to a number of interdictions of missile material. Procurement of dual-use items that could be related to CBW and nuclear programmes has also been noted.
- Imagery has also provided useful material in relation to the extensive reconstruction of the Iraq's [sic] missile infrastructure, such as the identification of the al-Rafah Test Stand and the al-Mamoun solid fuel facility. Because many chemical and biological facilities are dual-use, it is difficult for imagery to provide proof of the existence of a CBW programme. For this reason we have not relied on imagery in supporting our case that Iraq has a CBW programme.
- HUMINT [human intelligence] has provided clear and consistent reporting relating to Iraq's continuing WMD programmes …"

459. Mr Scarlett added that HUMINT came "from a variety of sources":

- SIS have a number of well placed and reliable sources […] [with high-level access in Iraq] and have been able to report on the regime's WMD policy, its plans for use and its extensive concealment efforts. SIS also have a number of sources who report from closer to the programmes.
- Some of these have provided a consistent picture of Iraq's missile programme (including extension of Al Samoud and the existence of Al Husseins).
- Intelligence on CBW programmes has been less complete but indicates continued production of CBW agents after UNSCOM's departure.
- CIA and other foreign intelligence agencies (the mobile BW production laboratories originated from […]).
- DIS … reporting, relating to Iraq's long range missile programme."

460. Mr Scarlett wrote that Sir David Manning was "familiar with the main conclusions from intelligence".

461. Addressing Saddam Hussein's behaviour, Mr Scarlett wrote:

> "The picture from past possession and from intelligence is further reinforced by Saddam's current behaviour. He has been given clear opportunities to avoid military action by demonstrating full and active co-operation with UNMOVIC. But he has repeatedly failed to take this route. Leaving aside the intelligence on his concealment tactics, his actions since the adoption of UNSCR 1441 are strongly indicative of deceit. They include:

- failure to volunteer scientists for interview outside Iraq;
- illicit procurement, and subsequent concealment, of Volga engines;
- failure to declare reconstructed facilities (including the rocket motor casting chambers) previously disabled by UNSCOM".

462. In relation to inspections, Mr Scarlett wrote:

"The failure of UNMOVIC to uncover significant chemical or biological weapons has been disappointing. But it is not wholly unexpected. On 16 October last year,[169] the JIC judged that there was a serious risk that Iraq could prevent inspectors from finding conclusive evidence of WMD before the spring, unless there was additional guidance to UNMOVIC. The JIC pointed in particular to the importance of interviews free of Iraqi intimidation: you know the limited progress in this area."

463. Mr Scarlett concluded:

"The JIC view is clear. Iraq possesses chemical and biological weapons, the means to deliver them and the capacity to produce them. The scale of the holdings is hard to quantify: it is undoubtedly much less than in 1991. But the evidence points both to Saddam's view that the capability is already militarily significant, and to his determination – left to his own devices – to build it up further."

464. A reference in paragraph 4 of the minute to the conclusions being "summarised at Annex" was crossed out by Mr Scarlett on the signed version of the minute on the No.10 file.

465. Mr Scarlett sent a copy of the minute to Mr Powell in February 2004 with a manuscript note stating that he had "not yet traced a copy of the Annex".[170]

466. The Government could not find any evidence of an Annex. The Inquiry concludes one was planned but not produced: hence the manuscript amendment removing the reference to the Annex in paragraph 4 of the document.

467. Sir David Manning advised Mr Blair:

> "I asked that you should have this Summary from the Chairman of JIC before action begins. Worth adding that all political intelligence also points to Saddam and senior officials aware of WMD programmes and determined to retain them."[171]

468. Mr Blair replied: "Good."[172]

469. The advice to No.10 was not formally considered and agreed by the JIC or sent to other Ministers.

470. A draft of the document held by the MOD, also dated 17 March 2003, shows Sir David Omand, Sir Richard Dearlove, Sir Francis Richards (Director, Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ)) and senior officials in the MOD, the FCO and the Cabinet Office as copy recipients.[173]

471. Mr Hoon quoted from that draft when he told the Inquiry that Mr Scarlett had advised that Iraq had "the capacity to re-establish production" of chemical and biological weapons.[174]

472. A manuscript note written by Mr Scarlett in February 2004 stated that the note "was approved by the Agencies and DIS. It was not formally at JIC."[175]

473. The Government has confirmed that there are no additional words on the copy of the minute on the No.10 file.

474. The Inquiry concludes that the advice was not formally approved by the JIC.

475. The Government was unable to find any evidence that the final version of Mr Scarlett's minute to Sir David Manning was sent to anyone outside No.10.[176]

JIC Note, 19 March 2003: 'Saddam: The Beginning of the End'

476. The JIC continued to assess that Iraq had usable chemical and biological weapons and might use them, although its ability to do so could be limited.

477. A JIC Note, 'Saddam: The Beginning of the End', which revisited previous JIC judgements in the light of recent events and intelligence, was issued by the Assessments Staff on 19 March after discussion by the JIC earlier that day.[177]

478. Addressing the use of chemical and biological weapons, the Note stated that the JIC judged:

- Iraq had "a usable CBW capability, deliverable using artillery, missiles and possibly unmanned aerial vehicles".
- Iraq's Al Hussein and shorter-range missiles, "mostly with a range of 150km or less … may be able to deliver CBW, although intelligence suggests that Iraq might lack warheads capable of the effective dispersal of such agents."

479. In addition, the Note stated:

- "A report […] in mid-March indicated that Iraq's chemical weapons remained disassembled and that Saddam had not yet ordered their assembly."
- The issue of gas masks and injections for CBW antidotes indicated "Iraqi plans to use CBW".
- "Intelligence on the timing of CBW use is inconsistent […]."
- Intelligence on the deployment of CBW was "sparse".
- "Uncorroborated reporting" suggested the "delivery of CW shells to Republican Guard units … south of Baghdad".
- There was "no evidence" that ballistic missiles destroyed by Coalition air action in February "were equipped with CBW warheads", but the JIC could not be sure that it "would receive indications prior to an attack".
- Saddam Hussein retained "ultimate control of CBW use", but there were suggestions that he had "contingency plans to devolve military decision making, including CBW, to regional commands, if communications are cut with Baghdad".
- Saddam Hussein "might take this decision early, once the severity of the initial attack becomes clear or in the face of Kurdish or Shia uprisings", although the possibility of Saddam Hussein offering concessions to remain in power "would argue against pre-emptive attacks and devolving control".
- An "early strategic U-turn, once Saddam realises the intensity of the attack … and the risk of losing control of his CBW capability" could not be ruled out, and he might "then order early CBW attacks".
- The JIC continued to judge that "in the face of death and the destruction of his regime", Saddam Hussein would "try to wreak as much havoc as possible", but his ability to do so could be limited.

---

[177] Note JIC, 19 March 2003, 'Saddam: The Beginning of the End'.

- There was a "further risk … that CBW could become available to extremist groups either as a last vindictive act by Saddam, or through the loss of control in the final days of his regime".
- Two recent reports suggested that "some or all" of Iraq's Al Hussein missiles "were disassembled to hide them from inspectors. It would take Iraq at least several days to reassemble the missiles once they decided to do so."

480. Sir John Scarlett told the Inquiry that an Intelligence Update produced on 10 March had referred to a report issued on 7 March:

> "… essentially saying that Iraq had no missiles which could reach Israel and none which could carry germ or biological weapons.
>
> "The leadership had ordered the dismantlement of the missiles known as Al Hussein … to avoid discovery and they thought they could be quickly re-assembled. The JIC had over many months throughout this period reported the assessed existence of these missiles … But all along, it had been reported that they had been disassembled and concealed.
>
>
> "The Defence Intelligence Staff advised … that … it might be possible to reassemble [the missiles] in one or two days. But if it was very complex disassembly it would be longer.
> "SIS advised that the reference to 'germ and biological' might also refer to chemical, just from the context, although that was speculative."[178]

481. Sir John Scarlett also told the Inquiry that, on 17 March:

> "… intelligence was received that chemical weapons had been disassembled and dispersed and would be difficult to reassemble. Saddam had not yet ordered reassembly nor, indeed, asked about chemical weapons."[179]

482. Sir John added that the two reports:

> "… were assessed in the context of the policy of dispersal and concealment. They were not understood to be an indication that chemical and biological weapons did not exist. Indeed they didn't say that but … it was clear … that they might be difficult to find.
> "Previous reporting and updates had already reported separately on the difficulty that Iraq was having or was reported to have in developing or redeveloping chemical warheads for ballistic missiles … An update at the end of December had noted …

that point, but also noted that the intelligence had said that chemical warheads were still available for short-range artillery, rockets and so on."

483. Asked whether the JIC had revised its assessment in the light of the reports, Sir John stated:

"… the JIC looked again at the issue and recorded its view in the minute [JIC Note] of 19 March and judged then that Iraq had a usable chemical and biological warfare capability, deliverable by artillery shells and possibly by aerial vehicles. It also said that missiles might be available to deliver CBW, but Iraq might lack the necessary warheads …"[180]

484. Mr Blair told Cabinet on 20 March that Saddam Hussein would, in extremis, probably use chemical and biological weapons, and that it was believed that some were deployed with Iraqi forces.[181]

485. Mr Scarlett wrote to Mr Powell on 21 March stating that: "in the current crisis, numerous intelligence reports indicate that Saddam Hussein is prepared to use CBW to ensure the survival of the regime, despite the US again having warned of the implications this would have for Iraq."[182]

Security Council, 19 March 2003

486. In the Security Council discussion on 19 March, Iraq reiterated that it no longer possessed weapons of mass destruction.

487. The Security Council held an open debate on Iraq on 19 March (see Section 3.8).[183]

488. In his statement to the Council, Mr Aldouri expressed his "appreciation" for the efforts made by Council members to find a peaceful solution to the "current crisis", which had been "created by the United States, the United Kingdom and Spain, with the intention of launching a hostile war against Iraq and occupying it under the pretext of the presence in Iraq of weapons of mass destruction".

489. Mr Aldouri stated:

"For the record, and for the sake of historical accuracy, as well as to reassure every State that has recently made active efforts to maintain peace and to prevent war, we would like to reiterate that Iraq no longer possesses weapons of mass destruction. The presence of such weapons has been relegated to the past. Iraq decided in 1991 to destroy the weapons it had produced. That action stemmed from the conviction underlying Iraq's policy to rid itself of such weapons. Proof of this fact lies in the failure by the United States and Britain to prove any allegation that Iraq has possessed such weapons in recent years, and especially during the period following the adoption of resolution 1441 (2002)."

490. Mr Aldouri stated that the inspectors had "refuted all the misleading information that was presented" by the US and the UK; and that the inspectors had "proved that information to be false", including the information that Secretary Powell had "worked so arduously to put before the Council as damning evidence". The US and the UK had failed to "provide even a shred of evidence".

491. Mr Aldouri concluded by reaffirming that Iraq would "continue to work with the Security Council to make the truth known" that Iraq was "free of weapons of mass destruction". Iraq hoped that the Council would "continue to search for a peaceful solution to the crisis, ensure that the work of the inspectors continues and resume the Oil-for-Food programme".

492. Sir Jeremy Greenstock reported:

"Even at the precipice of war, Aldouri maintains Iraq has no WMD."[184]

Withdrawal of intelligence

493. Three streams of pre-invasion intelligence reporting on Iraq were withdrawn by SIS after the invasion:

- the reports of 11 and 23 September 2002 were withdrawn on 29 July 2003;
- all the reporting from the sourcing chain that had produced the "45 minutes report" was withdrawn on 28 September 2004; and
- all the reporting from Curve Ball, the source who had provided material on the mobile production facilities for chemical and biological weapons, was withdrawn on 29 September 2004.

SIS reporting of 11 and 23 September 2002

494. SIS issued two reports on Iraqi CBW, from a new source on trial, about the production of chemical and biological agents in September 2002.

495. The first report on 11 September stated that:

- Iraq had accelerated the production of chemical and biological agents;
- it had built further facilities throughout Iraq; and
- Saddam Hussein was determined to maintain his CBW capability.

496. SIS also stated that it expected to receive substantial additional material on Iraq's biological and chemical programme through the same source.

---

[184] Telegram 492 UKMIS New York to FCO London, 20 March 2003, 'Iraq: 19 March Open Debate'.

497. Reflecting concerns about source protection, the report was given a very limited distribution to named senior officials.

498. The report did not make clear that SIS was not itself in contact with the source whom it considered had direct access to Iraq's programmes.

499. The detail of the reporting and Sir Richard Dearlove's description of it in a telephone call to Mr Scarlett on 11 September are set out in Section 4.2.

500. Sir Richard Dearlove briefed Mr Blair on the reporting on 12 September, when he had:

> "… underlined … the potential importance of the new source and what SIS understood his access to be; but also said that the case was developmental and that the source remained unproven."[185]

501. SIS4 suggested that Mr Blair had already known about the intelligence before the meeting between Mr Blair and Sir Richard Dearlove on 12 September, and that he wanted to see the product.[186]

502. Sir Richard Dearlove told the Inquiry that "it would have been very rare" for him to have talked to Ministers or Mr Blair "about our source base".[187]

503. Asked about Mr Blair's reaction, Sir Richard told the Inquiry that Sir David Manning had asked him to give Mr Blair a briefing "which would give him [Mr Blair] more of a flavour for what was actually going on on the ground".[188] Mr Blair "had an appetite for that sort of briefing which was a pretty rare event", and had had a "fair amount of general discussion" with SIS9 "about the difficulties and problems we were facing".

504. Asked whether he had been precipitate in going to Ministers with the report so quickly, Sir Richard replied:

> "I think in the circumstances, I don't agree … because if you issue a report like that in the middle of a crisis, you're going to get a phone call from a Ministerial office within a short period of time."[189]

505. Sir Richard also stated that in the circumstances it would have been "impossible" not to issue the report; SIS could not "sit on something as potentially important" as that.[190]

506. The report of 11 September was used by Mr Scarlett and Mr Miller in reaching key judgements about Iraq's chemical and biological weapons capabilities in the Government dossier published on 24 September.

507. Specifically it provided the assurance for the judgements that Iraq had:

- "continued to produce chemical and biological agents";
- "military plans for the use of chemical and biological weapons …"

508. The way in which the reporting was used in the preparation of the dossier and the decision not to show it to the experts in the DIS is addressed in Section 4.2.

509. The judgements in the dossier on Iraq's production of chemical and biological weapons and the circumstances in which they could be used became the baseline for subsequent advice to Ministers and public statements on the threat posed by Iraq.

510. SIS issued a second report from the same sourcing chain as the 11 September report on 23 September.[191] That stated VX, sarin and soman had been produced at Al-Yarmuk, and were loaded into a variety of "containers", including "linked hollow glass spheres". The source commented that there had been "accelerated production of CW substances at Al-Yarmuk for several years".

511. SIS described the report as expanding and clarifying the intelligence in the first report, and that it was "valuable intelligence".

512. The report was sent to the same restricted group as the report on 11 September, with the addition of Mr Mark Bowman, Private Secretary to Mr Gordon Brown, the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

513. The Butler Report stated that SIS had hopes that this source would become a major asset.[192] In particular, the source had indicated to SIS that he would be able to provide substantial and critical additional intelligence in the near future.

514. By December 2002, as set out earlier in this Section, doubts had emerged within SIS about the reliability of the sourcing chain.

515. SIS did not inform No.10 or others that in mid-February 2003 the source had been revealed to have been lying to SIS over a period of time and that it had concluded by early March that there was no further material and that SIS would seek to make direct contact with the sub-source.

516. The reports of 11 and 23 September were reissued to a wider readership on 3 April.

[192] Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction ["The Butler Report"], 14 July 2004, HC 898, paragraph 574.

517. A minute of 2 April recorded that a SIS Requirements officer had been telephoned the previous night about the two reports produced in September 2002. Mr Scarlett had asked "about the reliability of the sourcing" and for a copy as he no longer had access to the original copies.[193]

518. The SIS Requirements officer had given "only the briefest details (that we obtained the material via another source, with whom we were no longer in contact, and that we were still trying to contact the original source)".

519. The SIS Requirements officer also wrote:

> "Despite the problems over the … sourcing chain, there could be some merit in at least widening the extremely limited readership of these two reports. We cannot (yet) discount their content and, topically … [the report of 11 September] provides useful support for … [another report]. The case is no longer as sensitive and we could usefully re-circulate the two reports, with some additional commentary."

520. The SIS Requirements officer provided a draft letter for SIS4 to send to Mr Scarlett.

521. Another SIS Requirements officer commented that there had been "no public use of the material; what it was used for was to give assurance to the assessment in the 'dossier' that Iraq continued production of CW after 1998". The DIS would "welcome" the downgrading of the restricted marking on the reports and it would "need to see these reports whenever a review of the Iraq WMD story is commissioned".[194]

522. SIS4 wrote to Mr Scarlett on 3 April 2003 providing copies of the two reports of 11 and 23 September 2002.[195]

523. The letter stated that the reports were "not drawn upon for either the dossier or for the Prime Minister's subsequent statements. And of course it [the material] post-dated … [the JIC Assessment of 9 September 2002, 'Iraqi Use of Chemical and Biological Weapons – Possible Scenarios']." SIS4 also wrote that Sir Richard Dearlove had briefed Mr Blair:

> "… on the background to the case (and on what else we hoped it might deliver) but for speed the reports were issued to other readers without a full briefing. This was to have followed but, as there was no further reporting, we did not bother you with this."

524. SIS4 added:

> "You may therefore wish to know something of the background to the case. The material came from an Iraqi sub-source who was working within the CW programme [via SIS source]. We are still endeavouring to establish direct contact with him [the sub-source]; until we succeed in this we shall not be able to verify fully the details given in the intelligence. But despite the later behaviour of our source, we have no reason yet to dismiss this material. There has been collateral for some of it [from other reporting issued on 30 March 2003].”

525. Because source protection was no longer as sensitive, the documents would be reissued “with additional comment and to a wider readership”.

526. A report was issued on 3 April 2003 which was described as “a lightly edited composite of two reports” previously issued in September 2002. The source was described as: “A new source (with whom contact has now ceased) quoting the [sub-source].”[196]

527. The 3 April report merged much of the reporting in the reports of 11 and 23 September 2002 and added new comments from SIS. The significant changes were:

- A statement that “capability outstripped personnel able to operate it” was moved to the Summary of the report. That gave it additional prominence in comparison with the original report of 11 September.
- SIS added a comment that this was consistent with a later report from March 2003 about the problems caused by the dispersal of technical experts previously involved in the production of CW.
- Details of spherical glass containers filled with CW agents at the named establishment, which had constituted part of the main body of the second report, were identified as a “source comment” in the 3 April report.
- Additional details were provided substantiating the authenticity of the sub-source’s existence. His previous involvement in CW activities was also emphasised.
- SIS acknowledged that it would not be possible “to verify fully” the details in the report until it had succeeded in gaining direct access to the sub-source, but it had “no reason to dismiss the bulk of this material, for which there has been collateral”.
- However, it drew attention to the fact that the source’s description of the device and its spherical glass contents was “remarkably similar to the fictional chemical weapon portrayed in the film The Rock”. It acknowledged that the similarity had been pointed out by one recipient when the report of 23 September was circulated. That significantly changed the context in which the details were subsequently presented in the reissued report.
- There is no evidence that that point was made to the original readers of the reports before they were reissued on 3 April.

[196] Report SIS, 3 April 2003, ‘WMD/Iraq: Production of Chemical and Biological substances in Iraq in 2002’.

- SIS added a comment that the reporting of additional risks being taken to increase production was consistent with UNSCOM's observation on Iraqi working practices and their disregard for safety.
- SIS also added a comment that the reporting of an order to stop production and decontaminate equipment in August 2002 was "unsurprising" as it paralleled the then assumed arrival of UNMOVIC. It added that the current state of the facility "and the material produced prior to August 2002" was "unknown".
- SIS had been unable to identify the "anthrax specialist" mentioned in the original report.

528. The summary of the intelligence produced for dissemination at "Secret" level, including to selected foreign partners, presented the information that the Iraqi regime had "demanded accelerated production of BCW substances" in 2002. In August 2002 an order had been sent to all factories involved in producing BCW instructing them to stop producing prohibited substances.

529. The reissued report was sent to officials in the FCO, the MOD – including the DIS, the Cabinet Office and GCHQ. It was not sent to the original, high-level recipients of the September reports.

530. After the conflict the sub-source told SIS that he had not provided the information in the reports.

531. SIS formally withdrew the reporting on 29 July 2003.

532. SIS finally met the sub-source in June 2003.[197] He had been involved in Iraq's CW programme before 1991 and had also been involved in Iraq's destruction activities. The sub-source denied that he had provided any of the material attributed to him. SIS concluded that its source was a fabricator who had lied from the outset.

533. On 3 July, a SIS Requirements officer wrote that it was "now necessary" to withdraw the reports issued on 11 and 23 September and 3 April.[198]

534. The Requirements officer added:

> "Without denying that these reports are no longer valid, we need to ensure their withdrawal does not provide wide-spread scepticism about our CW reporting, particularly in the absence of a convincing CW find."

535. The relevant SIS team leader had "prepared the ground with Mr Scarlett and others for the likelihood that, now we have the opportunity to validate our CX, some may prove false. They were sanguine about this, at least in the abstract. But DIS in particular remain sceptical of our CW reporting and Assessments Staff continue to claim (wrongly) that they drew on the [11 September report] for the dossier."

---

[197] SIS record, 25 June 2003.
[198] Minute, 3 July 2003, 'Withdrawal of CX'.

536. The Requirements officer concluded that SIS should write to those to whom the reports had been issued and sought SIS3 and SIS4 approval for the text to be used.

537. The Requirements officer also commented:

> "… there are still unanswered questions as to how this story could have been so wrong, but that is not an issue for CX readers."

538. Sir Richard Dearlove informed the ISC in mid-July 2003 that the intelligence had been withdrawn.[199]

539. Internal SIS documents seen by the Inquiry show that the briefing produced for Sir Richard Dearlove's appearance before the ISC stated that: "In the light of the post-war research … [the reporting of 11 and 23 September 2002] has now been withdrawn."[200]

540. A memorandum withdrawing the reports of 3 April 2003 (and 11 and 23 September 2002) was issued on 29 July 2003.[201] It said that SIS had interviewed the individual identified as the sub-source for the intelligence after the conflict, but he had denied being the source of the material passed to SIS. The memorandum stated that the reports were being withdrawn because the sourcing chain was discredited. That did "not necessarily invalidate their contents (some of which chimed with other reporting)".

541. The memorandum was sent to most of the recipients of the original reports, including to the Private Offices of Mr Straw and Mr Hoon and to Mr Bowen in the Cabinet Office. But it was not sent to No.10 or to Mr Brown's Private Office.

542. In the covering letter to SIS's Annual Report for 2002-2003, Sir Richard Dearlove wrote:

> "Iraq of course has been the dominant issue. I am confident that the intelligence picture to which we contributed pre-conflict will be proved correct."[202]

543. Sir Richard added that the search for Saddam Hussein's WMD would continue into 2004, "and possibly beyond". He also wrote:

> "We risk damage to the credibility of the intelligence community if the public perception remains that our intelligence may have been wrong. If we can persuade Iraqi scientists involved in the programme to go public, then we may be able to turn the media debate more in our favour and reduce our dependence on the eventual outcome of the physical search."

544. In the letter and the Annual Report itself, which was sent to Mr Brown, Mr Straw and Mr Hoon, Sir Andrew Turnbull, Sir David Omand, Mr Scarlett, Sir Michael Jay (the FCO Permanent Under Secretary), Ms Eliza Manningham-Buller (Director General of the Security Service) and Dr David Pepper (Director, GCHQ), as well as to Mr Blair, there was no mention of any doubts about the reliability of any of the intelligence on Iraq's WMD.

545. Following the evidence to the Hutton Inquiry of Dr Brian Jones (the branch head of the nuclear, biological and chemical section in the Scientific and Technical Directorate of the Defence Intelligence Staff, 1987 to January 2003), Sir Richard Dearlove's Private Secretary asked for Mr Straw's permission for Sir Richard to disclose the reports of 11 and 23 September 2002 to the ISC on 8 September 2003.[203]

546. The letter stated that Sir Richard Dearlove had told the Committee, during a hearing on 17 July, that the "reporting came from a new source on trial and was subsequently withdrawn".

547. Mr Straw approved the request the following day.[204]

THE INTELLIGENCE AND SECURITY COMMITTEE'S VIEW

548. In its Report published in September 2003, the ISC stated that it had considered the concerns expressed by two individuals in the DIS about "the language used in the draft dossier, which was not in their view supported by the intelligence available to them on the current production of chemical and biological agents and weapons". The Report stated:

> "We were told that there was further intelligence of a nature so sensitive that it was only released on a very restricted basis. We have seen the intelligence and understand the basis on which the CDI [Chief of Defence Intelligence] and JIC took the view they did."[205]

549. The ISC Report did not state that the intelligence had been withdrawn.

THE BUTLER REVIEW

550. The Butler Report noted that the reporting had been withdrawn in July 2003.

551. The Butler Report, published on 14 July 2004, stated that SIS had withdrawn the two reports (of 11 and 23 September 2002) in July 2003, "because the sourcing chain had by then been discredited".[206] SIS had interviewed the alleged sub-source after the conflict who had "denied ever having produced the information in the reports".

552. The Butler Report noted that the two reports, "including one which was important in the closing stages of production of the Government's September dossier, must now be treated as unsafe".

553. The Butler Report's comments on the decision not to show the reporting to DIS experts is addressed in Section 4.2.

MINISTERIAL AWARENESS THAT THE REPORTING HAD BEEN WITHDRAWN

554. Mr Blair and Mr Hoon became aware that the reporting had been withdrawn as a result of the Butler Review.

555. In the No.10 press briefing on 16 July 2004, Mr Blair's Official Spokesman was asked why Lord Hutton had not been informed that the intelligence had been withdrawn a month before Mr Scarlett had given evidence to the Hutton Inquiry.[207] The Spokesman replied that SIS validation of the intelligence was still "ongoing" and that at the time Mr Scarlett gave evidence, "this matter was still being investigated".

556. Asked about Sir Richard Dearlove's evidence to the Hutton Inquiry that the information in the dossier was "sound" and whether the SIS decision not to inform Lord Hutton that the intelligence had been withdrawn meant that Sir Richard's evidence had been "wrong", the Spokesman replied that "Lord Hutton had been investigating the controversy surrounding the 45-minute claim, not the wider intelligence picture".

557. Asked when Mr Blair had "discovered" that the intelligence had been withdrawn, the Spokesman replied that Mr Blair "had not known at the time he had given evidence to Lord Hutton [on 28 August 2003]" that the intelligence had been withdrawn "because the process of validation had been ongoing". Mr Blair had "found out" that the intelligence had been withdrawn "as a result of the Butler Inquiry".

558. In Written Questions to Mr Blair, Mr Straw and Mr Hoon, Mr Adam Price (Plaid Cymru) asked each of them when they were:

> "… informed that SIS had withdrawn reporting from the source who claimed that production of biological and chemical agents had been accelerated by the Iraqi regime, because the source of the reporting had subsequently been deemed unreliable."

559. Mr Straw replied on 20 July:

> "I became aware of the withdrawal of this reporting when I agreed, in response to a request from SIS on 8 September 2003, that the reports in question should be disclosed to the Intelligence and Security Committee."[208]

[208] House of Commons, Official Report, 20 July 2004, column 176W.

560. Mr Hoon replied on 21 July:

> "I first became aware that SIS had withdrawn the reports as a result of the Butler Review."[209]

561. Mr Blair replied on 21 July:

> "As my Official Spokesman made clear on 16 July, it was as a result of the Butler Review."[210]

562. In response to a further question from Mr Price, asking when he had become aware that "in July 2003" SIS "had withdrawn two reports from a new source on trial because the source had by then been discredited", Mr Blair replied on 16 September:

> "These matters have been examined during the course of the Butler Review and other inquiries, and covered during debates and statements on Iraq and in briefings by my Official Spokesman. All relevant information has been placed in the public domain insofar as that could be done without prejudicing national security."[211]

563. Asked by Mr Bob Marshall-Andrews (Labour), in November 2004, for the precise date on which he was aware of the intelligence services' withdrawal of "wholly discredited" reports, Mr Blair replied that he thought:

> "… the doubts about the information … were drawn to our attention during the Butler Review. I can certainly look into the precise date on which that happened. It has to be said, however, and I hope that he understands this, that the information and intelligence that we received, we received in good faith and acted on in good faith."[212]

564. Although the SIS minute of 29 July 2003 withdrawing the reporting was sent to the Private Offices of Mr Straw and Mr Hoon and to the Cabinet Office, it was not sent to No.10.

565. The withdrawal of the reporting was done in a very low key manner compared with the way in which the original reporting was issued. That and the timing of the minute may explain why it was not drawn to Mr Hoon's attention. It is not clear why SIS did not inform No.10 or ask the Assessments Staff to do so.

566. Senior members of SIS offered the Inquiry differing views about how the reports had been used by SIS.

567. Asked about the confidence attached to the reports of 11 and 23 September, SIS1 told the Inquiry that he thought "it was based in part on wishful thinking". He added:

> "SIS was under quite extraordinary pressure to try and get a better view of Iraq's WMD programme, and I think we marketed that intelligence – I think this is not [an] original comment – before it was fully validated."[213]

568. Asked whether there were doubts in SIS's collective consciousness even before March 2003, SIS1 replied:

> "Well before that. Even while it was still going on. Here was a chap who promised the crock of gold at the end of the rainbow. Now, you have got to go for those, because sometimes that can be just what you are looking for."[214]

569. Asked about the strain that had put on the validation process and the way in which it is reported, SIS1 replied:

> "Well, there wasn't much to validate. What he was promising had not arrived. That was the point.
>
> "… and I think that that created an expectation which could not be fulfilled, not only on the part of those who were briefed on it …"[215]

570. Asked whether the reporting was the reason for the belief that there was a growing threat, SIS1 replied: "No, because, again, there wasn't much to go on."

571. Asked if the reporting had influenced actual assessments, SIS1 replied:

> "No, he didn't influence assessments. He influenced expectation on the part of people who were concerned, are we going in the right direction."[216]

572. Asked about Sir David Omand's comment to the Inquiry that SIS over-promised and under-delivered, SIS1 replied:

> "If he was referring to that [the information promised by the SIS source], I think he's right. I would hate it to be the epitaph of the whole period. If that was the suggestion, that's completely untrue."[217]

573. Asked about the confidence which Sir Richard Dearlove had expressed in the intelligence, SIS4 told the Inquiry that, for SIS, the report had a story behind it. The technical experts in SIS "knew the Iraqi story intimately". If they "said we know about this chap, we know about the account of his past, if he's possibly in touch with us and going to send us stuff, that's a very major development".[218]

574. SIS4 added that it was "potentially a very, very serious breakthrough".[219]

575. SIS4 told the Inquiry that Sir Richard Dearlove had not, in his view, "acted unprofessionally" in briefing Mr Blair about the 11 September report. He had had "to take all these political decisions on his own shoulders" and those were:

> "Heavy responsibilities.
> "He judged that Blair needed to know, and he told him. I don't think he did a wrong thing. The style may be questioned, but I don't think he was wrong to do what he did.
>
> ….
> "… the analysis and motivation at the time … stands."[220]

576. Asked why Mr Blair was under the impression when he gave evidence to the Hutton Inquiry that the process of validation was still continuing, SIS4 told the Inquiry:

> "I think that was one of life's ghastlinesses. I don't think the withdrawal notice was sent to Number 10 because withdrawal notices are not major new intelligence. They are not the sort of thing ministers get up early to read. What they do affect, importantly, is the integrity of the record.
> "I imagine that the requirements officer issuing the withdrawal report … thought, 'They won't be interested in this'. How wrong he was, and what a skid-up within just a few days, when the Prime Minister said at a public inquiry something that was probably not the case.[221] It's very embarrassing."[222]

577. Asked whether that was, "A cock-up rather than a conspiracy", SIS4 replied: "Always."

[221] Mr Blair did not make such a statement to the Hutton Inquiry. The statement that he had not known about the withdrawal of the reporting when he had given evidence to the Hutton Inquiry on 28 August 2003 was made by his Spokesman on 16 July 2004. [222] Private hearing, Part 1, pages 67-68.

578. Asked what conclusions he had drawn when reviewing the case in 2004, SIS3 replied:

> "Well, I think it illustrated, first of all, the dangers of a chain of sourcing …
>
> "The second point is that when you have senior people who reach down into the machinery and try moving the cogs, if I may put it like that … you obviously disenfranchise the operational chain of command. You cut out expertise, and perhaps you also disable that element of challenge which is, I think, a very important part of operational life in the Service.
> "The third point is there was a judgment … that we had overpromised and underdelivered. I absolutely agreed with that judgment. It's precisely what we did."[223]

579. Pressed to clarify to whom he was referring, SIS3 told the Inquiry he was reporting what people had said about Sir Richard Dearlove, and that it had been controversial at the time at an operational and working level where he thought "people were genuinely annoyed and concerned".[224]

580. Asked whether there were political pressures not to be as careful as SIS should have been over an unvalidated, untested source, SIS3 replied:

> "Well, it was obviously pressure – whether you describe it as political pressure or merely pressure from Assessments Staff – to have more material, in a sense responding to the tasking that we had received. Clearly when you are under a lot of pressure to produce intelligence, there is a risk that you will take short cuts."[225]

581. The information in the report issued on 11 September was very striking and further information confirming the material as the source promised would have been of great importance in providing proof that Iraq had chemical and biological programmes.

582. The way the report of 11 September was used to support critical judgements in the dossier without being subject to evaluation and challenge by the appropriate technical experts or properly assessed by the JIC is addressed in Section 4.2.

583. The judgements were then carried forward into assessments, briefings and public statements without those involved in providing advice to Ministers and senior officials or the recipients of that advice being aware of the doubts which had emerged within SIS about the sourcing chain at any point before the decision to take military action.

584. Sir Richard should have alerted the Chairman of the JIC and made sure that Mr Blair and Mr Straw were informed.

585. Given the controversy about the failure to find WMD and questions about whether the intelligence had been presented accurately after the conflict, Sir Richard Dearlove should have ensured that Ministers were aware of the position when he informed the Intelligence and Security Committee that the intelligence had been withdrawn.

Withdrawal of two other streams of SIS reporting

586. By the middle of 2004, serious doubts had emerged about two further streams of reporting which had informed pre-conflict assessments on:

- the production and possession of stocks of chemical and biological agents;
- the weaponisation and deployment of those agents;
- Iraq's intentions to use chemical and biological weapons; and
- Iraq's strategy of concealment and deception.

587. On 2 June 2004, SIS alerted the FCO and No.10 to concerns about the reporting from the chain responsible for the "45 minutes" report and a number of other reports including the one which had informed the 27 November 2002 Update.

588. The ISC Report published in September 2003 stated that Sir Richard Dearlove told the Committee that the sourcing for the SIS report of 30 August (the source for the reference in the September dossier to chemical and biological weapons being deployable within 45 minutes of an order to use them), was "reliable":

> "The senior military officer named and quoted in the report was in a position to comment on the deployment of chemical and biological weapons."[226]

589. SIS informed the FCO on 2 June 2004 that it had information casting doubt on the reliability of information from a sourcing chain which had provided intelligence before the conflict on Iraq's intentions and ability to use chemical or biological weapons.[227]

[227] Minute SIS to Kidd, 2 June 2004, 'Butler Review: Sourcing of 45 Minute Report' attaching SIS Paper, 2 June 2004, 'Speaking Note for C to Lord Butler […]'.

590. The draft speaking note for Sir Richard Dearlove explained that new information, obtained recently when SIS met the sub-source for the first time, cast doubt on the reliability of his intelligence, and that he had provided the report referred to in the 9 September 2002 JIC Assessment, that:

> "Intelligence also indicates that chemical and biological munitions could be with military units and ready for firing within 20-45 minutes."

591. There were also doubts about other reporting from the sub-source. SIS was pursuing its validation of the reports, but intended to inform Lord Butler of the issue before Sir Richard Dearlove gave further evidence to the Butler Review on 10 June.

592. When Mr Straw saw the papers he asked for them to be sent to Mr Blair "without delay", commenting that SIS's description of the new information as a "snag" was "a very major understatement", and that the information seemed "to drive a coach and horses through the veracity of the 45-minute claim".[228]

593. Sir Michael Jay, commented on the papers:

> "I am sure we must be open with Butler about this – and/wd have thought go into more details than proposed in [draft speaking note] …"[229]

594. An SIS internal minute records that Sir Nigel Sheinwald, who succeeded Sir David Manning as Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser and Head of OD Sec in August 2003, discussed developments with Mr Blair on 5 June.[230]

595. On 7 June, Sir Nigel wrote to Mr Straw's Private Office reporting that Mr Blair regarded the information "as a very serious development", and that he had "asked for a clear damage assessment".[231]

596. Mr Blair had also asked:

- how the overall intelligence picture would be affected;
- what was "the position regarding the other main sources on Iraqi WMD"; and
- "where do we stand in our assessment of the veracity of Curve Ball's material [the source for the majority of the reporting on mobile production facilities for biological agents]".

597. Mr Blair agreed that Sir Richard Dearlove should brief Lord Butler, and that that should take place before other witnesses gave evidence to Lord Butler (on 8 June).

598. SIS did not gain direct access to Curve Ball until early 2004.[232]

599. The US Commission on WMD reported that the CIA had doubts about Curve Ball from summer 2003:

> "Any remaining doubts, however, were removed when the CIA was finally given access to Curve Ball himself in March 2004. At that time, Curve Ball's inability to explain discrepancies in his reporting, his description of facilities and events, and his general demeanor led to the conclusion that his information was unreliable … Having concluded that Curve Ball had fabricated his reporting, CIA and Defense HUMINT recalled all of it."[233]

600. A senior SIS officer replied to the questions raised by Mr Blair on 10 June.[234] The senior SIS officer stated that, if intelligence from the sub-source were withdrawn, there was:

> "… still a body of intelligence which consistently indicated that Saddam was considering using CBW; that he would be prepared to use it against advancing allied forces; and that he considered possession of CBW vital to the long term survival of his regime."

601. The senior SIS officer also reported that:

- SIS had received a large amount of liaison reporting, "about deception of UNMOVIC and the concealment of CBW; and limited reporting on the military deployment of CBW".
- SIS was validating other sources.
- The CIA had already formally withdrawn some reporting from Curve Ball but SIS continued to judge that it was "premature to conclude … that all intelligence from the source must be discounted".

602. The senior SIS officer added that, as a result of its discussions with Curve Ball earlier in 2004, the "most likely function" of the trailers he had described was "to provide a breakout production capability and not the continual production of material for stockpiling".

603. Separately, Mr Tim Dowse, who succeeded Mr Miller as Chief of the Assessments Staff in November 2003, sent Sir Nigel Sheinwald an assessment of the impact of concerns about the reliability of the sourcing chain for the 45 minute report.[235] Mr Dowse stated that there were doubts about the sourcing chain which SIS was still investigating.

604. The sub-source for the 45 minute report had provided five reports which were drawn on in the JIC Assessments of 21 August, 9 September, 11 October, 6 December 2002 and 19 February 2003. In addition, he had provided the reporting for the JIC Update of 27 November.

605. Mr Dowse wrote that, while the intelligence was not "crucial to key judgements" in the JIC Assessments, it had:

> "… increased our confidence in judgements that Saddam possessed and was prepared to use chemical and biological weapons – but these also rested on other intelligence."

606. Reporting from the sub-source was crucial on "one detailed point", the statement in the 9 September Assessment that Iraq could deploy chemical and biological weapons within 45 minutes.

607. Mr Dowse added:

> "However, this would not have materially affected the key JIC judgements on Iraqi capabilities: it was seen simply as extra detail supporting the picture of the Iraqi command and control structure that we already had, based on other intelligence. The prominence this point has received in the media since the conflict was not how it was seen by the JIC at the time."

608. An internal SIS minute of 8 June also identified that the sub-source had provided a report in late 2002 that Iraq had an indigenous UAV programme capable of CBW delivery.[236]

609. Mr Dowse wrote to Sir Nigel Sheinwald again on 7 July, reporting that SIS had provided a more detailed summary of its work to validate the pre-conflict sources on Iraqi WMD, which was continuing.[237]

610. Mr Dowse concluded:

> "… we see no reason at present to revise JIC judgements on Iraqi WMD beyond the (objectively minor, but presentationally very awkward) point over the '45 minutes' claim …"

611. The Butler Report published on 14 July stated that serious doubts had emerged about the reliability of intelligence from three sources.

612. The Butler Report recorded that SIS had:

> "… provided a series of commentaries on the results of their post-war validation of the main sources of human intelligence … on Iraqi chemical and biological > weapons, their use and their concealment … [D]oubts – and in some cases serious doubts – have emerged about the reliability of intelligence from three sources whose intelligence helped to underpin JIC Assessments and the Government's dossier of September 2002."[238]

613. The withdrawal of intelligence in July 2003 from the source of the reports issued on 11 and 23 September 2002 is dealt with earlier in this Section.

614. The Butler Report stated that more than 80 percent of the human intelligence reports "which had had a material influence on JIC Assessments on Iraqi deception and concealment … came from two principal sources"; and that one of those sources produced two-thirds of the reports.[239] Because both sources were "believed at the time to be reporting reliably", there would have been "a tendency for the intelligence community to assume that they were similarly reporting reliably on Iraqi concealment and deception".

615. In a footnote, the Butler Report drew attention to the fact that, during SIS validation of its sources after the conflict, doubts had emerged about the reliability of reporting from the source providing the smaller proportion of the reports.

616. The Butler Report stated that two sources had produced "some two-thirds of all the intelligence reports" circulated in 2002. Those reports had "had a significant influence on intelligence assessments on Iraqi use of chemical and biological weapons":

- One of those sources "reported accurately and authoritatively on some key issues", but on the "production and stocks of chemical and biological weapons and agents, he could only report what he learned from others in his circle of high level contacts in Baghdad".
- In 2002, SIS issued a number of reports from the second source "quoting a new sub-source on Iraqi chemical and biological programmes and intentions". SIS considered the second source "to be an established and reliable source" whose "intelligence on other subjects had previously been corroborated". SIS had also included a caution about the sub-source's links to Iraqi opposition groups.[240]

617. The Butler Report stated that it had:

> "… been informed by SIS that the validity of the intelligence report on which the 45-minute claim was based has come into question. Post-war source validation by SIS … has thrown doubt on the reliability of one of the links in the reporting chain affecting this intelligence report."[241]

618. The third source about which doubts had arisen provided "the vast majority of the intelligence suggesting that Iraq had developed mobile facilities for the production of biological agent".[242] Sir Richard Dearlove told the Butler Review in May 2004 that these reports had "been received through a liaison service" and SIS:

"… had been able to verify that he had worked in an area which would have meant that he would have had access to the sort of information he claimed to have. But they had not been able to question him directly until after the war."

619. SIS told the Butler Review that, after their initial debrief of the source (Curve Ball):

- It had "become apparent that significant detail did not appear in the original liaison reports … But based on the information derived from the limited access to date we continue to judge that it is premature to conclude … that all the intelligence from the source must be discounted."
- SIS had concluded that the trailers described by the source as part of the mobile facilities would have produced agent in the form of a slurry, which would have a limited life, and, therefore, that the "most likely function … was to provide a breakout production capability and not the continued production of material for stockpiling".
- SIS was continuing to debrief the source.[243]

620. The Butler Report concluded that the reports received in 2000 from this source, suggesting that Iraq had recently produced biological agent were "seriously flawed"; and that the grounds for the JIC Assessments drawing on these reports (see Section 4.1) "no longer exist".[244]

621. The Butler Report stated that the source (Curve Ball) was "a refugee", and that his reporting had been:

"… treated with some caution by the JIC until it appeared to be confirmed by other human intelligence. The subsequent need to withdraw a key part of the reporting received through the liaison service arose as a result of misunderstandings, not because of the source's status."[245]

622. The Butler Report also stated:

- "We consider that it was reasonable for the JIC to include in its Assessments of March and September 2002 a reference to intelligence reports on Iraq's seeking mobile biological production facilities. But it has emerged that the intelligence from the source, if it had been correctly reported, would not have been consistent with a judgement that Iraq had, on the basis of recent production, stocks of biological agent. If SIS had had direct access to the source from 2000 onwards, and hence correct intelligence reporting, the main evidence for JIC judgements on Iraq's stocks of recently produced biological agent, as opposed to a break out capacity, would not have existed."[246]
- All JIC Assessments about the production of biological warfare agents were based on intelligence about mobile facilities.[247]

623. The Butler Report stated that reports from two further sources continued to be regarded as reliable, although it was "notable that their reports were less worrying than the rest about Iraqi chemical and biological weapons capability".[248]

624. The Butler Report also stated that it had subsequently emerged that one of the sources on which US assessments of Iraqi ownership of mobile biological agent production facilities, including Secretary Powell's presentation to the Security Council on 5 February 2003, had been based, a defector associated with the Iraqi National Congress, had already been retracted before the US National Intelligence Estimate was issued in October 2002.[249] That report was not relied on by the UK.

625. On 30 January 2004, Mr Scarlett informed Sir Nigel Sheinwald of US concern about a "Notification to Congress that one piece of intelligence underpinning" Secretary Powell's presentation to the UN on 5 February 2003 "came from an unreliable source".[250]

626. Mr Scarlett commented:

> "This discredited report was sent to SIS but not issued by them so it was not reflected in our classified assessments or in the dossier. There is one reference in the dossier (the Executive Summary) to mobile 'laboratories'. This was a general term to cover mobile facilities and was not meant to be distinct from 'production' units. In terms of any press lines it will be sufficient to say that the discredited report was not issued by SIS."

627. Reporting from the sourcing chain which had produced the "45 minutes" report was withdrawn on 28 September.

628. On 28 September, a senior SIS officer wrote to Mr Straw's Private Office formally withdrawing all the reporting from the sourcing chain that had produced the 45 minute report.[251] There were concerns that the source had coached the sub-source; that the sub-source had fabricated reports; and that the source might not have accurately reported the information from the sub-source.

629. The SIS officer stated that the assessment of the impact of withdrawing the reporting provided by Mr Dowse on 18 June still stood.

630. At the JIC meeting on 29 September, Mr Ehrman noted that SIS had circulated a letter withdrawing one of the lines of reporting on Iraq's WMD:

> "It would be drawn to … [Mr Straw's and Mr Blair's] attention. After the work of the ISG was concluded, and SIS had completed validation of the sources, it would be necessary to review the JIC Assessments circulated in the run-up to the Iraq war. The results would be discussed at a future JIC meeting."[252]

631. SIS formally withdrew the reporting from Curve Ball on 29 September 2004.

632. On 29 September, the same senior SIS officer wrote to Mr Straw's Private Office stating that SIS had concluded that all the reporting from Curve Ball should formally be withdrawn.[253] SIS and the DIS had reached a common position on the technical aspects of the reporting in May 2004, which had been submitted to the Butler Review. They continued to assess that the transportable production system described in the reporting was compatible with BW production.

633. The senior SIS officer also stated:

- It was now not clear whether Curve Ball had ever told the liaison service whose control he was under that he believed the system was BW-related.
- Substantial UK and ISG efforts to collect significant collateral to conclude that the system was BW-related had produced little that was concrete.
- There were "irreconcilable inconsistencies" in Curve Ball's claims for the production process which meant that, notwithstanding its scientific coherence, SIS "now have some doubts about the overall veracity" of the story.
- Curve Ball had been a very difficult defector to handle and access to Curve Ball had proved challenging.

[251] Minute [senior SIS officer] to [Private Secretary/FCO], 28 September 2004, 'Withdrawal of [name of source] CX'.
[252] Minutes, 29 September 2004, JIC meeting.
[253] Letter SIS to Private Secretary [FCO], 29 September 2004, 'CURVEBALL: Withdrawal of […] reporting'.

634. The senior SIS officer concluded that the reporting was:

> "… issued against a background of possible future military action in Iraq in which British Forces might participate. In these circumstances, and given [a liaison service's] assessment of his reliability, the technical credibility of his story and the previously expressed Iraqi interest in a mobile CW production capability, it would have been difficult not to treat seriously …"

635. Mr Ehrman wrote to the SIS senior officer on 1 October stating that, once the ISG had issued its report, he intended that the JIC "should conduct a comprehensive review of its past judgements".[254] He also asked SIS to confirm that there were no further questions about other sources.

636. Sir Nigel Sheinwald confirmed that Mr Blair had seen the senior SIS officer's "submissions of 28 and 29 September" and was "content with the proposal to withdraw the intelligence concerned".[255]

637. Following a conversation on 4 October, between Mr John Scarlett, who had succeeded Sir Richard Dearlove as Chief of SIS, and Mr Straw, Mr Scarlett's Private Secretary wrote to Mr Straw's Private Office about informing the ISC of the decision.[256] Mr Scarlett intended to write to the Chair of the ISC informing the Committee that the two streams of reporting had been withdrawn. If Mr Straw remained of the view that there was "an imperative to report the fact of the withdrawals now and in public", a Written Ministerial Statement could then, with the ISC Chair's agreement, refer to the SIS correspondence with the Committee in the context of Lord Butler's recommendations and the exceptional Parliamentary and public interest in the "45 minutes intelligence" in particular.

638. A draft Written Ministerial Statement was also provided for Mr Straw's consideration.

639. The withdrawal of intelligence was announced by Mr Straw on 12 October:

> "The House will recall that the Butler committee concluded … that the validity of the line of reporting that included the 45-minute intelligence had come into question. It further concluded that reporting received from a liaison service on Iraqi production of biological agent was 'seriously flawed'. The House will now wish to be aware that the Chief of the Secret Intelligence Service has written to … the Chairman of the Intelligence and Security Committee, formally withdrawing those two lines of reporting.

"But I do not accept, even with hindsight, that we were wrong to act as we did in the circumstances that we faced at the time. Even after reading all the evidence detailed by the Iraq Survey Group, it is still hard to believe that any regime could behave in so self-destructive a manner as to pretend that it had forbidden weaponry, when in fact it had not."[257]

JIC ASSESSMENT, 23 DECEMBER 2004: 'IRAQI WMD – A REVIEW OF JIC JUDGEMENTS MADE IN 2002'

640. At the request of the JIC, its Assessments of Iraqi WMD programmes in 2002 were reviewed in December 2004.[258]

641. The minutes of the JIC discussion on 22 December of the draft paper on WMD recorded that the points made included:

- The paper had been produced at the JIC's request and "reviewed the 2002 JIC judgements of Iraqi WMD programmes, capabilities and intentions, in the light of subsequent investigations, particularly the findings of the Iraq Survey Group".
- The JIC's 2002 judgements on ballistic missiles had been "partially substantiated". Iraq "had developed missiles that exceeded the legal range of 150km, and had designs for missiles with ranges up to 1000km. The paper should not be so definitive in its conclusions. While our knowledge had been considerably enhanced, the ISG itself acknowledged that more information may yet come to light, and the picture was still incomplete".
- The box on the intelligence base in the Assessment "should highlight the limited, fragmentary nature of the intelligence, and the fact that much of the CBW reporting had been withdrawn. But the paper should also point out that many of the JIC's judgements were informed by UNSCOM reporting, and even without the withdrawn intelligence, would have remained reasonable judgements based on what we knew at the time".
- The JIC "would discuss lessons learned as part of following up the Butler Review recommendations".[259]

642. The Assessment, issued on 23 December, made clear that it was not examining the process through which assessments and judgements were made or attempting to analyse the findings of the ISG in detail.[260] The ISG findings provided "a baseline against which to compare the pre-conflict JIC Assessments". The ISG had "considerably enhanced" the UK's knowledge, but it had "acknowledged" that its findings were "by no means definitive and new information may yet come to light".

[259] Minutes, 22 December 2004, JIC meeting.
[260] JIC Assessment, 23 December 2004, 'Iraqi WMD: Review of Judgements made in 2002'.

643. The Assessment stated:

"The ISG judged that Saddam wanted to recreate Iraq's WMD capability, but only after sanctions were removed and the economy had stabilised. He aspired to develop a nuclear capability in an incremental fashion, and intended to focus on ballistic missile and tactical warfare capabilities. The ISG found that Iran was the prime motivator for this policy, with a secondary requirement to balance Israel and have influence in the Arab world."

644. Against that background, and validation work on the intelligence on which its judgements had been based, the JIC reviewed its 2002 Assessments of Iraq's activities:

"Iraq is pursuing a nuclear weapons programme. But it will not be able to indigenously produce a nuclear weapon while sanctions remain in place, unless suitable fissile material is purchased from abroad" (CIG Assessment, 15 March 2002).

- The judgement "was wrong in that Iraq was not pursuing a nuclear weapons programme, but correct on Iraq's nuclear ambitions and its inability to produce a nuclear weapon under sanctions".
- "The ISG found no indigenous nuclear production capability or a reconstitution of effort to produce nuclear weapons."
- "It did find evidence of efforts to preserve nuclear related intellectual capabilities post 1991, with the probable intention of restarting a nuclear programme once sanctions ended …"
- "Intelligence dated June 2002 identified Iraqi interest in seeking uranium ore from Niger. The ISG has contested this, but it has not been possible for the UK to share the relevant intelligence […] This intelligence stands."

"Iraq retains up to 20 Al Hussein ballistic missiles" (CIG Assessment, 15 March 2002).

- The judgement had "not been substantiated".
- "The ISG judges that Iraq probably did not retain any SCUD-variant missiles after 1991 …"

"Iraq has begun development of medium range ballistic missiles over 1000km" (CIG Assessment, 15 March 2002).

- The judgement "had been partly substantiated: the ISG found that Iraq had authorised its scientists to develop missiles with ranges in excess of … 150km … and had designs for missiles with ranges up to 1000km".

"Iraq may retain some stocks of chemical agents … Iraq could produce significant quantities of mustard within weeks, significant quantities of sarin and VX within months, and in the case of VX may already have done so" (CIG Assessment, 15 March 2002).

- "Although a capability to produce some agents probably existed, this judgement has not been substantiated."
- "The ISG judged that by 2003 Iraq probably had a capability to produce large quantities of mustard within three to six months. Saddam never abandoned his intention to resume a CW effort."
- "… [T]he Iraqi Intelligence Service (IIS) may have maintained covert laboratories … though this probably reflected requirements for small-scale operations by intelligence services and special forces, particularly for use against internal dissent."
- "The ISG judged that Iraq unilaterally destroyed its undeclared CW stockpile in 1991, although a small number of weapons either escaped destruction or suffered only partial damage."

"Iraq currently has available, either from pre-Gulf war stocks, or more recent production, a number of biological agents … Iraq could produce more of these biological agents within days" (CIG Assessment, 15 March 2002).

- "The ISG found no direct evidence of a BW programme after 1996. It concluded, however, that Saddam probably intended to resume a BW programme if the opportunity arose."
- "The ISG found that Iraq had dual-use facilities which could have allowed BW production to resume, but not within the timeframe judged by the JIC, and found no evidence that production had been activated."
- The "judgements on Iraq's ability to produce biological agent within days were based on reporting of a TPS [transportable production system] which has been subsequently withdrawn, and evidence (largely imagery) of the refurbishment of a facility involved in BW research and production before the first Gulf war. While acknowledging the possibility that a TPS capability did exist, the ISG uncovered no evidence of such systems."
- "… the IIS may have had a series of small laboratories conducting small scale BW work … The ISG was not able to establish the full scope and nature of the laboratory work."

"Recent intelligence indicates that production of chemical and biological weapons is taking place" (JIC Assessment, 9 September 2002).

- "The ISG found that, while there were no credible indications that Baghdad resumed production of chemical munitions post-1991, Iraq did conserve intellectual CW capability, and enhanced its chemical infrastructure in the mid-1990s."

- The reporting on which the assessment was based had "not been subsequently substantiated by the ISG".

"Intelligence [also] indicates that chemical and biological munitions could be with military units and ready for firing within 20-45 minutes" (JIC Assessment, 9 September 2002).

- The reporting had been withdrawn.

"Iraq has a chemical and biological weapons capability and Saddam is prepared to use it" (JIC Assessment, 9 September 2002).

"Saddam has already taken the decision that all resources, including CBW, be used to defend the regime from attack. One report states that Saddam would not use CBW during the initial phase of any military campaign, but would use CBW once a ground invasion of Iraq has begun" (paragraph 4, JIC Assessment, 9 September 2002).

"Intelligence indicates that Saddam has identified Bahrain, Jordan, Qatar, Israel and Kuwait as targets" (paragraph 6, JIC Assessment, 9 September 2002).

- The reporting specifically referred to in paragraph 4 had been withdrawn; as had the report on which paragraph 6 was based. "However, other intelligence on Iraqi CBW programmes and activities, and on Israel and Kuwait as possible targets, supported the Key Judgement and elements of the detail quoted."
- The ISG findings did "not support the JIC judgement that Saddam would use all resources, including CBW".

"Saddam … might use CBW … against coalition forces, neighbouring states and his own people. Israel could be his first target" (JIC Assessment, 6 December 2002).

- Based on Iraq's actions pre-1991 and during the first Gulf Conflict, the judgement would have remained a reasonable one although reporting which had been used in compiling the Assessment had subsequently been withdrawn.
- An Assessments Staff Intelligence Update on 27 November 2002 referred to recent intelligence that Saddam Hussein had reiterated his intention to use CBW to defend his regime "if allied forces approached Baghdad, if Basra, Kirkuk or Mosul fell to Allied control, or if Iraqi units rebelled". He "would wait and see how neighbouring countries reacted to an allied attack, and whether they allowed their territory to be used by Allied forces, before deciding whether to use CBW against them". His initial targets would be "Israel, Kuwait and Jordan". That reporting was withdrawn.

645. The Assessment stated:

> "The JIC's judgements on Iraq's production, retention and the availability of chemical and biological agents in 2002/3 cannot currently be substantiated."

JIC DISCUSSION, 9 FEBRUARY 2006

646. In an "open discussion" of the lessons learned on Iraq in the JIC on 9 February 2006, the minutes record that the following points were made:

> "i. the more important a subject became, the more rigorously checks and balances needed to be applied to JIC product;
> ii. peer review of work was vital for some, but not all Assessments. This was particularly so when, in fast changing situations, the JIC was subject to an upward pressure of increased intelligence flow and a downward pressure of demand from senior readers; and
> iii. it was vital that the knowledge base within the Assessments Staff was not allowed to atrophy in lower priority subject areas …"[261]

Reliability of intelligence

647. Iraq was undoubtedly a difficult intelligence target and the UK had no sources of human intelligence with reliable first-hand knowledge of Iraq's WMD capabilities or Saddam Hussein's intentions.

648. The ISC stated that Iraq was a hard target but SIS "successfully ran a number of agents against Iraq and Saddam's regime" who "provided intelligence over a wide range of topics, although the SIS acknowledged that coverage on some subjects was stronger than on others".[262]

649. The ISC described the SIS process of issuing intelligence reports in the following terms:

> "The SIS collects human intelligence (HUMINT) when agents, who can also be known as sources, report back to their case officer. Sources either operate on their own or quote a sub-source, who may be quoting another sub-source of their own. After a meeting or communication between agent and [SIS] case officer, the information is checked by the SIS who, after consulting experts as necessary, issue an intelligence report. This report contains the information provided by the agent (who by definition is the single source for the information) and an assessment of the reliability of the agent and any sub-sources, as appropriate, together with SIS comments. The SIS comments will refer the reader of the report to any other intelligence that either confirms or conflicts with the information provided by the agent and will put the report in context where required. This is to ensure that the reader is able to make the best judgement on the veracity of the intelligence."[263]

650. Addressing comments "about the unreliability of 'single-source reporting'", the ISC added:

"Some … intelligence that agents produce cannot be verified or corroborated by intelligence from other sources. The professional judgement of the agent's reliability is based on all that is known about the agent and their circumstances, including the reliability of information that can be verified. It is possible to recruit a reliable agent with exceptional access to high-grade intelligence. Examples … are amongst the most valuable agents that the UK has ever had. Each was the origin of 'single-source' reporting from SIS. For much of the reporting there was no collateral from other sources."[264]

651. The Butler Report stated:

"Validation of human intelligence sources after the war has thrown doubt on a high proportion of those sources and of their reports, and hence on the quality of the intelligence assessments received by Ministers and officials in the period from summer 2002 to the outbreak of hostilities. Of the main human intelligence sources described above:

- One SIS main source reported authoritatively on some issues, but on others was passing on what he had heard within his circle.
- Reporting from a sub-source to a second SIS main source that was important to JIC assessments on Iraqi possession of chemical and biological weapons must be open to doubt.
- Reports from a third SIS main source have been withdrawn as unreliable.
- Reports from two further SIS main sources continue to be regarded as reliable, although it is notable that their reports were less worrying than the rest about Iraqi chemical and biological weapons capabilities.
- Reports received from a liaison service on Iraqi production of biological agent were seriously flawed, so that the grounds for JIC assessments drawing on those reports that Iraq had recently-produced stocks of biological agent no longer exist."[265]

[265] Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction ["The Butler Report"], 14 July 2004, HC 898, paragraph 436.

652. In its consideration of the reasons why "such a high proportion of the human intelligence reports should have been withdrawn or subsequently be subject to doubt", the Report's conclusions included:

> "… the length of the reporting chains. Even when there were sources who were shown to be reliable in some areas of reporting … in other areas … where they did not have direct knowledge [they had] to draw on sub-sources or sub-sub-sources. This was the case with the first of the two dominant sources [in the previous paragraph].
> "… agents who were known to be reliable were asked to report on issues going well beyond their usual territory, leading to intelligence reports which were more speculative than they would have provided on their own specialisms. We believe this to have been the case with some aspects of the reporting of the second of the two dominant sources.
> "… because of the scarcity of sources and the urgent requirement for intelligence, more credence was given to untried agents than would normally be the case. This was the case with the report received between the JIC assessment of 9 September 2002 and the publication of the Government's dossier in September 2002."[266]

653. Asked about the difficulty of obtaining intelligence on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction programmes and capabilities, Sir John Scarlett told the Inquiry:

> "… when we are talking about the nuclear or chemical or biological or missile programmes, we are talking about the most secret parts of what is already a highly secretive state. We are talking about secret parts which are highly compartmented. So you might achieve access to somebody who knows a lot about a particular … programme, but by definition they are not going to have a broader picture.
> "So you need a lot of such sources at a ground level to really get detailed information about the programme. And, of course, with WMD you have … dual-use, where it is very difficult to interpret any information or intelligence that you acquire as to whether it is relevant to the programmes …"[267]

654. Asked about intelligence on the thinking of the leadership and military commanders, Sir John stated:

> "They were both very difficult … [W]e did have … some insight, we believed into the thinking of the leadership and the work done subsequently in Iraq after the conflict by the Iraq Survey Group would suggest that some of those insights were not far off reality.

[267] Public hearing, 8 December 2009, page 31.

> "The problem was … that … this was a highly autocratic state, where almost everybody revolved around the person, the thinking the behaviour and whims of the leader. So it was what was going on in his mind which was critical, and that was very difficult to fathom. And by his [Saddam Hussein's] nature such a society generates, deliberately or not, obfuscation and uncertainty. Nobody quite knows what about what. There is a great deal of uncertainty of knowledge.
>
> "So an individual, maybe a very senior military or civilian commander who you would normally expect to have quite a confident view of a particular issue or capability … might not … might say … I don't know about this, but … a friend who does … tells me … and you wouldn't really know whether that was true or not."[268]

655. Sir John subsequently told the Inquiry:

> "… taken overall, I think as of mid-March 2003 … I think we said five lines [of HUMINT] by that stage … [T]hat was a general statement which we were given by the agency [SIS]. It wasn't something that reflected research and real knowledge on our part."[269]

656. SIS1 told the Inquiry:

> "I think there was a sense in Iraq where the leader wished to convey to a fearful regime and the people that he was powerful, that he had things up his sleeve, and that those who were responsible for various programmes wanted to convince the leader that work was continuing and that there were capabilities. It was not a well organised place. It was extremely repressive.
>
> "And it was corrupt. So people told people up and down what they wanted to hear, and things which suited their ends."[270]

657. The Inquiry asked SIS1 whether SIS sources and Iraqis in direct contact, for example, with the UN and Sir Jeremy Greenstock, who were saying, "we don't have anything", were telling the truth as they knew it then, or whether he thought some of them did suspect they had something but that was the party line. SIS1 replied:

> "Many of them believed they had it, and in a way that was part of the picture that we were getting […].[271]

658. Asked whether he thought there were any lessons, SIS1 observed, "we based a lot on not enough".[272]

659. In response to a question about the extent to which SIS had been obliged to rely on sources who were not WMD experts and the implications of that position, SIS4 confirmed SIS did not generally have agents with first-hand, inside knowledge of Iraq's nuclear, chemical, biological or ballistic missile programmes.[273]

660. Sir David Omand told the Inquiry:

> "I think there were certainly people in the intelligence community, and there are still some, who believe that something will turn up in Syria, and I am certainly not going to break my own rules and say categorically that won't happen. We could all still be surprised. But there was a sense in which, because of past successes – very, very considerable successes supporting this Government, that SIS overpromised and underdelivered, and when that became clear that the intelligence was very hard to find … they really were having to bust a gut to generate the intelligence.
> "I think the Butler Committee really uncovered that the trade craft at that point wasn't as good as it should have been for validation … that's one of the background reasons why people were very unwilling to actually conclude: no … we may have miscalculated, or misassessed this."[274]

A LESSON LEARNED?

661. As the current version of National Intelligence Machinery explains, JIC Assessments put intelligence in the context of wider knowledge available and past judgements and historic evidence.[275] They also need to try to understand, drawing on all sources at their disposal, the motivations and thinking of the intelligence targets and sources.

662. Reflecting the findings and recommendations of the Butler Review in relation to the nature of intelligence and the way in which it was used before the conflict in 2003, the document also states:

> "Intelligence … may by its nature be fragmentary or incomplete. It needs to be analysed in order to identify significant facts, and then evaluated in respect of the reliability of the information in order to allow a judgement to be made about the weight to be given to it before circulation either as single source reports or collated and integrated with other material as assessments.
> "SIS and GCHQ evaluate and circulate mainly single source intelligence. The Security Service also circulates single source intelligence although its primary product is assessed intelligence. Defence Intelligence produces mainly assessed reports on an all-source basis …

[274] Public hearing, 20 January 2010, pages 63-64.
[275] Cabinet Office, 19 November 2010, National Intelligence Machinery, page 24.

> "Assessment should put intelligence into a sensible real-world context and identify elements that can inform policy-making. Evaluation, analysis and assessment thus transform the raw material of intelligence so that it can be assimilated in the same way as other information provided to decision-makers at all levels of Government."[276]

663. The Cabinet Office document also states:

> "Intelligence collected by the three [intelligence] Agencies is passed directly in the form of reports to customer departments in Government, where it informs and assists decision-making. It contributes with other sources of information to threat assessment work and other longer-term analysis and assessment. Intelligence reporting from the Agencies is also used to support field operations by the Armed Forces and the law enforcement agencies."
>
> "You can't take good decisions unless you have good information and can separate facts from opinion and speculation."[277]

Conclusions

664. The core construct that Saddam Hussein's regime retained chemical and biological warfare capabilities, was determined to preserve and if possible enhance its capabilities, including at some point in the future a nuclear capability, and was pursuing an active policy of deception and concealment, underpinned the UK Government position that Iraq was a threat that had to be dealt with and it needed to disarm or be disarmed.

665. That remained the case up to and beyond the decision to invade Iraq in March 2003.

666. As the Report of the Review of Intelligence on Weapons of Mass Destruction (the Butler Report) stated:

> "Intelligence on Iraqi nuclear, biological, chemical and nuclear programmes was used in support of the execution of … [Government] policy on Iraq for three main purposes:
> - To inform planning for a military campaign if that should be necessary, in particular in relation to unconventional weapons, for providing the necessary safeguards for coalition troops, diplomatic personnel and others; and for targeting.
> - To inform domestic and international opinion of the UK's assessment of Iraq's holdings, programmes and intentions, in support of the Government's advocacy of its changing policy towards Iraq.

- To obtain and provide information to United Nations inspectors about the likely locations of weapons and programmes which contravened the terms of United Nations Security Council resolutions."[278]

667. From October 2002 onwards, the JIC focused on two main themes:

- Iraq's attitude to the return of the inspectors and, from 8 November, its compliance with the specific obligations imposed by resolution 1441.
- Iraq's options, diplomatic and military, including the possible use of chemical and biological weapons and ballistic missiles against Coalition Forces or countries in the region in either pre-emptive attacks or in response to a military attack.

668. The way in which the assessments and intelligence on Iraq's WMD were used in pursuit of the UK's strategy towards Iraq is considered in Section 3.

669. In its Assessment of 18 December, the JIC made the judgements in the UK Government September dossier part of the test for Iraq.

670. The judgements about Iraq's capabilities and intentions relied heavily on Iraq's past behaviour being a reliable indicator of its current and future actions.

671. There was no consideration of whether, faced with the prospect of a US-led invasion, Saddam Hussein had taken a different position.

672. Mr Scarlett wrote on 30 January 2003 that Saddam Hussein had "followed essentially the same strategy and tactics as during the 1990s".[279]

673. Mr Scarlett told No.10 on 17 March that the JIC was clear that Iraq possessed chemical and biological weapons, the means to deliver them, and the capacity to produce them.[280] He stated that the starting point for those judgements was the "knowledge of Iraq's past WMD programmes" which demonstrated "not only large-scale possession of these weapons, and the readiness to use them, but also Saddam's determination to retain WMD".

674. The absence of evidence of proscribed programmes and materials relating to the production or delivery of chemical, biological or nuclear weapons was attributed to Iraq's ability to conceal its activities and deceive the inspectors and the difficulties which it had been anticipated the inspectors would encounter.

[280] Minute Scarlett to Manning, 17 March 2003, 'Iraqi WMD: Evidence of Possession'.

675. Many of Iraq's perceived capabilities, such as relatively small, transportable or mobile facilities to produce chemical and biological agents or documentation left over from past programmes, were seen as likely to be difficult to find in a country the size of Iraq.

676. The JIC Assessment of 11 October 2002 stated that a good intelligence flow from inside Iraq, supporting tougher inspections, would be "central to success".[281]

677. On 30 January 2003, Mr Scarlett wrote that it was odd that the Iraqi regime did not appear "to be worried about the obvious risk of leaks from the thousands of people aware of this concealment activity".[282] Mr Scarlett attributed that success to the "brutal discipline" of the regime.

678. Mr Scarlett stated that he continued:

> "… to be struck by the regime's ability to conduct complex surveillance and deception operations without unforced errors or major slip ups. Co-ordinating the dispersal of materials and associated documentation around the country and fielding surprise UNMOVIC and IAEA visits to hundreds of sites in a few weeks is a complex undertaking and evidence of the regime's continuing grip on the population at least of central Iraq."

679. A key element of the Assessments was the reporting and intelligence on Iraq's intentions to conceal its activities, deceive the inspectors and obstruct the conduct of inspections, particularly Iraq's attitudes to preventing interviews with officials who were identified as associated with its proscribed programmes or who had been involved in Iraq's unilateral destruction of its weapons and facilities.

680. The large number of intelligence reports about Iraq's activities were interpreted from the perspective that Iraq's objectives were to conceal its programmes.

681. For instance, reporting in late November 2002 that Saddam Hussein was confident that inspectors would not find anything was interpreted as confidence that Iraq's policy of concealment would work, not as an indication that there was nothing to find.

682. In his minute to Sir David Manning of 17 March 2003, Mr Scarlett described UNMOVIC's failure to uncover significant chemical and biological weapons as "disappointing", but "not wholly unexpected".[283]

[281] JIC Assessment, 11 October 2002, 'Iraq: The Return of UN Inspectors'.
[282] Minute Scarlett to Manning, 30 January 2003, 'Iraq: JIC Assessment and Personal Observations'.
[283] Minute Scarlett to Manning, 17 March 2003, 'Iraqi WMD: Evidence of Possession'.

683. Intelligence of 17 March 2003, that Saddam Hussein had not asked about chemical weapons or ordered their reassembly, was viewed in the context of a policy of concealment and the absence of chemical warheads for missiles rather than as an absence of the capability.

684. Similarly, Iraq's actions were consistently interpreted as indicative of deceit.

685. The ability to interview scientists and engineers involved in past programmes or involved in Iraq's unilateral destruction of weapons and materials was increasingly seen as the key to identifying Iraq's deception and the litmus test for Iraqi co-operation.

686. As Mr Straw told the FAC on 4 March 2003, interviews would "expose the regime's deception and its stockpile of weapons".[284]

687. The Government's focus on this issue intensified in early 2003 with the failure to find evidence of Iraqi chemical, biological and nuclear programmes.

688. The decision to include provision for interviews inside and outside Iraq in resolution 1441 (2002), and the subsequent discussion about the conduct of such interviews, are described in Sections 3.5 to 3.8. These Sections show the UK recognised that a policy of interviews outside Iraq would be difficult to implement.

689. Dr Blix had initially expressed reservations about interviewing Iraqi personnel outside Iraq but on 7 March he told the Security Council that he would be requesting such interviews "shortly".

690. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that Saddam Hussein:

> "… was deliberately concealing documentation, and … he was deliberately not allowing people to be interviewed properly.
>
> "In December 2002 … we received information, and this information remains valid, that Saddam called together his key people and said that anybody who agreed to an interview outside of Iraq was to be treated a spy."[285]

691. Mr Blair added:

> "… the reason for that is very simple, and it emerges from the Iraq Survey Group report. He retained full intent to restart his programme, and, therefore, it was very important for him that interviews did not take place, because the interviews with senior regime members were precisely what would have indicated the concealment and the intent."[286]

692. There were, of course, other reasons why an insecure regime, convinced that past inspections had been used for espionage and facing military attack, would want to limit the conversations key personnel were having with foreigners while military action was threatened.

693. Asked whether the intelligence on Saddam Hussein's strategy for dealing with inspections reinforced the view that there really was something to hide, SIS1 told the Inquiry:

> "I think they looked guilty as hell. In a way it's a sort of spectacular miscalculation, and I think it's partly because of their paranoia about being open to hostile scrutiny, and partly because they had stuff to hide, but not necessarily what the inspectors were looking for. From military secrets to, as I mentioned before, embargo breaking, but on things that would not have been prohibited as part of the programmes.
> "So there was quite a lot of evidence of the unco-operative and mule-headed and crude efforts to make the inspectors' life more difficult. Demonstrations, car crash, you know, traffic problems and heavy surveillance.
>
> "Yes, and it seemed to form part of a consistent picture, allowing for the fact that there was a certain assumption in the first place about what that picture was."[287]

694. From early 2003, the Government drew heavily on the intelligence reporting of Iraq's activities to deceive and obstruct the inspectors to illustrate its conclusion that Iraq had no intention of complying with the obligations imposed in resolution 1441.

695. The Government also emphasised the reliability of the reporting.

696. The briefing provided by SIS1 for Mr Blair to use in his interview on BBC's Breakfast with Frost programme on 26 January was one instance. Much of the same material was used in the No.10 dossier published on 3 February.

697. Mr Straw set out similar arguments in his statement to the FAC on 4 March in which he referred to an "elaborate screen of concealment based on intimidation and deception".

698. In conversations with key allies and public statements by both Ministers and senior officials, including Sir Jeremy Greenstock's presentations to the Security Council in February and March 2003 and the visit by Sir David Manning and Mr Scarlett to Mexico and Chile which are described briefly in this Section, the UK emphasised that its intelligence on Iraq's capabilities and intentions was reliable and well sourced.

[287] Private hearing, 2010, page 56.

699. The Butler Report stated:

> "… there was throughout this period a substantial volume of intelligence reports on Iraqi deceptions and concealment activities, coupled with – as UNMOVIC reported – a lack of active co-operation with the inspectors. There were also the UNMOVIC discoveries … Even so, we are surprised that neither policy-makers nor the intelligence community … conducted a formal re-evaluation of the quality of the intelligence and hence of the assessments made on it. We have noted in departmental papers expressions of concern about the impact on public and international opinion of the lack of strong evidence of Iraqi violation of its disarmament obligations. But those involved seem to have operated on the presumption that the intelligence was right, and that it was because of the combination of Iraqi concealment and deception activities and perceived UNMOVIC weaknesses that such evidence was not found."[288]

700. In his minute of 11 February issuing guidance on the use of intelligence in CIC products, Sir David Omand pointed out that "the reputation of the intelligence community" was "at risk" whenever intelligence material and judgements were "attributed to the Government".[289]

701. The reputation of the Government was equally at risk whenever it used material from the intelligence community as evidence in support of its policy.

702. The JIC's judgement from August 2002 until 19 March 2003 remained that Iraq might use chemical and biological weapons in response to a military attack.

703. Despite the lack of firm intelligence about Iraqi plans, the JIC continued to judge that Iraq might use chemical and biological weapons. The JIC did not, however, address the tension between that judgement and its judgement that Saddam Hussein's primary objective was the survival of his regime.

704. In addition, although the quantity of chemical and biological weapons and material which was unaccounted for, or could have been produced, since 1998 was significant, it was much less than Iraq had possessed in 1991 and would have been of limited utility on the battlefield against the Coalition, as the evidence on military planning set out in Sections 6.1 to 6.3 demonstrates.

705. Iraq's ability to use chemical or biological weapons to pose a threat to countries in the region would have depended on having an effective means of delivery, which was questionable.

[289] Minute Omand to Campbell, 11 February 2003, 'The Use of Intelligence in CIC Products'.

706. The JIC Assessment of 19 March 2003 recognised that Iraq's ability to use chemical or biological weapons was likely to be limited.

707. Iraq's statements that it had no weapons or programmes were dismissed as further evidence of a strategy of denial.

708. In addition, the extent to which the JIC's judgements depended on inference and interpretation of Iraq's previous attitudes and behaviour was not recognised.

709. At no stage was the hypothesis that Iraq might not have chemical, biological or nuclear weapons or programmes identified and examined by either the JIC or the policy community.

710. After its 9 September 2002 Assessment, the JIC was not asked to review its judgements on Iraq's capabilities and programmes which underpinned UK thinking. Nor did the JIC itself suggest such a review.

711. As a result there was no formal reassessment of the JIC judgements, and the 9 September Assessment and the 24 September dossier provided part of the baseline for the UK Government's view of Iraq's capabilities and intentions on its chemical, biological, nuclear and ballistic missile programmes.

712. The inspections revealed in early 2003 that Iraq had undoubtedly been pursuing a range of proscribed activities which it was keen to conceal, including enhancements to its ballistic missile capabilities and procurement or attempted procurement of dual-use items that could have had a use in the production of chemical and biological agents. It also wanted to preserve its conventional capabilities.

713. But the inspectors were also reporting that they had not found any evidence of current chemical, biological or nuclear weapons programmes in Iraq.

714. Dr Blix reminded Mr Blair on 6 February that UNSCOM had said material was unaccounted for, not that it was present in Iraq. He made the same point in his report to the Security Council on 14 February, adding that if the material did not exist, "credible evidence to that effect" was needed.

715. The dismissal of Iraq's persistent denials that it had retained weapons of mass destruction has to be considered in the context that past Iraqi statements had often been shown to be untrue. The evidence of other proscribed activities may have served to reinforce confidence in the intelligence and in UK assessments about Iraq's other activities.

716. Given the weight which rested on the JIC's judgements about Iraq's possession of WMD and its future intent for the decision in March that military action should, if necessary, be taken to disarm Iraq, a formal reassessment of the JIC's judgements should have taken place.

717. This might have been prompted by Dr Blix's report to the Security Council on 14 February 2003, which demonstrated the developing divergence between the assessments presented by the US and the UK. Dr Blix's report of 7 March, which challenged the view that Iraqi behaviour was preventing UNMOVIC from carrying out its tasks, should certainly have prompted a review.

718. Mr Scarlett and Sir David Manning discussed the JIC's priorities and the need to retest the standing judgements on 3 January 2003.[290] They did not include Iraq's WMD programmes and its intentions to use WMD.

719. Sir David Manning rightly sought advice on the strength of the evidence showing Saddam Hussein's possession of WMD, to which Mr Scarlett responded on 17 March.

720. But as the Butler Report stated, after the JIC's initial assessment of Iraq's declaration on 18 December:

> "Thereafter, despite its importance to the determination of whether Iraq was in further material breach of its disarmament obligations … the JIC made no further assessment."[291]

721. The Butler Report added:

> "The JIC's attitude will have been shaped by intelligence received in late-November that Iraq's declaration would omit references to its prohibited programmes and more generally would seek to overload the United Nations with information. Predictions on the extreme length and nature of the declaration were subsequently borne out. Even so, we find it odd that … the JIC produced no further assessment."[292]

722. Mr Tim Dowse, Head of the FCO Non-Proliferation Department, from January 2001 to November 2003, told the Inquiry:

> "… from the end of 2002 … almost up until the invasion, we were getting a fairly steady stream of quite sort of low level intelligence, operational reports, reports coming from military sources … about Iraqi concealment activities … which … had we subjected them to the JIC analytical process might have been regarded as not very strong. Collectively … every few days getting more of this rather confirmed us in our view that, if the inspections could be pursued with a little more vigour, a little more skill, that things were there and could be found."[293]

[293] Public hearing, 25 November 2009, pages 94-95.

723. Asked whether there had been a challenge to the intelligence and if he was absolutely sure that there was not another way of explaining the material, Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

> "When you are Prime Minister and the JIC is giving this information, you have got to rely on the people doing it, with experience and with commitment and integrity, as they do. Of course, now, with the benefit of hindsight, we look back on the situation differently."[294]

724. Responding to a question about why there might have been an unwillingness to conclude the intelligence had been misassessed, Sir John Scarlett told the Inquiry:

> "I think … the situation in January and February 2003, when UNMOVIC were not finding things, and so the reaction might have been: well, why is that? But the reaction was: well it's there. This just goes to show that UNMOVIC aren't much use and we will find it."[295]

725. Mr Miller acknowledged that the 18 December 2002 Assessment of the Iraqi declaration was "rooted in the intelligence view about the extent of his possession and continuing programme".[296] If the Assessments Staff had known then what they knew about the reliability of the intelligence reporting in July 2004, Mr Miller thought "there would still have been some serious reservations … but that they would have been less pronounced than they were at the time."

726. Sir John Scarlett took a more cautious view, pointing out the nature of the requirements on Iraq and its failure to address in the declaration that it had unilaterally destroyed its agent stockpile in 1991 without telling anyone or that it had destroyed the Al Hussein missiles in 1992. They had also said nothing about the work on missiles:

> "So there would have been a whole series of points where the declaration would have been found to be … not conforming with resolution 1441."[297]

727. Sir John told the Inquiry that his:

> "… own mindset … up until early March at least, was that intelligence was being borne out by what was being found by UNMOVIC. My state of mind wasn't: oh gosh, UNMOVIC aren't finding things, therefore there's something big that is wrong.
>
> "Now, if we had continued and had more time, and this hadn't all come to an end in the middle of March, of course that would have changed."[298]

[297] Private hearing, 5 May 2010, pages 37-38.
[298] Private hearing, 5 May 2010, page 39.

728. Mr Miller added:

> "… there was a flow of intelligence to the inspectors which in some cases … led to discoveries … and in cases where it didn't, it simply wasn't possible for us to reach a firm view on whether the deficiency was in the intelligence or in the ability to move fast enough in Iraq to have uncovered what was said to have been concealed."[299]

729. The problems were not confined to the UK. The US Senate Select Committee on Intelligence report on the U.S. Intelligence Community's Prewar Intelligence Assessments on Iraq, published on 9 July 2004, concluded:

> "The intelligence community suffered from a collective presumption that Iraq had an active and growing WMD program. This "group think" led intelligence community analysts, collectors and managers to both interpret ambiguous evidence as conclusively indicative of a WMD program and to ignore or minimise evidence that Iraq did not have active and expanding weapons of mass destruction programs. This presumption was so strong that formal mechanisms established to challenge assumptions and group think were not used."[300]

730. In the context of the lessons from the preparation of the September 2002 dossier, the Inquiry identified in Section 4.2 the benefits of separating the responsibility for assessment of intelligence from the responsibility for setting out the arguments in support of a policy.

731. The evidence in this Section reinforces that lesson. It shows that the intelligence and assessments made by the JIC about Iraq's capabilities and intent continued to be used to prepare briefing material to support Government statements in a way which conveyed certainty without acknowledging the limitations of the intelligence.

732. In the context of its examination of the role of the JIC in the preparation of the September 2002 dossier, the Butler Review commented:

> "The JIC, with commendable motives, took responsibility for the dossier in order that its content should properly reflect the judgements of the intelligence community. They did their utmost to ensure that this standard was met. But this will have put a strain on them in seeking to maintain their normal standards of neutral and objective assessment. Intelligence assessment is necessarily based heavily on judgement, relying on such material as intelligence has provided. It is not simply a matter of reporting this material but of presenting the judgements which flow from it to an experienced readership. Explaining those judgements to a wider public audience is a very different and difficult presentational task."[301]

733. The Inquiry asked Sir David Omand whether the involvement of Mr Scarlett and Sir Richard Dearlove, as part of Mr Blair's circle of close advisers, had risked breaching the distinction between provision of intelligence and the formulation of policy, and whether they had become too involved in the making and selling of policy.

734. Sir David Omand told the Inquiry that the "golden rule" for the Chairman of the Joint Intelligence Committee should be that: "he would deliver the views of the Joint Intelligence Committee, he would never venture a view on the policy even if asked".[302]

735. Asked if it had been difficult to maintain the separation between intelligence and policy, Sir John Scarlett replied:

"I cannot recall worrying about this at the time in a deep way. Obviously I, we worried about it because we understood that it was necessary to ensure that the public assessment was consistent with what was being said in the classified assessments, and so that discipline was very strong within us, and in ways that have been discussed many times, we sought to protect ourselves against …"[303]

736. Sir John added:

"So I do not recall worrying about it in a deep way or in the sense that it was something which I or we couldn't control. It was something to which we had to pay very close attention, both through the procedures and processes we followed, and by the way we reached our judgments. But I never felt that I was not in control of the process, and I have said that on quite a number of occasions."

737. The independence and impartiality of the JIC remains of the utmost importance.

738. As the FAC report in July 2003 pointed out, the late Sir Percy Cradock, Chairman of the JIC from 1985 to 1992, wrote in his history of the JIC that:

"Ideally, intelligence and policy should be close but distinct. Too distinct and assessments become an in-growing, self-regarding activity, producing little or no work of interest to the decision-makers … Too close a link and policy begins to play back on estimates, producing the answers the policy makers would like … The analysts become courtiers, whereas their proper function is to report their findings … without fear or favour. The best arrangement is intelligence and policy in separate but adjoining rooms, with communicating doors and thin partition walls …"[304]

739. Mr Straw told the FAC in 2003:

"The reason why we have a Joint Intelligence Committee which is separate from the intelligence agencies is precisely so that those who are obtaining the intelligence are not then directly making the assessment upon it. That is one of the very important strengths of our system compared with most other systems around the world."[305]

740. The FAC endorsed those sentiments.[306] It stated that the JIC has a "vital role in safeguarding the independence and impartiality of intelligence"; and that the "independence and impartiality of its own role" was "of the utmost importance". It recommended that Ministers should "bear in mind at all times the importance of ensuring that the JIC is free of all political pressure".

741. In its response to the FAC, the Government stated:

"We agree. The JIC plays a crucial role in providing the Government with objective Assessments on a range of issues of importance to national interests."[307]

Conclusions 604

Introduction and key findings

1. This Section addresses:

- the post-invasion search for evidence of weapons of mass destruction (WMD) in Iraq;
- the Government's response to the failure to find stockpiles of WMD in Iraq;
- demands for an independent judge-led inquiry into pre-conflict intelligence on Iraq's WMD and the decision to establish the Butler Review; and
- the Government's involvement with the preparation and publication of the series of reports produced by the Iraq Survey Group.

2. This Section summarises, but does not include, detailed comment on findings relating to pre-conflict intelligence on Iraqi WMD and the post-conflict search for WMD published between 2003 and 2005 by:

- the House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee;
- the Intelligence and Security Committee of Parliament;
- the Hutton Inquiry;
- the Butler Review;
- the Iraq Survey Group;
- the US Senate Committee on Intelligence; and
- the US Commission on Intelligence Capabilities.

3. The pre-invasion intelligence on Iraqi WMD and the withdrawal three lines of reporting by the Secret Intelligence Service in 2003 and 2004 are addressed in Sections 4.1, 4.2 and 4.3.

Key findings

- The search for evidence of WMD in Iraq was started during the military campaign by Exploitation Task Force-75 and was carried forward from June 2003 by the Iraq Survey Group (ISG). The UK participated in both. By June 2004, the ISG had a staff of 1,787, of whom 54 came from the UK.
- As the insurgency developed, the ISG's operating conditions became increasingly difficult. There was competition for resources between counter-terrorism operations and the search for WMD evidence, and some ISG staff were diverted to the former.
- Mr Blair took a close interest in the work of the ISG and the presentation of its reports and the wider narrative about WMD. He raised the subject with President Bush.
- The Government was confident that pre-conflict assessments of Iraq's WMD capabilities would be confirmed once Saddam Hussein's regime had been removed.
- It quickly became apparent that it was unlikely that significant stockpiles would be found. This led to challenges to the credibility of both the Government and the intelligence community.

- There were soon demands for an independent judge-led inquiry into the pre-conflict intelligence.
- The Government was quick to acknowledge the need for a review, rejecting an independent inquiry in favour of reviews initiated by the House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee (FAC) and the Intelligence and Security Committee of Parliament (ISC).
- The Government's reluctance to establish an independent public inquiry became untenable in January 2004 when President Bush announced his own decision to set up an independent inquiry in the US.
- Faced with criticism of the pre-conflict intelligence and the absence of evidence of a current Iraqi WMD capability, Mr Blair sought to defend the decision to take military action by emphasising instead:
  - Saddam Hussein's strategic intent;
  - the regime's breaches of Security Council resolutions; and
  - the positive impact of military action in Iraq on global counter-proliferation efforts.
- The ISG's principal findings – that Iraq's WMD capability had mostly been destroyed in 1991 but that it had been Saddam Hussein's strategic intent to preserve the capability to reconstitute his weapons of mass destruction – were significant, but did not support statements made by the UK and US Governments before the invasion, which had focused on Iraq's current capabilities and an urgent and growing threat.
- The explanation for military action put forward by Mr Blair in October 2004 drew on the ISG's findings, but was not the explanation given before the conflict.

Planning and preparation for the post-conflict search for WMD

4. In February 2003, Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, approved UK participation in a US-led rehearsal for the post-conflict search for evidence of WMD in Iraq.

5. Before approving UK participation in the search itself, Mr Hoon requested advice on how to ensure the impartiality of the exercise, including through the possible early involvement of the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC) and the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA).

6. During and immediately after the invasion of Iraq, the search for WMD was the responsibility of Exploitation Task Force-75 (XTF-75), a US-led military unit, with small UK and Australian contingents.[1]

7. XTF-75 was deployed to carry out Sensitive Site Exploitation (SSE), a military term for the exploitation of "personnel, documents, electronic files, and material captured at the site, while neutralizing the site or any of its contents".

[1] Vandal T et al. The Strategic Implications of Sensitive Site Exploitation. National Defense University, National War College, 2003.

8. Officials had begun to consider the UK contribution to SSE in early February 2003.

9. On 4 February, Mr Tim Dowse, Head of FCO Non-Proliferation Department (NPD),[2] chaired a meeting with officials from the Secret Intelligence Service (SIS) and the Ministry of Defence (MOD) to discuss post-conflict WMD issues and the possible role of UNMOVIC.[3]

10. The MOD outlined US plans for intelligence exploitation and clean-up over a period of several years, and explained that the plans envisaged unilateral action by the US with no role for the UN or other UN Member States.

11. Participants at the meeting agreed that it was very unlikely that US views could be shifted significantly, but that the US must be made aware of the potential value of internationalising the clean-up.

12. On 10 February, Mr David Johnson, Head of MOD Iraq Secretariat, sent Mr Hoon briefing for a visit to Washington (see Section 6.2).[4] The briefing included a paper on "dealing with WMD".

13. Mr Johnson stated that there had been a good deal of "military-to-military" planning between the UK and the US on WMD, and that the UK had identified the specialist contributions it could make at various stages during and after the conflict.

14. The attached paper on WMD stated that SSE required specialist expertise that was "in very short supply". To secure maximum value from scarce resources, the US planned to establish a Coalition Intelligence Exploitation Base (IEB) in southern Iraq reporting to Lieutenant General David McKiernan, Commander of the Coalition Forces Land Component Command (CFLCC). IEB capabilities would include:

- Site Survey Teams for initial analysis of sites secured by ground forces;
- Mobile Exploitation Teams to collect evidence;
- Disablement Teams to put facilities out of action;
- laboratories to verify and catalogue evidence; and
- elimination and disposal of WMD.

15. The paper stated that SSE was important to the UK for two reasons:

- achieving the UK's prime objective of eliminating Iraq's WMD; and
- securing the hard evidence needed retrospectively to demonstrate the case for military action, especially if it were to take place without UN authorisation.

[4] Minute Johnson to PS/Secretary of State [MOD], 10 February 2003, 'Secretary of State's Visit to Washington: Iraq.'

16. The paper stated that it was in the UK's interest to contribute and that the US was "very keen" for it to do so. But the UK needed to be clear that its willingness to help was conditional on resolving two issues:

- 'Impartiality mechanisms' to ensure that Coalition activity has international credibility.
- The involvement of UNMOVIC and the IAEA once the situation is stable; as with the aftermath generally, the Pentagon's hang-ups about the UN are getting in the way of common sense and our long-term interests."

17. The paper stated that, if those conditions were met, during the conflict the UK should contribute:

- liaison officers in the IEB and the CFLCC SSE Fusion Cell;
- a Squadron HQ of the Joint NBC (Nuclear Biological Chemical) Regiment;
- a Battlefield Intelligence Recovery Team of Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) and Explosive Ordnance Disposal (EOD) personnel;
- a DIS counter-terrorism expert;
- an RAF Provost[5] and Security Services Forensic Science Team to interrogate computer hardware; and
- seven scientists with a mobile laboratory to provide a limited analytical capability.

18. Additional contributions could be made on an on-call basis through Air Marshal Brian Burridge, the UK National Contingent Commander (NCC).

19. In the post-conflict phase, the UK could contribute the Joint NBC Regiment HQ, detection assets and other Specialist Monitoring Teams.

20. Mr Hoon discussed the UK's objectives and its potential contribution to the search for WMD with Mr Donald Rumsfeld, the US Secretary of Defense, and Dr Condoleezza Rice, President Bush's National Security Advisor, in Washington on 12 February (see Section 6.5).[6]

21. The British Embassy Washington reported agreement that "broad UN cover for day after management in Iraq would bring political, financial and legal benefits" and would "facilitate an UNMOVIC and IAEA role in verifying WMD clear-up".

22. During the talks, Mr Jack Dyer Crouch II, Assistant Secretary of Defense (International Security Policy), told Mr Hoon that Iraqi scientists would be key to identifying the whereabouts of Iraq's WMD. Because the public in the US and elsewhere would expect early results, there would be "a heavy forensic input" at the start of the programme.

23. Mr Crouch also agreed with Mr Hoon that UNMOVIC and the IAEA should help verify WMD discoveries in order to counter speculation that they had been planted.

24. On 17 February, the Permanent Joint Headquarters (PJHQ) informed Mr Hoon of the deployment the next day of 74 personnel to participate in SSE "mission rehearsal training" in Kuwait, and that up to 92 more personnel assigned to military operations in Iraq might be "co-opted" to participate in SSE operations as necessary.[7]

25. PJHQ stated that the priority was to ensure that any UK contribution:

- was coherent with wider policy objectives;
- did not put at risk the response to any chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear (CBRN) incident in the UK;
- was "efficient and effective": no more than needed to achieve the UK's aim and support the US; and
- took account of the significant Home Base and Force Protection demands on the UK's EOD and CBRN resources.

26. Mr Hoon approved the deployment of 74 UK personnel.[8] With planning "still at an early stage", he asked for further advice on SSE operations after the rehearsal, including on:

- operational management of specialists in the SSE teams, including those from other agencies;
- "impartiality mechanisms", including the early involvement of UNMOVIC and the IAEA; and
- evidence handling procedures.

PJHQ was also asked to reiterate to the US the UK's concerns about impartiality.

27. Mr Hoon requested that further Ministerial approval be sought for the participation of additional personnel.

Operation ROCKINGHAM

The MOD Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) set up Operation ROCKINGHAM to provide the focus for UK intelligence support to UN disarmament activities in Iraq established under resolution 687 (1991).[9]

An Op ROCKINGHAM cell in the DIS continued to exist after UN inspectors withdrew from Iraq in December 1998, but was reduced to a single member of staff who maintained a watching brief on matters related to possible future UN inspections in Iraq.[10]

The cell was subsequently expanded to provide UNMOVIC and the IAEA "with all-source UK intelligence assessments on the extent of Iraq's nuclear, biological, chemical and ballistic missile programmes and information about sites of potential significance".

In mid-March 2003, the Op ROCKINGHAM cell was expanded to encompass the results of SSE and "WMD/delivery-related information from the DIS in-theatre Battlefield Intelligence Recovery Team".[11]

28. On 17 March, after the failure of the Security Council to agree a "second" resolution on Iraq (see Section 3.8), Mr Kofi Annan, the UN Secretary-General, announced the withdrawal of all UN staff from the country.[12]

29. UNMOVIC and the IAEA suspended inspections in Iraq on 18 March.[13]

30. Admiral Sir Michael Boyce, Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS), issued the Execute Directive authorising UK military operations in Iraq on 18 March.[14]

31. The Execute Directive included an instruction to Lieutenant General John Reith, Chief of Joint Operations (CJO), to:

- "Support international efforts to find and eliminate Iraqi WMD capacity, its means of delivery and infrastructure"; and
- "… to provide support, as appropriate, to SSE activities during Phase 3 operations, but this must not be detrimental to overall FP [force posture] adopted".

32. The UK Military Campaign Objectives, published on 20 March, stated that the main tasks of the Coalition included:

- denying the Iraqi regime the use of weapons of mass destruction now and in the future;
- removing the Iraqi regime, given its clear and unyielding refusal to comply with the UN Security Council's demands; and
- identifying and securing the sites where weapons of mass destruction and their means of delivery were located.[15]

33. The list of "immediate military priorities" in the wake of hostilities included "work with UNMOVIC and the IAEA to rid Iraq of its WMD".

34. On 17 March, Mr John Scarlett, Chairman of the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC), sent Sir David Manning, Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser and Head of the Cabinet Office Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec), a minute addressing the different elements of Iraq's capability, including Iraq's actions since the departure of the inspectors in 1998 to pursue chemical and biological weapons programmes, and Iraq's activities to pursue enhanced ballistic missile and other means to deliver them.[16]

35. In a Note produced on 19 March, the JIC continued to assess that Iraq had usable chemical and biological weapons and the intent to use them.[17]

36. The UK assessments of Iraq's WMD capabilities and intent and their evolution between 2000 and March 2003 are addressed in detail in Sections 4.1, 4.2 and 4.3.

37. In a discussion with President Bush on 24 March, Mr Blair underlined the importance of Coalition Forces finding Saddam's WMD.[18]

38. At the end of March, Mr Scarlett set out for No.10 the Assessments Staff view of what the Coalition might find in Iraq, including that:

- the bulk of the sites that might yield results were located in the Baghdad area; and
- most had been "cleansed over the preceding six to nine months".

39. Mr Scarlett set out the views of the Assessments Staff on what "WMD" the Coalition "should expect to discover, when and how", in a minute to Sir David Manning on 31 March.[19]

40. Mr Scarlett wrote:

Chemical Weapons

- "Iraq is capable of producing the chemical agents mustard gas, tabun, sarin, cyclosarin and VX."
- "Exact quantities of agent available are unknown, but we judge it is likely to be between 10 and 100 tonnes (3.5 tonnes of nerve agent would fill 1,000 artillery shells). We continue to judge that Iraq has produced chemical agent since UNSCOM [UN Special Commission] left in 1998, although intelligence suggests that agent production stopped prior to UNMOVIC's deployment last autumn. We do not know where this activity took place, but it is probable that it used dual-use chemical facilities."
- "We know from intelligence that the regime expended a great deal of effort in cleaning up all WMD associated sites, and dispersing equipment and material in advance of UN inspections."
- "Details on chemical munitions are scarce. UNSCOM could not account for over 30,000 special munitions (both chemical and biological) although it is unlikely that all of these remain."
- "We judge the most likely delivery means are artillery and battlefield rockets. [Reference to reporting of retention of shells] mustard filled artillery shells from a batch of 550 supposedly destroyed by Coalition air attack in 1991 …"
- "Other means of delivery include aerial bombs, sprayers and missiles. UNMOVIC could not account for 6,500 aerial bombs (which could easily be hidden in a large hangar)."
- "Despite some reports that such munitions have been deployed to Republican Guard units, we judge that they probably remain under tight control … in the area of Baghdad."
- "Over last few days there have been a number of reports concerning chemical weapons … But the nature of the sources makes the veracity … difficult to judge."
- A "few reports from senior Iraqi security officials" suggested that Iraq could not "prepare or produce chemical weapons", and that its stocks were "dispersed, and that therefore such weapons will not be used".
- "In assessing these statements it is necessary to take into account the limited access these individuals appear to have to military planning, their lack of technical expertise and accompanying comments which are less credible."

Biological Weapons

- Iraq was "capable of producing biological agents, including anthrax, botulinum toxin, aflatoxin and ricin".

- "The exact quantities of agent and munitions available are unknown."
- "We have no intelligence that biological munitions have been deployed."
- The location of mobile production facilities was not known, but they were "likely to be within areas tightly controlled by the regime".

Missiles

- The UK was "still unclear" about the "state of readiness/assembly" of up to 20 Al Hussein missiles "or the numbers of launchers available. Some or all of these missiles could have been dismantled to aid concealment. While we believe Iraq retains the technical expertise to maintain and re-assemble … the speed with which this can be achieved depends on the extent to which they have been disassembled, and the degree to which they might need access to specialised equipment."

Sensitive Site Exploitation

- "The bulk of the sites which might yield results are located in the Baghdad area. But … most sites previously associated with WMD production have been cleansed over the last six to nine months."
- The JIC continued to judge that "key documents on Iraqi WMD programmes" had been "dispersed".
- "Given the recent Iraqi emphasis on clean-up, dispersal and concealment, the best prospect of exposing the full extent of the WMD programmes rests in free contact with scientists, and other individuals, involved in the WMD programmes and the (extensive) concealment activity …"

41. Sir David Manning commented to Mr Blair and Mr Jonathan Powell, Mr Blair's Chief of Staff:

> "Chances of finding WMD evidence slim before Baghdad falls and/or regime collapses."[20]

42. On 3 April, SIS reissued to Mr Scarlett and a wider readership, two reports, from 11 and 23 September 2002, stating that Iraq had continued production of chemical weapons (CW) after 1998.

43. The content and provenance of those reports, and their subsequent withdrawal, is addressed in Section 4.3.

Possible find of CBW agents

On 7 April, The New York Times reported that US troops had found several drums near Karbala that might contain nerve agents and mustard gas.[21]

Mr Hoon's Private Office informed No.10 that initial US tests had "indicated the presence of nerve and blister agents, but the chemicals could yet prove innocuous".[22]

Four duplicate sets of samples would be taken from the drums by a specialist US team, one of which would be passed to the UK. Perceptions of the sampling process would be hugely important to the Iraq campaign. Openness and independent verification would be a counter to those ready to believe evidence had been faked. The UK would:

> "… press US colleagues for their sampling process to include additional samples that can be passed to independent laboratories, and for sites to be maintained as 'scenes of crimes' so that third parties can verify there was no undue Coalition interference. Verification by a suitable non-Coalition laboratory will be essential if the results are to be credible in international (and domestic) opinion. There is clearly a role here for UNMOVIC or a successor organisation."

Mr Scarlett informed the Ad Hoc Meeting on Iraq on 8 April that there was no definitive information about the find by Coalition Forces of material which could be chemical and biological warfare agent.[23]

Mr John Prescott, the Deputy Prime Minister, who was chairing the meeting in Mr Blair's absence, concluded that opportunities to conduct interviews with scientists who had been engaged on Iraq's WMD programmes should be "pursued when the fighting stopped".

44. Concluding discussion at the Ad Hoc Meeting on Iraq on 9 April, Mr Blair stated that the proposition that the UN weapons inspectors should return to Iraq could not be decided at present.[24]

45. When Mr Blair spoke to President Bush on 10 April, they discussed the need to warn Syria not to give refuge to regime figures or to scientists who knew about Iraq's WMD.[25]

46. In mid-April, Sir David Manning advised Mr Blair of the need for a coherent plan and greater urgency in the search for WMD.

47. The UK Government sought to reconcile differing UK and US views on the potential roles of UNMOVIC and the IAEA in the verification and monitoring of Iraqi WMD.

48. The US proposed a new organisation, the Iraq Survey Group (ISG), to lead the Coalition search for WMD.

49. On 10 April, Sir David Manning chaired a meeting to discuss the search for WMD.[26] Participants included Sir Richard Dearlove (Chief of the Secret Intelligence Service (SIS)), Mr Scarlett, Mr William Ehrman (FCO Director General Defence and Intelligence), Air Marshal Sir Joe French (Chief of Defence Intelligence (CDI)) and Air Vice Marshal Clive Loader (Assistant Chief of the Defence Staff (Operations)).

50. Sir David identified three areas where co-ordination was necessary:

- the search for material on the ground;
- tracking down and interviewing Iraqi personnel involved in WMD programmes; and
- public presentation of the issue and media handling of finds.

51. Sir David commented that "US handling of those issues did not seem particularly structured. We could no doubt do better than the UNMOVIC inspections."

52. Sir Richard Dearlove underlined that co-ordination with the US, which might want to control the search for WMD, was the key. He reported that SIS experts were already in Iraq. SIS was re-examining old material in the hope that it would generate leads.

53. Mr Scarlett identified four problems:

- the large number of Iraqis involved in WMD programmes and their concealment;
- the volume of documentation, much of which had been dispersed;
- the munitions, which UNMOVIC assessed had been concealed and dispersed in a disorganised manner; and
- co-ordination in the UK and with the US.

54. Sir David commissioned further advice from Mr Martin Howard, Deputy Chief of Defence Intelligence (DCDI), including whether there were any points Mr Blair would need to raise directly with President Bush.

55. Sir David concluded that the group would meet again to discuss the Whitehall machinery that should be established "to track and drive forward work in this area".

56. Mr Howard sent advice on next steps to Mr Hoon the following day.[27] This addressed both the response to Sir David Manning and US proposals for a new organisation, the ISG, to take forward activity in the post-conflict phase.

57. Mr Howard recommended that Mr Hoon:

- approve a letter to Sir David Manning emphasising the need for Coalition commanders to give priority to WMD detection and elimination, and informing No.10 of the MOD's intention to offer elements of the UK WMD expertise already in Iraq to the ISG and to consider what more could made available; and

- agree that the MOD should be prepared to approach former UNMOVIC, IAEA and UNSCOM inspectors from the UK to reinforce the UK effort.

58. Mr Peter Watkins, Mr Hoon's Principal Private Secretary, wrote to Sir David Manning on 11 April:

> "As high intensity military action begins to draw to a close … our strategic priority in Iraq should be the detection and elimination of undeclared WMD and delivery systems."[28]

59. Mr Watkins wrote that the evidence on WMD would "come in a number of forms ranging from WMD materials through research facilities to documentation and IT records". Interviews of scientists and other Iraqi staff were "likely to be one of the most fruitful source[s] of evidence". It would also be essential to minimise the risks of proliferation of expertise. US and UK commanders had been given directions to search out and hold "personnel of interest".

60. Mr Watkins reported US proposals to create an organisation called the ISG, under the auspices of the US Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA), and that the US was:

> "… keen to integrate UK and Australian expertise into this organisation. We intend, in the first instance, to offer elements of the UK's WMD expertise already deployed in theatre … The total of our personnel currently deployed … is some 100, increasing to 120 later this month."

61. Mr Watkins added that it was important the UK did not limit its work with the ISG to "the UK Area of Responsibility where sites and personnel of interest are thinner on the ground".

62. A public handling strategy would be needed, including "to moderate expectations of very early progress". Mr Watkins warned that the search for WMD and its eventual destruction was "likely to be a long haul … months if not years".

63. Mr Watkins also reiterated concerns about the credibility of the Coalition's verification process should WMD be found:

> "Given suspicions about Coalition motives, positive results would have considerably more force if they were verified 'separately' by a non-US/UK laboratory. Ultimately, we would like to see UNMOVIC or a successor body back in play. But US aversion to the UN means that this is unlikely to be achievable in the short/medium term."

64. Mr Watkins reported that the FCO was approaching the Netherlands to explore whether an independent laboratory there would be a possible alternative.

---

[28] Letter Watkins to Manning, 11 April 2003, 'Iraq: WMD Detection and Elimination'.

65. The points which the MOD suggested Mr Blair might make to President Bush included:

- "Detection and elimination of WMD … now becoming our top political priority. Need to build on current efforts and demonstrate that our casus belli has substance."
- Coalition commanders "should give high priority to identifying and detaining" Iraqi scientists and other staff with information about Iraq's activities.
- Support for an ISG and the hope that it could deploy "as soon as possible".
- "Independent verification of US/UK WMD finds would be extremely useful politically, although clearly a complicating factor."
- The UK's "ultimate objective" was UN involvement, but it recognised "that [the] US had reservations".

66. Sir David Manning showed Mr Blair the advice from Mr Howard to Mr Hoon, including the draft letter from Mr Hoon to Sir David, which differed little from the version that was sent. Sir David commented:

> "We need a coherent plan for Iraqi WMD. This is work in progress … We need to inject greater urgency; and I am not yet convinced that we need do everything as part of one large US-led organisation. Finding people [involved in Iraq's WMD programmes] is key. That doesn't depend on CENTCOM [Central Command]."[29]

67. In an interview for the Spanish newspaper El País, published on 9 April, Dr Hans Blix, the Executive Chairman of UNMOVIC, made a number of points about the role of UNMOVIC and the events preceding military action in Iraq.[30] Those included:

- The US and UK had told UNMOVIC that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction. UNMOVIC never accepted that statement as an established fact; its job was to establish the facts.
- UNMOVIC had visited sites identified by the US and UK and found "nothing that had to do with weapons of mass destruction".
- The US intelligence services had provided information to the IAEA about "contracts for a presumed purchase of enriched uranium from Niger" which were a "crude lie" (see Box, 'Uranium and Niger', later in this Section).
- After his report to the Security Council on 27 January criticising Iraq it had begun to co-operate and provide "significant data", including the names of many technicians and scientists who had participated in the development of biological and chemical weapons in 1991. UNMOVIC "needed some months to work on it".
- The US had welcomed his report on 27 January, but the "great paradox" was that from then on Iraq began to co-operate and the US began to criticise him (Dr Blix).

---

[30] Global Policy Forum, 9 April 2003, Interview With Hans Blix: By Ernesto Ekaizer, El Pais.

- The US and UK had become "very impatient in the first days of March", and UNMOVIC had not been left "to finish the task".
- The presumed threat from Iraq could have been controlled through inspections.
- He did not accept the US view that "the war with Iraq was a way of sending a sign to other countries to preclude their acquisition of weapons of mass destruction". If a country felt its security was assured, it would not have the need to think about WMD. That was the first line of defence against the proliferation of WMD. North Korea now wanted nuclear arms to fend off others.

68. At the Ad Hoc Meeting on Iraq on 12 April, Mr Straw stated that the UK Permanent Mission to the UN in New York (UKMIS New York) would be challenging Dr Blix on the media story that the British had fabricated evidence about Iraq's WMD.[31]

69. UKMIS New York reported that, at the meeting of the Security Council on 22 April, Dr Blix had said:

> "… some recent reports of his comments – translated from foreign languages into English – had contained serious errors. It was true that he had pointed to weaknesses in intelligence provided, but he had also always stressed the need for intelligence and the difficulties agencies faced. He had not suggested that any government had fabricated evidence. In addition he had indeed said that US patience seemed to run out at the same time as the Iraqis had become more proactive. But if asked about the causal link, his view would be that the Iraqis had become more active when they had seen that time was running out."[32]

70. In a statement to the House of Commons on 14 April, Mr Blair reported:

> "… of 146 possible sites known to us, investigations have begun in seven but, in any event, we know that for six months before the return of UN inspectors, Saddam put in place a systematic campaign of concealment of weapons of mass destruction. Until we are able to interrogate the scientists and experts who worked on the programmes, and the UN has a list of some 5,000 names, progress is bound to be slow. A specialised team, however, is beginning work and we are in discussion with allies and the UN as to what the future role of the UN in such a process may be."[33]

71. In his conversation with President Bush on 14 April, Mr Blair stated that there was a need to manage media expectations in the search for WMD and suggested there should be no hesitation in offering amnesty in exchange for concrete information on WMD.[34]

72. On 16 April, Mr Scarlett informed Sir David Manning of the content of his discussions with CIA officials earlier that day, which covered a number of issues, including the use of available intelligence in the exploitation process.[35]

IAEA report, April 2003

The IAEA's 15th report on Iraq, covering the period between 1 October 2002 and 1 April 2003, was submitted to the Security Council on 14 April 2003.[36] The report stated:

- "As of 17 March 2003, the IAEA had found no evidence or plausible indication of the revival of a nuclear weapons programme In Iraq"; but the time available "for the IAEA before inspections were suspended was not sufficient to permit it to complete its overall review and assessment".
- "Provided that Iraq's co-operation had remained active, and barring unforeseen circumstances, the IAEA would have been able to provide the Security Council with credible assurance regarding the absence of such revival within two to three months of continuing verification activities."
- Many areas of Iraqi expertise seemed to have been significantly depleted, and the "core of expertise" on centrifuge enrichment that existed in 1990 appeared to have been "largely disbanded".
- The IAEA, "with the concurrence of outside experts", had concluded that documents provided "by a number of States that pointed to an agreement between Niger and Iraq on the sale of uranium to Iraq between 1999 and 2001… were in fact forged".
- The IAEA had therefore concluded that those specific allegations were "unfounded", but "it could not be automatically extrapolated … that Iraq had never sought to import uranium". The IAEA "would continue to investigate the matter".
- "Extensive field investigation and document analysis had failed to uncover any evidence" that the aluminium tubes sought by Iraq were intended for use in "any project other than the reverse engineering of rockets".
- "IAEA experts familiar with the use of … magnets in centrifuge enrichment have verified that none of the magnets that Iraq has declared could be used directly for a centrifuge magnetic bearing". Investigations with foreign manufacturers contacted by Iraq were "ongoing".

In relation to recent events, the IAEA report stated:

- During the period under review it had conducted 237 inspections at 148 sites. Iraq had provided access to all facilities requested by the IAEA "without conditions or delay".
- The Iraqi authorities had made available "over 7,000 pages of additional … documentation" and "a large number of documents" relating to "Iraq's pre-1991 laser enrichment programme were found in the home of a former Iraqi scientist".

- Iraq had "provided an updated list of 430 key technical staff involved in the past programme and their current work locations. The list covered the great majority of essential staff." The IAEA was "able to interview 17 individuals selected by the IAEA at locations chosen by the IAEA". Some restrictions were imposed at the beginning, "when interviewees first refused to be seen without the presence of an Iraqi observer. Subsequently interviewees accepted to be seen alone, but requested that their interviews be taped. Ultimately, two individuals accepted to be interviewed in private and without being taped. Most of the interviews proved to be of significant help in improving the IAEA's understanding of the current state of Iraq's nuclear related capabilities."
- Before inspections were suspended, the IAEA was "able to resolve the modalities" for interviews outside Iraq.
- Since the inception of a system to review applications to sell or supply single or dual-use items, in May 2002, the IAEA had examined 9,965 contract communications. Of those, 0.1 percent had contained prohibited items.
- The IAEA had "repeatedly called on States to provide actionable information of direct and current value" relevant to its mandate. "Towards the end of the recent inspections", there had been "an increase in the provision of such information", but the "nature and extent of that information remained limited".
- The Iraqi declaration submitted on 7 December 2002 "did not provide any significant new information" relevant to the issues outstanding since December 1998.

The report concluded that "as the sole legal authority to verify Iraq's nuclear activities", the IAEA remained "ready, subject to Security Council guidance, to resume its verification activities as soon as conditions permit".

73. Mr Tony Brenton, Chargé d'Affaires at the British Embassy Washington, discussed the role of UNMOVIC with Mr John Bolton, US Under Secretary of State for Arms Control and International Security, on 15 April.[37]

74. Mr Brenton reported that the UK should not expect the US to agree any role for UNMOVIC in the short term. The US had particular concerns about UNMOVIC inspectors handling sensitive intelligence on countries outside Iraq that revealed details about global WMD networks, including procurement and financing. Even in the longer term, UNMOVIC would have to be reformed before the US would consider involving it. The US was willing to work with the UK on other ways to validate WMD finds.

75. Mr Brenton advised that the US argument about intelligence had evident force. The UK would need to have a good answer if it was to maintain its current position on UNMOVIC.

76. The Cabinet Office reported to Sir David Manning that there was a "consensus that UNMOVIC/IAEA should not – and cannot – return to Iraq in the immediate future", but in a meeting on 16 April officials had:

[37] Telegram 507 Washington to FCO London, 15 April 2003, 'US/Iraq: Role of UNMOVIC'.

> "… agreed that a restructured UNMOVIC/IAEA would represent the most credible way of certifying elimination … While US private statements on Blix/Baradei [Dr Mohamed ElBaradei, Director General of the IAEA] have been harsh, we have seen nothing to suggest the Administration would rule out the inspectors returning after a period of time, without Blix, restructured, and in co-operation with the Coalition (though the precise mechanics of the last will no doubt prompt debate). The time to restructure/recruit could cover the period until Blix's retirement in June."[38]

77. Responding to Mr Brenton on 16 April, the FCO stated that the UK agreed with the US on the immediate next steps, and on the need for credible third-party verification.[39] The UK did not want the future role of UNMOVIC to become a UK/US problem. Conditions in Iraq were such that it could be argued the return of inspectors was not an issue. The UK was happy to discuss options for verifying Coalition discoveries, but it was important to keep in mind the need for credibility, and "what the market will bear in New York". UNMOVIC and the IAEA were the bodies likely to carry most weight in verifying and validating Coalition finds. The UK would look at alternatives, but they must be sufficiently credible not to be dismissed as US/UK stooges and there were "no obvious candidates".

78. The FCO stated that US officials had previously indicated that they were "prepared to consider the verification/validation task being performed by a 'restructured' UNMOVIC and INVO [the IAEA's Iraq Nuclear Verification Office]". UNMOVIC's leadership also needed to change. Dr Blix had said he would not extend his contract when it expired in June.

79. The FCO believed that the type of restructuring it had in mind could take place "without adjustment to UNMOVIC/INVO's mandates". It was:

> "… reluctant to offer more scope than absolutely necessary for others to make difficulties for us in the Council. And, presentationally, it strikes us as an own goal for the Coalition to start trying to re-write the very UNSCRs which we took military action to uphold."

80. The FCO saw "substantial practical advantages" in UNMOVIC and the INVO retaining responsibility for the destruction of WMD, which "could be a lengthy, hazardous and very expensive task". There would also be a need to consider whether long-term monitoring arrangements could be required.

81. The FCO concluded that "a successful intrusive inspection regime tailored to the post-war Iraqi circumstances could be a useful precedent for dealing with other proliferators".

Security Council debate on the future role of UNMOVIC

82. In a meeting in New York on 22 April, Mr Bolton told Sir Jeremy Greenstock, UK Permanent Representative to the UN, that "the US did not disagree with credible inspections and getting WMD finds into the public domain".[40] But it was:

> "… concerned about involving UNMOVIC too soon or too extensively … The UNMOVIC issue should be left on the backburner – it would become less of a problem as the Coalition made discoveries."

83. Sir Jeremy replied that the UK was "less neuralgic" than the US about involving UNMOVIC, but would "not force the issue". The UK wanted to ensure that there were "credible arrangements that left no doubt over Coalition discoveries". He also said that:

> "US reluctance would be seen as a general reluctance to have the UN involved in post-conflict Iraq (this was manageable). We had not identified any credible alternatives … [I]f international verification emerged strengthened from the Iraq issue it could be used in other cases."

84. The Security Council discussed UNMOVIC on 22 April.[41]

85. Sir Jeremy Greenstock described the discussion as "subdued". He reported that Dr Blix told the Security Council that it was evident that civilian inspections could not operate in Iraq. In addition, some of the assumptions on which the Council had established UNMOVIC had changed, and it was entirely natural that the Coalition should establish units to search for WMD.

86. The draft UNMOVIC work programme could be adapted to assume that UNMOVIC would:

- verify and corroborate Coalition findings;
- continue to supervise destruction of WMD; and
- carry out longer-term monitoring.

87. Sir Jeremy reported that almost all members of the Security Council accepted the need for UNMOVIC to return to Iraq and most highlighted the link with the lifting of sanctions, but none pressed the US hard. The IAEA representative reported that Dr ElBaradei's view was that the IAEA should resume inspections as soon as possible; it was the only body with legal powers to verify nuclear disarmament.

88. Sir Jeremy told the Security Council that the UK saw a role for UNMOVIC and the IAEA in verifying disarmament and long-term monitoring. He added that Coalition Forces were "fully aware of the need to be active, professional, and to treat all relevant WMD evidence responsibly. We would share with the UN any relevant information we uncovered."

89. Ambassador John Negroponte, the US Permanent Representative to the UN, made no reference to UNMOVIC. He said that the Coalition had been focused on re-establishing security and would now intensify the search for WMD. This was "likely to take time". The US:

> "… recognised the need for transparency … But … the disarmament regime needed to be reassessed given the new facts on the ground … [T]he Coalition was still very much in the stabilisation phase and the principal efforts in the search for WMD remained ahead of us."

90. Responding to comments made during the discussion, Dr Blix made a number of points, including:

- "For independent verification, UNMOVIC would need access to locations and persons."
- "… UNMOVIC was the only international body which had a role and expertise in inspections of biological weapons and missiles. If we were moving to a WMD free zone there was a question of whether we should extend rather than dismantle that capability."

Creation of the Iraq Survey Group

91. In mid-April, the US invited the UK and Australia to participate in the ISG.

92. At the end of April, Mr Hoon approved the deployment of specialist UK units to the ISG.

93. On 16 April, AM Burridge's Private Office informed PJHQ that 119 UK personnel were "dedicated to SSE operations".[42] Most were attached to XTF-75, with 44 "on call" from 1st (UK) Armoured Division. An additional 68 personnel were attached to "Supplementary Assets" assigned to force protection tasks, and could be "co-opted to SSE operations" through a request to AM Burridge.

94. AM Burridge's Private Office proposed a number of additional UK contributions to support the creation of the ISG, including appointment of a UK deputy head of the ISG and additional life support to UK SSE personnel.

95. In its meeting on 16 April, the JIC was informed:

> "The US had invited the UK and Australia to participate in the Iraq Survey Group (ISG), which would be tasked with looking at a range of post-conflict issues, [42] Letter Capewell to PJHQ, 16 April 2003, 'Report from the Iraq Survey Group (ISG) Conference Held at CENTCOM Forward Headquarters (CFH) – Qatar 13/14 April 2003'.

including WMD, War Crimes and Terrorism, and would be fully effective in about four weeks. It was clear that the US placed a different priority on WMD, which was near the very top of the UK political agenda. Mr Howard would lead a UK team to Washington … and would listen to American views, clarify their intentions … and emphasise the importance the UK placed on the WMD issue. He would report back to the Committee at their next meeting, after which the Chairman would brief the PM."[43]

96. Mr Scarlett subsequently asked Mr Howard to report on whether the activities to establish the existence and scope of Iraq's capabilities was being given a sufficiently high priority in all parts of the US Administration. Depending on his report, the JIC might want to recommend the possible appointment of a senior political figure to oversee the Coalition effort on WMD.[44]

97. On 21 and 22 April, Mr Howard led a UK team from the MOD, the FCO and SIS to Washington to discuss the ISG with a US team including Major General Keith Dayton, its future military commander.[45]

98. The British Embassy Washington reported after the talks that the ISG would be "substantial", with up to 2,000 personnel, and its task would be to "piece together the deeds of Saddam's regime, in particular the WMD programmes". The US Department of Defense (DoD) expected to have an initial operating capability in Iraq by the end of May and that its work would take about six months. Maj Gen Dayton would welcome "a substantial UK input", including providing his Chief of Staff.

99. The talks had highlighted several "pressing issues":

- gaining access in the short term to scientists and those involved in concealment;
- improving the flow of information between theatre and capitals;
- managing public expectations about WMD discoveries; and
- third-party validation of those discoveries.

100. US and UK officials agreed that:

"… Coalition forces in theatre needed to start to shift their attention away from the (well-known) sensitive sites and onto finding the right people to interview. High value targets were only part of the picture. Piecing together the puzzle would depend just as much on the co-operation of mid-ranking officials.

"… The immediate priority should be for the commanders in theatre to set up safe zones and reception points for Iraqis who wanted to provide information … Former UNSCOM inspectors could then assist in interviews."

101. The need to manage public expectations was also discussed. The process would be long and technical.

102. Mr Dowse, the FCO member of the UK delegation, highlighted a number of points to Mr Straw, including:

> "The immediate need is to ensure that both US and UK are making best use of the quite substantial specialist military assets we have in theatre now, to pursue the search for evidence of WMD programmes. Our understanding is that the UK assets are not being used at all in their intended roles; the (500-strong) US 75th Exploitation Task Force is searching sites, but largely on an opportunity basis rather than in accordance with a coherent set of priorities. The commanders on the spot have – understandably been focused on … [other issues]. They now need to make a further gear-change, and put WMD at the top of their priorities. DCDI [Mr Howard] will visit theatre early next week to make sure this message gets across to UK commanders. The Americans are taking parallel action with CENTCOM."[46]

103. Mr Dowse reported that, contrary to the reporting telegram from Washington, the ISG was expected "to roll out incrementally from the start of May", and:

> "Subject to Mr Hoon's approval, MOD have agreed in principle to a UK contingent in the ISG of about 100 specialist personnel, including the Chief of Staff."

104. Mr Desmond Bowen, the Deputy Head of OD Sec, held a meeting on 24 April "to focus on the very short term, before the ISG is fully up and running at the end of May".[47] He informed Sir David Manning that three main obstacles to early progress had been identified:

- the search for WMD not being CENTCOM's priority and the military operating "in a piecemeal fashion";
- poor security, especially in Baghdad, making it difficult and dangerous to interview some of those known to be involved; and
- the absence of incentives for scientists and others to come forward.

105. The meeting produced two ideas:

- immediate establishment of a pilot scheme in Basra, using UK resources, to take advantage of the fact that many WMD scientists were "likely to have been Shia and may have gone home to the South"; and
- development of an incentives package.

106. Mr Bowen recommended a "real push" with the Americans and offered Sir David Manning a note to use with Dr Rice.

107. Mr Howard recommended next steps to Mr Hoon on 24 April.[48] He explained that the relevant US agencies:

- agreed that the discovery of WMD was a "high and urgent policy priority";
- recognised the political, presentational and legal pressures for the UK;
- agreed that the ISG would be "the primary executive vehicle" for detection work once it was fully established by the end of May;
- agreed the need to redirect US and UK resources in theatre while the ISG was still building its capacity;
- accepted "the political desirability of third party validation" of finds and did "not appear to rule out the involvement of the UN in this process", although there was "considerable hostility to UNMOVIC in its present form"; and
- agreed the need for co-ordinated public handling and expectation management.

108. In relation to UK support for the ISG, Mr Howard recommended that Mr Hoon:

- accede to the US request to provide a Chief of Staff to Maj Gen Dayton;
- agree, as a first step, to assign certain assets already in Iraq to the ISG for an initial period of six months and for deployment across Iraq:
  - 12 personnel from the DIS Battlefield Intelligence Recovery Team;
  - eight personnel from the Joint Forces Interrogation Team;
  - eight personnel from 7630 (HUMINT) Squadron;
  - four personnel from Document Exploitation teams; and
- agree that officials should pursue additional steps to enhance the UK contribution, including the urgent recruitment and redeployment of WMD experts.

109. Lieutenant General Andrew Ridgway, who had succeeded AM Sir Joe French as CDI, informed Lt Gen Reith that Mr Hoon had approved Mr Howard's recommendations.[49]

110. Lt Gen Ridgway explained that a revised Execute Directive for Op TELIC would reflect the need for activity in theatre to match the very high priority attached to discovery of WMD.[50] In the meantime, he requested Lt Gen Reith's support in ensuring all were aware of the importance attached to the work.

111. On 25 April, Mr Howard informed Vice Admiral Lowell E Jacoby, Director of the DIA, that Mr Hoon had approved the broad outline of the UK contribution to the ISG.[51] It would include a Chief of Staff for Maj Gen Dayton and, as a first step, for an initial period of six months and for theatre-wide deployment, 30-40 personnel comprising:

- the DIS Battlefield Intelligence Recovery Team;
- the Joint Forces Interrogation Team;
- 7630 (HUMINT) Squadron of the Royal Auxiliary Air Force;
- a Document Exploitation Team.

112. Mr Howard explained that other possible contributions were being investigated "as a matter of urgency".

113. Mr Hoon's Private Office informed Sir David Manning on 28 April that:

> "The Defence Secretary has agreed that we should respond positively to a US request to provide a military … Chief of Staff for the ISG, and that we should assign to the ISG UK specialist WMD related units, amounting initially to some 30-40 personnel, already in theatre or about to arrive. We are also looking at dedicating other analytical expertise (including a Porton Down[52] mobile laboratory and ex-UN inspectors) to the ISG effort. The US Commander of the ISG (Major General Keith Dayton) anticipates taking full command around 30 May, though many US and UK elements of the ISG should be in operation well before then … There are considerable variations of view in the US on timescales. General Dayton is talking in terms of six months. Others see the process taking two years or more."[53]

114. Mr Hoon's Private Office explained that there was "a complex process" to go through to ensure assets already in theatre before the ISG was established were put to best use. Maj Gen Dayton was discussing the issue with CENTCOM. A UK team led by Mr Howard would do the same with AM Burridge the following week.

115. Mr Howard reported the outcome of his visit to the ISG planning team in Kuwait and the site of the future ISG Survey Analysis Centre in Qatar to Mr Bowen on 2 May.[54] Mr Howard identified security and logistic support as the main constraints on increasing the WMD effort in theatre. WMD activity had to compete with other high priorities, including support for the Office of Reconstruction and Humanitarian Assistance (ORHA).

116. Mr Howard stated that he had "found no lack of commitment or urgency in respect of WMD exploitation" and there was "an element of resentment that Washington and London did not recognise the scale of the current effort".

117. Asked by US personnel whether UK political, legal and media opinion would be satisfied if nothing was found and the case for military action rested on the fact that Saddam Hussein retained the expertise and could have built a WMD capability, Mr Howard had responded that he thought not:

> "We may not ultimately need to be able to point to vast stockpiles of agent, missiles or warheads. But we would at the least need hard evidence of a programme that could be mobilised at short notice and concealment activity."

118. Mr Howard also reported that there had been strong support for a scheme to incentivise and attract scientists to speak to the Coalition.

119. Separately, Mr Howard advised Mr Scarlett that he saw no need to appoint a senior political figure to oversee the Coalition effort on WMD detection.[55] His impression was that Secretary Rumsfeld and Mr Stephen Cambone, US Under Secretary of Defense for Intelligence, had a firm political grip on policy and execution. The difficulty lay in transmitting the sense of priority and urgency into action on the ground.

120. A paper prepared by the MOD on 3 May for the Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq Rehabilitation (AHMGIR) on 8 May, stated that, by 30 April, investigations had begun at 19 of the 147 highest-priority potential WMD-related sites identified by the US and UK before the invasion, and at a further 42 ad hoc sites.[56] There were 400 lower-priority potential WMD sites remaining to be investigated.

121. The MOD stated that the proposed mission of the ISG was to:

> "Co-ordinate and conduct intelligence exploitation throughout Iraq and locate, disable and eliminate Iraqi CBRN/M [chemical, biological, radiological, nuclear/ missile] production, storage facilities and materials in order to: complete the removal of the Iraqi regime; enable the prosecution of war crimes and crimes against humanity; determine the status of Kuwaiti POWs … remove the threat from Iraqi WMD and assist the Global War on Terrorism."

122. The concept of operations for the ISG was "still fluid" and could pose some difficulties for the UK.

123. The FCO and the MOD were "developing proposals for a reconstitution of UNMOVIC tailored to the new permissive environment in Iraq".

124. The Cabinet Office's Annotated Agenda for the AHMGIR stated that "US investigation efforts are currently ad hoc but will be established on a sounder footing from the end of May". The ISG would have over 1,000 specialist staff. Officials invited Ministers to "note the progress made and the time likely before investigations produce clear results".[57]

125. AM Burridge criticised CENTCOM's handling of SSE operations in his 'Hauldown Report' of 8 May.[58] He wrote:

> "The scale and complexity of SSE was underestimated by CENTCOM who primarily focused on sites with WMD connections. They became fixated on the Weapons of Mass Destruction Master Site List (WMSL) and there was unfounded confidence that the 'smoking gun' would be found during the exploitation of early Priority 1 sites. With the rapid collapse of the regime and the failure to find any evidence of WMD, there was a realisation that the number of non-WMD sites was far in excess of capability. These needed rapid exploitation before looting destroyed any potential evidence. The diversity of agencies … and forces … involved resulted in a fragmented approach … In addition, reporting mechanisms were developed well after the start of operations, which resulted in confusion and inability to track progress."

126. AM Burridge also criticised the US decision to embed media in XTF-75. The "delay in establishing the facts associated with many discoveries" had led to friction in the command chain.

127. On 11 May, an article published in The Washington Post described the replacement of XTF-75 by the ISG as "a milestone in frustration for a major declared objective of the war", but recognised that:

> "Even the sharpest sceptics do not rule out that the hunt may eventually find evidence of banned weapons. The most significant unknown is what US interrogators are learning from senior Iraqi scientists, military industrial managers and Iraqi government leaders now in custody … Publicly, the Bush Administration has declined to discuss what the captured Iraqis are saying. In private, US officials provide conflicting reports, with some hinting at important disclosures."[59]

128. The article attracted wide coverage and prompted sharply contrasting headlines in the UK:

- in The Telegraph: "Americans keep up pressure on banned weapons";[60]
- in The Guardian: "Weapons taskforce leaves in failure".[61]

129. The work of XTF-75 was summarised in the introduction to the final report of the ISG, published in September 2004:

> "Many sites were inspected but with an aim of discovering WMD, not inspecting and developing an analytical assessment of the Iraqi programs. Wartime conditions prevailed with concern about force protection primary. The work of XTF-75 was therefore aimed at discovery of possible WMD locations (to eliminate a threat), not the compilation of evidence to build a picture of what happened to the weapons and programs.

"This early approach, perhaps logical if the goal was simply to find hidden weapons, undermined the subsequent approach of piecing together the evidence of the Iraqi WMD programs such as they existed. In fact, combined with the chaos of the war and the widespread looting in the immediate aftermath of the conflict, it resulted in the loss of a great amount of potentially very valuable information and material for constructing a full picture of Iraqi WMD capabilities. Sites were looted. Documents were either ignored or collected haphazardly or burned by either the Regime or Coalition forces."[62]

130. In his memoir, Mr George Tenet, the US Director of Central Intelligence (DCI), wrote that a lot of time had been lost by the time the ISG was established:

"… the Iraqis had been deliberately destroying records … government files were being seized by the truckload by groups such as the Iraqi National Congress … raising questions about the validity of any information that might later be discovered in these documents".[63]

131. Lieutenant General Sir Robert Fry, Deputy Chief of Joint Operations during the invasion, told the Inquiry:

"We certainly had special processes: Sensitive site exploitation … and as the conventional advance went on there were a series of sites that were pre-identified that were then searched for evidence of WMD."[64]

132. Asked what proportion of the military operation was geared to finding WMD, Lt Gen Fry said:

"It was small … subordinate to decisive manoeuvre. Getting to Baghdad, winning the conventional phase was what it was all about and this was very much a subtext, but an important subtext."[65]

133. Sir Richard Dearlove told the Inquiry:

"I think that some of us expected that there would be some finds relatively quickly, you know, whilst the trail was still hot. So it was very frustrating, in the early weeks after the military conflict finished, when there was absolutely no progress made at all.

"What we hoped was that maybe a military unit would run into something. But I also remember the figure for the number of unguarded Iraqi ordnance dumps across Iraq, and strictly speaking, all of those should have been inspected, but it was completely impossible to do so."[66]

134. SIS4 told the Inquiry what he had expected to be found when the search began:

"It seemed to me that we had to get a fire blanket over the proliferation hazards, and very quickly indeed …

"Secondly, while not expecting gleaming arrays of kit to be found, just curiosity meant that we longed to get in there and find out what we had been tinkering with.

"Lastly, the Whitehall political question, 'Well, SIS, you have been party to this high tension pursuit of WMD. Where is it then?'

"So the need to orchestrate immediate follow-up inside Iraq on all that we knew, all the leads, seemed to me to be very, very, very important. I was concerned that the lead on this was going to MOD and in America, and my anxieties were borne out by what happened. There were ammo dumps in Iraq covering square kilometres … It was a huge task, and it needed very, very skilful and dynamic generalship to run the follow-up. I'm afraid that didn't happen."[67]

135. Asked whether SIS had a plan to deal with the situation, SIS4 said that he recognised:

"… it wouldn't be up to us. We didn't have the staff. We didn't have the authority. But I did make the point repeatedly in conversations with people in Whitehall, particularly with the military, that this needed gripping. The plan needed to be written, and command and control put in place to make sure the plan was implemented.

"Movement inside Iraq was very tightly controlled by the military. People were being arrested. My memory is that we did try to get access, but it was very muddled … We put people on the ground quite quickly to be there to follow things up, but I don't recall any good coming out of it. At this time, of course, the military were on the ground in Iraq. Force protection and military requirements, operational requirements took priority."[68]

136. SIS4 expressed surprise at the relative lack of concern about WMD after the military operation ended: "deployments remained, things were put in place, but they weren't being driven from the very top".[69]

137. SIS3 told the Inquiry:

> "I assumed, as others did, that there was indeed WMD. I mean, it was very swiftly shown that the nuclear reporting was pretty accurate and the missile reporting was accurate. But the CBW, obviously, that became clear within a few weeks that there was a problem. We had expected to come across facilities or shells and so on, and we didn't. Therefore there was already political clamour, if you like."[70]

Managing public expectations

138. On 21 April, Mr Straw expressed scepticism to Mr Blair about the likelihood that physical evidence of Saddam Hussein's WMD would be found.

139. On 28 April, Mr Blair told the media "we can take our time about this and so we should". He expressed confidence that WMD would be found.

140. On 21 April, Mr Straw told Mr Blair:

> "I am very worried that, inexorably, we are being pushed into a position where we accept that the war will only have been justified if a significant WMD find is made. This is exactly the place where our opponents, at home and abroad, and the media want us. We should not go there.
> "The military action was justified the day we took it, on the grounds that:-
>
> - the Saddam regime had had chemical and biological weapons – we know that for sure;
> - it had failed to meet a mountain of UN obligations;
> - a huge number of questions about its WMD position and capabilities remained unanswered (Blix's 173 page report), and Iraq simply refused to co-operate properly, raising entirely legitimate issues in the minds of most members of the Security Council that they had a lot to hide."[71]

141. Mr Straw continued:

> "However, I remain sceptical that physical evidence of WMD will be found:-
>
> - Saddam had every motive, and months of notice before the fall of Baghdad to destroy all WMD evidence; so did his collaborators;
> - remarkably little circumstantial evidence has so far been forthcoming;
> - the expectations from the intelligence have always been greater than the product, so far;

- I was struck by General Franks' caution on this when I saw him ([Mr Colin] Powell [US Secretary of State] has been dubious about finds going back to last summer and I think this reflects a wide view in the US military);
- Your point that our experience in Northern Ireland … shows that large arms caches can be concealed for years …"

142. Mr Straw added:

> "Yes, we did take military action in order to disarm Iraq of its WMD. But if it turns out that under the pressure of the US/UK military build up, he disarmed himself, so be it."

143. Mr Straw wrote that he understood that public appreciation of why military action had been taken would be "enhanced" if there were "good finds":

> "But if we carry on saying confidently that the material is there … and have 1,000 men doing nothing but search for the next six months … and still nothing is found, what then? Knowing it was there is not the same as knowing it is there."

144. Mr Straw concluded that, in the absence of significant finds, it would become "all the more important" to demonstrate that post-Saddam Hussein Iraq was a far better place than before. He was "wondering whether the whole US Administration" really appreciated the imperative of "getting the water and power back on" and the hospitals working fully.

145. Mr Straw said that he would call Mr Blair "to discuss all this".

146. In relation to WMD, Sir David Manning commented to Mr Blair:

> "The key is to find people not materiel – who can talk about Saddam's WMD programmes/aspirations/deceptions."[72]

147. During the visit to London on 23 April by Mr José María Aznar, the Prime Minister of Spain, Mr Aznar and Mr Blair spoke to President Bush about progress in Iraq, including plans to provide incentives for information about WMD locations.[73] In Mr Blair's view, the Coalition should present the search for WMD as its third priority, after winning the conflict and humanitarian assistance:

> "WMD was not just a US/UK issue: the international community had been searching for twelve years. It would take time."

148. In his minute to Mr Straw's Private Office reporting the outcome of the Washington talks on the ISG on 21 and 22 April, Mr Dowse cautioned that a "smoking gun" might not be found: Saddam Hussein had "had twelve years to hide the evidence". Fewer than a dozen of the 146 suspect sites identified as a priority by the Government had been visited.[74]

149. On third-party validation of findings, Mr Dowse reported that the UK delegation to the talks:

> "… made the point that what constituted credibility was inevitably going to be subjective – ie what was sufficient for the UK and US Governments might not be enough for the audiences we really need to convince, including the Security Council (and UK media). Like it or not, it was hard to escape the fact that a UN seal of approval would be the most difficult for the critics to dismiss …
> "The Americans did not seriously try to argue the point, but I doubt that we entirely overcame the deep reluctance – particularly in the Pentagon – to contemplate a further role for UNMOVIC."

150. Mr Straw welcomed Mr Dowse's advice, stating that it highlighted some of his own key concerns, on which he had already written to Mr Blair.[75] Mr Straw asked for a copy to be sent to Sir David Manning, and for Mr Dowse to prepare a draft minute to Mr Blair.

151. Mr Straw discussed WMD with Secretary Powell on 24 April.[76] UNMOVIC was rising up the agenda quickly. The US and UK had argued consistently for UNMOVIC, setting it up in resolution 1284 (1999) and enhancing its role in resolution 1441 (2002). Mr Straw did not see how they could now argue for it to be set aside. It was important to keep the moral high ground.

152. Mr Julian Miller, Chief of the Assessments Staff, sent "lines to take" on Iraq's WMD, agreed with NPD, to Mr Simon McDonald, Mr Straw's Principal Private Secretary.[77] On the question: "Iraqi WMD: Where's the evidence?", the points made by Mr Miller included:

- Coalition Forces were actively pursuing the issue but the investigation would not be "a quick process". Saddam Hussein had had "ample time to conceal his WMD programmes".
- The process would be "painstaking and detailed: we want to establish the truth beyond any doubt".
- "Given the emphasis on concealment" it was "hardly surprising that concrete evidence of WMD" had "yet to come to light".

- Other judgements had been "borne out, including by UNMOVIC", for instance:
  - the "illegal programme[s]" to "extend the range of the Al Samoud missile" and "produce even longer range missiles";
  - concealment of documents at homes of personnel associated with WMD programmes"; and
  - "suspicious programmes to manufacture long range UAVs [unmanned aerial vehicles]".
- The "testimony of scientists and documentation about WMD development and production programmes" would be "the key". But witnesses could not be expected to come forward until they were confident they could speak safely.

153. On the issue of a role for UN inspectors, Mr Miller wrote:

> "We appreciate the need for credible, independent validation of any discoveries … UNMOVIC and the IAEA would be an option …
> "As Dr Blix himself has said, the circumstances are not right for the inspectors to return to Iraq at present. If and when they do, their tasks would have changed: the focus would be on monitoring and verification rather than detection. That would call for different skills – some restructuring of the operation would be needed …"

154. In his monthly press conference on 28 April, Mr Blair stated that "the first priority has got to be to stabilise" Iraq, the second was the humanitarian situation, and:

> "… the third – and we can take our time about this and so we should – is to make sure that we investigate the weapons of mass destruction, and we will do that. And as I say every time I am asked, I remain confident that they will be found."[78]

155. Asked about why Saddam Hussein had not used weapons of mass destruction and whether the UN needed to be involved to verify any finds, Mr Blair made a number of points, including:

- Independent verification needed to be discussed "with the UN and amongst allies", but he had "no doubt at all that … some process of independent verification" was needed.
- There wasn't "any doubt that Iraq has had" WMD.
- Before the return of the inspectors, "there was a six-month campaign of concealment". That was "borne out by sufficient intelligence" that there was "no doubt" in his mind that was what happened.
- That meant it was "going to be far more difficult for them to reconstitute that material to use", and "we were giving very strong warnings to commanders in the fields as to what would happen if they did".

- The Government was "anxious not to start making the claims until we have absolutely bottomed out anything by way of information that comes to us".

156. In response to a suggestion that WMD had not been as big a threat as he thought, Mr Blair pointed out that Iraq could have reconstituted concealed weapons "had we all left Iraq and the weapons inspectors not being able to carry out their job". He added that he thought there would be "increasing evidence of links between the previous Iraqi regime and terrorist organisations".

157. On 2 May, Mr Straw sent Mr Blair further thoughts on what might be found in Iraq. Evidence might take the form of testimony or documents rather than materiel.

158. On the role of UNMOVIC and the IAEA, Mr Straw advised that it would be "odd" if the Coalition refused to co-operate with the weapons inspectors having made that the centrepiece of the case against Saddam Hussein.

159. Mr Straw wrote again to Mr Blair on 2 May reiterating his concerns that the plans for handling the detection and elimination of Iraqi WMD "should not become the foundation on which critics of our military action in Iraq" could "build a new case to attack us".[79]

160. Mr Straw welcomed the action being taken to impress on commanders in Iraq the importance of the issue and that work was in hand to identify a substantial UK contribution to the ISG. But the timeframe for ISG deployment highlighted the need to manage expectations:
